Claim of Ineffective Assistance Based on Defense Counsel's Failure to Adequately Object to Alleged Leading Questions and Prosecutor's Personal Closing Comments — Counsel's Performance Exceeds Standard of Reasonableness But Not Prejudicial — Ineffective Assistance Claim Denied
Lindberg claimed that defense counsel failed to provide effective assistance by: (1) inadequately objecting to the alleged use of leading questions used by the prosecution during examination of the victim of Lindberg's sex offense; and (2) failing to object at all to the prosecutor's personal comments during closing arguments regarding the credibility of witnesses and evidence presented by the defense. Applying the standard of record-based review set out in St. v. White, 2001 MT 343, 206 M 53, 30 P3d 340 (2001), the Supreme Court evaluated whether, based solely on the record, counsel's performance was deficient. On the first issue, counsel's performance was not considered deficient because questions asked of the victim were arguably not leading, and it was within the trial court's discretion to allow the questions, so it could not be argued that Lindberg was prejudiced by his counsel's performance. On the second issue, the Supreme Court agreed that failure to object to the prosecutor's personal comments during closing was indeed below the objective standard of reasonableness under prevailing professional norms in light of the circumstances of the case. However, Lindberg failed to show that he was prejudiced by counsel's failure to object to the comments or that there was a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different. Absent a showing of prejudice by Lindberg, the ineffective assistance claims failed. St. v. Lindberg, 2005 MT 359, 347 M 78, 196 P3d 1252 (2008).

Consumption of Alcohol Following Accident Not Considered Tampering With Evidence
Poplow drove his truck off of a country road, then got a ride home, where he consumed three double shots of whiskey, allegedly far past from the accident. After walking his dog, he went to a nearby bar

CHAPTER 1 STATUTORY PROVISIONS ON EVIDENCE

Part 1

Definitions and Miscellaneous Provisions

26-1-101. General definitions.

Compiler's Comments

1983 Amendment: Substituted definition of direct examination for "The examination of a witness by the party producing him is denominated the "direct examination"; the examination of the same witness upon the same matter by the adverse party, the "cross-examination". The direct examination must be completed before the cross-examination begins unless the court otherwise directs."; in definition of evidence substituted "Evidence" for "Judicial evidence", deleted ", sanctioned by law," after "means", and inserted "including but not limited to witness testimony, writings, physical objects, or other things presented to the senses"; at beginning of definition of leading question inserted "A "leading question" is" and at end deleted "is denominated a "leading question" or "suggestive question". On a direct examination leading questions are not allowed, except in the sound discretion of the court under special circumstances making it appear that the interests of justice require it"; and in definition of proof, after ""Proof" is", deleted "the effect of evidence,".

Case Notes

Defendant Fled Hospital Prior to Blood Draw — Blood Not Physical Evidence Until Collected — Conviction of Tampering With Evidence Improper: The defendant was taken to the hospital for a blood draw after being arrested for DUI. Before the blood draw, the defendant escaped from the hospital and was not located until the next day. She was charged with tampering with evidence. At trial, she claimed that her blood, while still in her body, did not constitute evidence until such time as the blood had been drawn and therefore could not be subject to tampering. The District Court disagreed, and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded, agreeing that until the defendant's blood was obtained it could not be considered physical evidence. St. v. Harrison, 2017 MT 60, 387 Mont. 47, 390 P.3d 954.

Claim of Ineffective Assistance Based on Defense Counsel's Failure to Adequately Object to Alleged Leading Questions and Prosecutor's Personal Closing Comments — Counsel's Performance Below Standard of Reasonableness But Not Prejudicial — Ineffective Assistance Claim Denied: Lindberg claimed that defense counsel failed to provide effective assistance by: (1) inadequately objecting to the alleged use of leading questions used by the prosecution during examination of the victim of Lindberg's sex offense; and (2) failing to object at all to the prosecutor's personal comments during closing arguments regarding the credibility of witnesses and evidence presented by the defense. Applying the standard of record-based review set out in St. v. White, 2001 MT 149, 306 M 58, 30 P3d 340 (2001), the Supreme Court evaluated whether, based solely on the record, counsel's performance was deficient. On the first issue, counsel's performance was not considered deficient because questions asked of the victim were arguably not leading, and it was within the trial court's discretion to allow the questions, so it could not be argued that Lindberg was prejudiced by his counsel's performance. On the second issue, the Supreme Court agreed that failure to object to the prosecutor's personal comments during closing was indeed below the objective standard of reasonableness under prevailing professional norms in light of the circumstances of the case. However, Lindberg failed to show that he was prejudiced by counsel's failure to object to the comments or that there was a reasonable probability that, but for counsel's unprofessional errors, the result of the proceeding would have been different. Absent a showing of prejudice by Lindberg, the ineffective assistance claims failed. St. v. Lindberg, 2008 MT 389, 347 M 76, 196 P3d 1252 (2008).

Consumption of Alcohol Following Accident Not Considered Tampering With Evidence: Peplow drove his truck off of a country road, then got a ride home, where he consumed three double shots of whiskey, allegedly for pain from the accident. After walking his dog, he went to a nearby bar and ordered a beer. He was found at the bar by the highway patrol officer who was investigating the accident. Peplow failed all sobriety tests and was charged with and convicted of DUI, driving with a suspended or revoked license, driving without insurance, failing to report an accident, and tampering with evidence. Following the state's case at trial, Peplow moved for a directed verdict on the tampering charge, arguing that a person's blood alcohol content does not fit the definition of a record, document, or thing, as required in 45-7-207, and also that the state failed to present evidence that Peplow knew or had reason to believe that an official proceeding or an investigation was pending or about to be instituted, as required by the statute. The motion was denied, and Peplow appealed. The Supreme Court noted that under 61-8-404 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10), evidence of a person's blood alcohol content must be shown by an analysis of blood or breath for it to be admissible, but the section does not contemplate that potentially measurable amounts of alcohol, still within the body, constitute evidence. Until one's breath or blood has been collected for analysis, it cannot be considered physical evidence. Thus, the court held that a person's blood alcohol content, as it exists within the person's body and control, does not constitute physical evidence, as required in 45-7-207, or a thing presented to the senses, as explained in this section, so a person who consumes alcohol following a motor vehicle accident cannot be convicted of tampering with physical evidence under 45-7-207, with respect to that person's blood, breath, or urine still within the person's body. Peplow's tampering conviction was reversed. St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001).

Bloodhound Testimony: Testimony and evidence obtained by the use of a dog was not incompetent "bloodhound testimony" since the testimony objected to was not that of a dog as interpreted by his handler or intended to identify defendant as having been in the area searched with the aid of dogs. St. v. Stewart, 175 M 286, 573 P2d 1138 (1977), distinguishing St. v. Storm, 125 M 346, 238 P2d 1161 (1951).

Proof — Must Have Foundation: Court's striking alleged proof from record was proper when foundation was not properly laid for admission. Big Sky Livestock v. Herzog, 171 M 409, 558 P2d 1107 (1976).

Bloodhound Testimony — Former Rule: In this state, so-called "bloodhound testimony" is incompetent and inadmissible on the trial of any person accused of a crime. St. v. Storm, 125 M 346, 238 P2d 1161 (1951).

Leading Question — Review of Previous Testimony: A question on redirect examination inquiring "Is that what you told the court before?" after portions of witness' testimony given at preliminary hearing before Justice of Peace were read to witness was not objectionable as leading question. St. v. Collett, 118 M 473, 167 P2d 584 (1946).

Excess of Leading Questions — Denial of Fair and Impartial Trial: The asking of numerous leading questions by the prosecution, over objection of defendant, may justly be cause for complaint that by the course adopted he was denied the fair and impartial trial guaranteed by the 1889 Montana Constitution. St. v. Kanakaris, 54 M 180, 169 P 42 (1917).

Non-English Speaking and Illiterate Witnesses — Both Parties Lead: It appears to be within the sound discretion of the court to allow leading questions on the part of the County Attorney, especially when the witnesses are illiterate and unable to speak English; but, having done this, it is but fair to extend the same privilege to the defendant. St. v. Spotted Hawk, 22 M 33, 55 P 1026 (1899).

26-1-102. Definitions — kinds of evidence.

Compiler's Comments

1983 Amendment: In definition of conclusive evidence, after "Conclusive evidence", deleted "or "unanswerable evidence"" and deleted last sentence, which read: "For example, the record of a court of competent jurisdiction cannot be contradicted by the parties to it."; in (1)(b), after "conclusive", deleted "or unanswerable", and changed "this code" to "statute"; inserted definition of corroborative evidence; in definition of direct evidence, after "proves", substituted "a fact" for "the fact in dispute directly", before "establishes" deleted "conclusively", and deleted last sentence, which read: "For example, if the fact in dispute be an agreement, the evidence of a witness who was present and witnessed the making of it is direct."; in definition of circumstantial evidence changed "Indirect evidence" to "Circumstantial evidence", after "tends to establish" substituted "a fact" for "the fact in dispute", and deleted last three sentences, which read: "For example, a witness proves an admission of the party to the fact in dispute. This proves a fact from which the fact in dispute is inferred. Indirect evidence is of two kinds; inferences and presumptions."; and in definition of prima facie evidence substituted "which proves" for "which suffices for the proof of", and deleted last sentence, which read: "For example, the certificate of a recording officer is prima facie evidence of a record, but it may afterward be rejected upon proof that there is no such record."

CUMULATIVE EVIDENCE

Defendant's Convictions Upheld — Potentially Tainted Police Interview Not Contributing to Convictions: The defendant was questioned by police after he was arrested and charged with deliberate homicide for the death of his ex-wife and tampering with evidence. During the questioning, the defendant was advised of his Miranda rights, he declined to waive his rights, and at times he indicated that he did not need an attorney, while at other times he indicated that he had an attorney. The defendant also said he would not answer questions, but he continued to do so and never told the police to stop. At trial, the defendant filed a motion to suppress, arguing that the interview violated his right to counsel. The District Court denied the motion, and after deliberations the jury convicted the defendant of both charges. On appeal, the defendant argued that his convictions must be reversed based upon the denial of his motion to suppress. The Supreme Court evaluated if the ruling on the motion was prejudicial under 46-20-701. Additionally, the court evaluated whether the state could demonstrate that there was no reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction and whether under the cumulative evidence test, evidence existed that provided the same facts as the tainted evidence. Based on all the other evidence in the case, the court held that there was no reasonable possibility that the admission of the interview contributed to the convictions, and the convictions were affirmed. St. v. Larson, 2015 MT 271, 381 Mont. 94, 356 P.3d 488.

Clarification of Harmless Error Analysis in Determining Whether Trial Court Error Resulted in Prejudice — Structural Error Versus Trial Error — Cumulative Evidence Test Versus Overwhelming Weight of Evidence Test: When determining whether trial court error has prejudiced a defendant, the Supreme Court has applied slightly different standards in various cases, resulting in some inconsistency and confusion over the proper test to be applied in a harmless error analysis. Over time, the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" test expressed in St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428 (1980) (affirmed in In re Petition of Brodniak v. St., 239 M 110, 779 P2d 71 (1989), and St. v. Fuhrmann, 278 M 396, 925 P2d 1162 (1996)), eclipsed the more substantive inquiry of whether erroneously admitted evidence might have contributed to a conviction, resulting in an inclination to simply tally the quantity of the admissible evidence of guilt instead of evaluating the qualitative impact that the inadmissible evidence might have had on the finder of fact—an approach that the court found unacceptable. In order to preserve the substantial rights of the accused and the fundamental fairness of the criminal trial and to provide consistent guidance to practitioners, the Supreme Court found it appropriate to formally adopt an approach to harmless error issues that first defined the type of error in question and that second, depending on the type of error, set a uniform standard against which the error must be analyzed to determine if the error was sufficiently prejudicial to warrant reversal, completing the analysis begun in St. v. Lamere, 2000 MT 45, 298 M 358, 2 P3d 204 (2000). The first step is to analyze whether the claimed error is structural error or trial error. Structural error is the type that affects the framework within which the trial proceeds, such as errors in jury selection, total deprivation of the right to counsel, and lack of an impartial judge, and is automatically reversible without additional analysis or review. Trial error is the type that typically occurs during presentation of the case to a jury. It is not presumptively prejudicial and is thus subject to harmless error review pursuant to 46-20-701. Once a convicted person raises and establishes that evidence was erroneously admitted and has alleged that there is a reasonable possibility that the evidence might have contributed to a conviction, the state must demonstrate that the error was not prejudicial. To determine whether that reasonable possibility exists, the Supreme Court abandoned the "overwhelming weight of the evidence" test in McKenzie, Brodniak, and Fuhrmann in favor of the "cumulative evidence" test set out in Harrington v. Calif., 395 US 250 (1969). In making its proof under the cumulative evidence standard, the state must show admissible evidence that proved the same facts as the tainted evidence and demonstrate that the quality of the tainted evidence was such that there was no possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. If the only evidence tending to prove an element of the crime is tainted, then reversal will be compelled. If the tainted evidence does not go to the proof of an element of the crime and there is no other evidence that proves the same facts as the tainted evidence, then the tainted evidence will be considered harmless only if there is no possibility that it might have contributed to the conviction. In the present case, the trial court erred in admitting evidence related to Van Kirk's performance on a horizontal gaze nystagmus test; however, there was other admissible cumulative evidence that proved that same fact of Van Kirk's DUI as the tainted evidence, so Van Kirk's right to a fair trial was not prejudiced and the DUI conviction was affirmed. St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), followed in St. v. Peplow, 2001 MT 253, 307 M 172, 36 P3d 922 (2001), St. v. Spang, 2002 MT 120, 310 M 52, 48 P3d 727 (2002), St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003), St. v. Crawford, 2003 MT 118, 315 M 480, 68 P3d 848 (2003), St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004), St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 334, 324 M 173, 103 P3d 503 (2004), St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006), and St. v. Russette, 2008 MT 413, 347 M 285, 198 P3d 791 (2008). See also Swan v. St., 2006 MT 39, 331 M 188, 130 P3d 606 (2006), and St. v. Chavez-Villa, 2012 MT 250, 366 Mont. 519, 289 P.3d 113.

Cumulative Hearsay Testimony Harmless: The admission of an officer's hearsay testimony that Stuit had committed an offense and that it had occurred on a specific date, although hearsay, was merely cumulative and was harmless error absent prejudice to Stuit. St. v. Stuit, 277 M 227, 921 P2d 866, 53 St. Rep. 607 (1996), followed in St. v. Veis, 1998 MT 162, 289 M 450, 962 P2d 1153, 55 St. Rep. 651 (1998).

Admissibility of Videotape With Cautionary Instruction — No Objection — Waiver: An insurer assigned as error the admission to evidence of a doctor's videotaped deposition, contending the deposition was cumulative, had no probative value, and invoked the sympathy and passion of the jury. The videotape was submitted to the jury without any objection by the insurer and under a cautionary instruction from the court that the video was not to be considered for the insured's damages but only to show whether he was physically able to participate in the fire in the way the insurer claimed he did. The District Court Judge, in his order denying the posttrial motions, properly found the objection to submission of the evidence to have been waived. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Independent Facts: The question whether evidence is "cumulative" within the meaning of this section does not depend upon the quantity or probable effect of the evidence but upon its character, and if it brings to light some new independent fact of a different character than that theretofore elicited, though tending to prove the same proposition or ground of claim before canvassed, it is not cumulative. Jenkins v. Kitsen, 62 M 515, 205 P 243 (1922).

Newly Discovered Evidence: In an action in claim and delivery, allegedly newly discovered evidence which tended to prove plaintiff's ownership in the chattel by the same character of evidence as that given at the trial by plaintiff and her husband was cumulative and therefore did not warrant the granting of a new trial. Jenkins v. Kitsen, 62 M 515, 205 P 243 (1922).

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE — GENERALLY

Felony Strangulation — Sufficient Corroborating Evidence — Defendant's Own Actions Followed by Admission — Sufficient Evidence for Jury's Verdict: The trial evidence supported the defendant's conviction of felony strangulation by a jury's verdict. Every witness gave considerable additional evidence corroborating the victim's assault when she initially described it. Moreover, the defendant's own actions and statements afterward offered additional corroboration, including about 100 phone calls, numerous text messages, and an admission to the police officer that he was tired of listening to the victim yell and he covered her mouth for 10 to 15 seconds. St. v. Dineen, 2020 MT 193, 400 Mont. 461, 469 P.3d 122.

Jury Instruction to Choose Most Reasonable Interpretation of Circumstantial Evidence — No Abuse of Discretion: The District Court in a murder trial instructed the jury that when circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one that supports guilt and the other that supports innocence, the jury determines which is most reasonable. On appeal, the defendant argued that the instruction diluted the state's burden of proof and compromised his right to be presumed innocent. The Supreme Court noted that the District Court included separate jury instructions regarding the burden of proof and the presumption of innocence. Following St. v. Sanchez, 2017 MT 192, 388 Mont. 262, 399 P.3d 886, and St. v. Iverson, 2018 MT 27, 390 Mont. 260, 411 P.3d 1284, the Supreme Court found that determining the weight and credibility of the evidence is the exclusive province of the jury and the jury instructions, taken as a whole, fully and fairly instructed the jury on the proper burden of proof. St. v. Neiss, 2019 MT 125, 396 Mont. 1, 443 P.3d 435.

No Error in Allowing Jury to Hear Evidence Regarding Missing Murder Weapon: Meredith contended that the jury should not have been allowed to hear evidence regarding a knife that was used during a homicide, even though the weapon was never recovered and the evidence was thus circumstantial. The Supreme Court concluded that the evidence was relevant because a weapon similar to that described had been used during the murder, and the court further concluded that the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial to Meredith, inasmuch as the jury could have properly inferred, without arousing any hostility toward Meredith, that the knife was used to kill the victim. Therefore, the trial court did not err in allowing the jury to hear the evidence. St. v. Meredith, 2010 MT 27, 355 Mont. 148, 226 P.3d 571.

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence of Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Although no drugs were found in his possession, Rosling was charged with criminal possession of dangerous drugs along with deliberate homicide and a number of other offenses. At trial, Rosling moved to dismiss the drug charge based on insufficient evidence. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Rosling admitted to an investigating officer that he purchased methamphetamine the weekend before the murder and used methamphetamine on the night of the murder, the forensic report on Rosling's urine sample showed the presence of methamphetamine in Rosling's system, and a witness testified that Rosling used methamphetamine the night of the murder. This evidence, though circumstantial, was sufficient for a trier of fact to find the essential elements of criminal possession of dangerous drugs beyond a reasonable doubt, and the trial court did not err in denying the motion to dismiss. St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence of Use of Physical Force to Warrant Sending Aggravated Kidnapping Charge to Jury: At the close of the state's case, Rosling moved for dismissal of an aggravated kidnapping charge on grounds that the evidence was insufficient to send the case to the jury. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Rosling first contended that the state failed to prove that Rosling restrained the victim by secreting or holding the victim in a place of isolation. However, the crime may also be proved by evidence that the defendant used or threatened to use physical force. In this case, the evidence, although circumstantial, indicated that the victim was accosted and terrorized in the bedroom, strangled, and then dragged or forced into the bathroom where she was stabbed 67 times and cut 28 times, causing her death. This evidence was sufficient to show that Rosling used or threatened to use physical force. Rosling also asserted that the act of homicide does not itself constitute restraint for purposes of kidnapping. However, the factual bases for the deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping charges were not identical or inseparable, but were entirely distinct, so there were grounds for charging both deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping in the context of the same crime. Thus, the trial court did not err in denying Rosling's motion to dismiss on grounds of insufficient evidence. St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence to Show Essential Elements of Deliberate Homicide, Burglary, and Evidence Tampering to Warrant Jury Consideration: At the close of the state's case, Rosling moved for dismissal of deliberate homicide, burglary, and evidence tampering charges on grounds that the evidence was insufficient to send the case to the jury. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Rosling was with the victim the night of her death and was apparently the last person to see the victim alive. The victim was murdered at home, and a neighbor saw Rosling's car and a person matching Rosling's description at the home around the time of the murder. Footprints found at the home matched Rosling's shoes. The victim's father found the victim and discovered burning magazines beneath the victim, apparently left in an attempt to cover up the crime. A spot of the victim's blood was found on Rosling's coat, and other blood stains on the coat could not be ruled out as belonging to the victim. Rosling was unable to account for his whereabouts at the time of the murder and gave police inconsistent statements concerning his actions the night before and day of the murder. Although the evidence was circumstantial, it was sufficient to send the case to the jury, and the trial court did not err in denying Rosling's motion to dismiss on grounds of insufficient evidence. St. v. Rosling, 2008 MT 62, 342 M 1, 180 P3d 1102 (2008). See also St. v. Daniels, 2019 MT 214, 397 Mont. 204, 448 P.3d 511.

Theft by Deception, Common Scheme, Proved by Circumstantial Evidence: While managing a hotel, Field engaged in highly irregular accounting practices, altering bank deposit slips and manipulating direct-bill accounts, resulting in losses of thousands of dollars to the hotel. Field was convicted of theft by deception, common scheme. On appeal, Field contended that there was insufficient evidence to prove theft beyond a reasonable doubt, including the fact that no one saw him take any money. Although true, there was substantial circumstantial evidence on which the jury could rely, including altered bank deposit slips handwritten by Field and transactions conducted under Field's personal computer password, in concluding that Field committed theft of greater than $1,000. Field's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Field, 2005 MT 181, 328 M 26, 116 P3d 813 (2005).

Circumstantial Evidence Supporting Conclusion That Victim Had Reasonable Apprehension of Bodily Injury: Defendant contended that a directed verdict motion should have been granted requesting dismissal of a partner or family member assault charge because no evidence was presented that the victim had reasonable apprehension of bodily injury, which the state had to prove in order to meet its burden of proof. The standard for determining whether a person had reasonable apprehension of bodily injury is that of a reasonable person under similar circumstances. Direct evidence is not necessary to establish the elements of the offense. A conviction may be based entirely on circumstantial evidence, and direct proof of other facts may give rise to an inference that a victim had reasonable apprehension of bodily injury. In this case, the victim: (1) fled from her apartment with her dog over concern about defendant's past behavior; (2) locked herself in a neighbor's bathroom; (3) heard defendant scream that he was going to kill her; (4) observed knife holes that defendant was making in her apartment door; and (5) ultimately fled the building. From these facts a jury could find that the victim had reasonable apprehension of bodily injury, and denial of defendant's directed verdict motion was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003).

Expert Testimony on Evidence of Microscopic Hair Comparison Admissible: When considering whether expert evidence from microscopic hair comparison is admissible, the Supreme Court found that microscopic hair comparison is not novel scientific evidence; therefore, it was not error for the District Court to fail to consider the factors in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 US 579, 125 L Ed 2d 469, 113 S Ct 2786 (1993), in determining if the expert's testimony was admissible. Nevertheless, when considering admissibility of microscopic hair comparison evidence, the District Court must conduct a conventional Rule 702, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), analysis. Applying Hulse v. Dept. of Justice, 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998), the court held that microscopic hair comparison, like the horizontal gaze nystagmus test in Hulse, is beyond the range of ordinary training or intelligence and is thus a subject on which an expert may testify. Here the state established an adequate foundation for the expert's testimony, including education, training, and knowledge, and the District Court did not err in allowing it. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999), in accord with U.S. v. Matta-Ballesteros, 71 F3d 754 (9th Cir. 1995).

Circumstantial Evidence Sufficient to Affirm Conviction for Threats and Improper Influence in Official and Political Matters: After a confrontation with state highway crew members, the Heffners were convicted of threats and other improper influence in official and political matters, a felony under 45-7-102. They appealed on grounds that the convictions were based on mere suspicion or conjecture. Although the evidence presented was circumstantial, a rational jury could nevertheless infer that the Heffners were upset that their swift travel on the road was impeded by the duties of the road grader operator and that the Heffners took out their anger and frustration on the grader operator. The circumstantial evidence was sufficient to support the convictions. St. v. Heffner, 1998 MT 181, 290 M 114, 964 P2d 736, 55 St. Rep. 732 (1998).

Circumstantial Evidence Allowable to Establish Meeting of Minds Element of Civil Conspiracy — Summary Dismissal Proper Absent Genuine Issue of Material Fact: Because direct evidence of the meeting of the minds is typically in the possession and control of the alleged conspirators and thus difficult if not impossible to obtain, circumstantial evidence may be used to establish the meeting of the minds element of a civil conspiracy. However, when that circumstantial evidence does not raise a genuine issue of material fact regarding the meeting of the minds element, summary dismissal is proper. Schumacker v. Meridian Oil Co., 1998 MT 79, 288 M 217, 956 P2d 1370, 55 St. Rep. 338 (1998).

Admissibility of Party Deposition — Failure of Party to Attend Trial — No Evidence Party Offering Deposition Procured Absence of Other Party — Cumulative Evidence Held Harmless Error: Just before trial on a complaint for damages brought by Susan, her husband David, their minor daughter, and their failed business, Rocky Mountain Enterprises, Inc., Susan and her minor daughter decided not to attend the trial because of fear for their safety and sent a declaration from San Diego, California, instead. The District Court denied a request by David and the failed business to introduce the deposition given by Susan in place of her live testimony, citing for its reasoning the fact that Susan had refused on her own volition to attend the trial. Distinguishing In re Marriage of Powell, 231 M 72, 750 P2d 1099 (1988), the Supreme Court held that when a witness's absence is procured by another, the person procuring the absence may not offer a deposition of the witness's testimony because the deposition provides no opportunity for cross-examination. In the case before it, the Supreme Court noted that there was no evidence that David or the company had procured the absence of Susan or the minor daughter and that because those witnesses were more than 100 miles from the place of trial, the District Court erred when it refused to admit Susan's deposition. However, the District Court correctly held that the deposition was cumulative of other evidence, pursuant to this section, and the Supreme Court held that only harmless error had been committed by the District Court. Rocky Mtn. Enterprises, Inc. v. Pierce Flooring, 286 M 282, 951 P2d 1326, 54 St. Rep. 1410 (1997).

Allegation That Evidence Is Circumstantial and Susceptible of Different Interpretations: Allegation that evidence of guilt was circumstantial and susceptible of different interpretations relates to the weight of the evidence, not its sufficiency, and was properly refused as a basis for granting a motion of acquittal. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Additional Circumstantial Evidence of Burglary Properly Admitted: State's evidence that on the day following the theft of guns a person matching defendant's description and driving an automobile matching the description of defendant's vehicle attempted to pawn guns of the same general description as those stolen, although circumstantial, naturally or logically established an additional fact implicating defendant's guilt of burglary and was properly admitted. St. v. Oliver, 228 M 322, 742 P2d 999, 44 St. Rep. 1567 (1987).

Sufficient Circumstantial Evidence to Support Conviction — Deliberate Homicide: The Supreme Court found substantial evidence, although primarily circumstantial, to support conviction for deliberate homicide when the state pathologist's conclusions that lack of soot in victim's windpipe, minimal carbon monoxide level in blood and tissues, and fact that victim was found face up with limbs spread while most fire victims are found face down in fetal position supported theory that victim was dead before the fire began. St. v. Atlas, 224 M 92, 728 P2d 421, 43 St. Rep. 2042 (1986).

Sufficient Evidence to Support Conviction — Arson: The Supreme Court found abundant evidence to support defendant's conviction for arson when fire marshals concluded that: heat of the fire far exceeded the temperature of a normal house fire; the 1-hour fire wall between floors burned through in much less than 1 hour; the burn patterns along baseboards and even burn indicated use of accelerants; a heating pad, the wood stove, an electrical short, and acts of God were eliminated as causes of the fire; and defendant's own fire expert admitted that "alligator patterns" on the charred wood were compatible with the use of flammable liquids. St. v. Atlas, 224 M 92, 728 P2d 421, 43 St. Rep. 2042 (1986).

Breach of Covenant of Good Faith in Conducting Insurance Claim: In a foreclosure action, the insured, Britton, cross-claimed against Farmers Insurance Group (FIG) for the full amount of coverage provided by FIG's policy and for further compensatory and punitive damages by reason of "bad faith". FIG responded to the foreclosure action by setting up as a cross-claim against Britton its right under its partial assignment of mortgage and requesting foreclosure against Britton. FIG further defended against Britton's cross-claim by alleging that Britton had intentionally set the fire, had been guilty of fraud with respect to his interest in the property, and had not submitted a proper proof of loss. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that prior to filing its answer to Britton's cross-claim, FIG neither rejected Britton's proof of loss nor informed him in writing or otherwise of their contention of arson. Also, FIG's evidence regarding Britton's involvement in setting the fire was circumstantial, and there was no evidence of potential financial gain for Britton from the policy proceeds. The jury decision that FIG breached the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing in conducting the claim was upheld. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Simulated Swimming Pool Accident — Rescue: In action by a father alleging negligent care and supervision of his son at the YMCA swimming pool, evidence showed that one of five qualified lifeguards at the pool found the 6-year-old boy submerged about 4½ feet from the surface, that the lifeguard and a young boy pulled the son to the surface, and that one or more lifeguards carried the boy to the edge of the pool. The trial judge admitted evidence of an experiment in which one of the lifeguards threw a diving ring into the pool where the son was recovered and timed how long it took two young boys (one of which had helped save the son) to retrieve it, and then threw a 10-pound diving weight into the pool so that it settled into the pool. The boys were unable to retrieve it. From this the lifeguard concluded that the son was not on the bottom of the pool when rescued. The evidence was properly admitted since it supported the conclusion that the son was rescued in a shorter period of time than it would take for brain damage to result through submersion in water, and the experiment was substantially similar to the accident and rescue so as to lay a sufficient foundation for admission of testimony regarding the experiment. Johnson v. YMCA, 201 M 36, 651 P2d 1245, 39 St. Rep. 1937 (1982).

Aggravated Assault — Sufficiency of Circumstantial Evidence: An aggravated assault appeal was sustained for the state despite the fact that no eyewitness testified that the defendant stabbed the victim and that the weapon was never found because the circumstances surrounding the assault, including the defendant striking the victim in the area in which he was stabbed and the actions of the defendant prior to and following the assault, were sufficient to support a conviction viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution aided by a strong presumption in favor of the correctness of the judgment. St. v. Lozeau, 200 M 261, 650 P2d 789, 39 St. Rep. 1729 (1982), followed in St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992).

Proximate Cause — Standard of Proof: Circumstantial evidence sufficient to prove proximate cause in a civil action need not exclude every reasonable conclusion other than the conclusion sought to be established. It is sufficient if it affords a basis for a reasonable inference by the trier of fact, even if there are other reasonable inferences that might be drawn by that trier of fact. Jacques v. Mont. Nat'l Guard, 199 M 493, 649 P2d 1319, 39 St. Rep. 1565 (1982).

Manufacturing Defect: Plaintiff met the burden of proof for a strict liability action in proving by circumstantial evidence, a defect rendering a product unreasonably dangerous. The court rejected defendant's assertion of the "open and obvious danger" rule and the "patent-latent" distinction. Brown v. N. Am. Mfg. Co., 176 M 98, 576 P2d 711 (1978).

Instruction Proper Only When No Direct Evidence: A confession, such as that appearing in the record, constitutes direct evidence of the corpus delicti; thus, it is not error to refuse a circumstantial evidence instruction. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

Admission — Indirect Evidence: Under this statute any statement made to two witnesses by the defendant in a perjury offense was in the nature of an admission and, therefore, was indirect evidence (now "circumstantial evidence") of the fact sought to be proved. St. v. Scanlon, 174 M 139, 569 P2d 368 (1977), replacing opinion in 33 St. Rep. 1355 (1976).

Photographs — Condition Existing at Time of Controversy: Court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit photographs to assist jury in understanding theory that trucks depicted were properly loaded while truck involved in accident was improperly loaded because pictured trucks are different trucks loaded differently from truck involved and did not give a correct understanding of the condition existing at the time of the controversy. Leary v. Kelly Pipe Co., 169 M 511, 549 P2d 813 (1976).

Medical Proof of Causation: The fact that a traumatic injury was the proximate cause of a totally disabling disease (shaking palsy) could be proved by circumstantial evidence or inferences having a substantial basis in the evidence, demonstration or such a degree of proof as produces absolute certainty not being required by the law. Moffett v. Bozeman Canning Co., 95 M 347, 26 P2d 973 (1933), distinguished in Doty v. Indus. Accident Fund, 102 M 511, 59 P2d 782 (1936).

Possession of Stolen Property: In the absence of direct and positive evidence that defendant stole a steer, his possession of the meat of the animal and his exercise of ownership over it, under circumstances indicating knowledge of the origin of the animal, furnished a basis for the inference that he killed it, sufficient to justify submission of a larceny case to the jury. St. v. Evans, 60 M 367, 199 P 440 (1921).

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE — INFERENCES AND PRESUMPTIONS

Jury Instruction on Circumstantial Evidence — Defendant Failed to Show Instruction Adversely Affected Rights: During a high-speed chase, the defendant hit and killed a Deputy Sheriff. At trial, the defendant unsuccessfully objected to a jury instruction that, he argued, relieved the state of its burden to prove him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed. The court concluded that when the instructions were considered as a whole, they fully and fairly instructed the jury. The court also held that the instruction, on its face, did not relieve the state of any of its burdens to prove the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Sanchez, 2017 MT 192, 388 Mont. 262, 399 P.3d 886.

Statement Alleging Bodily Injury Recanted — Evidence of Bodily Injury Inferred by Witnesses of Defendant's Actions and Demeanor Following Incident: The defendant was charged with partner or family member assault. The victim had told an officer at the scene that the defendant had hit her in the face and tried to force her into a vehicle. Later, the victim recanted her statement. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, claiming that the victim's inconsistent statement to the officer was insufficient to establish the necessary element of bodily injury. The Supreme Court affirmed, noting that others had witnessed the defendant pushing the victim into the truck and had witnessed his demeanor at that time and this evidence supported an inference that he had hit the victim as she originally alleged and could serve as reliable evidence of guilt. Helena v. Strobel, 2017 MT 55, 387 Mont. 17, 390 P.3d 921.

Conclusion That Defendant Caused Injuries Based on Quality and Quantity of Circumstantial Evidence — Conviction Affirmed: An infant suffered serious injuries while Allum was babysitting, and Allum was charged with aggravated assault. Evidence offered at trial consisted of the extent of the child's injuries, Allum's inconsistent statements to police, and testimony from relatives concerning Allum's prior abusive conduct with the child. Allum was convicted by a jury based on this circumstantial evidence. On appeal, Allum contended that the state failed to make a connection between the child's injuries and any voluntary act by Allum. The state argued that the totality of the circumstances coupled with the severity of the injuries established that Allum had the requisite mental state of purposely or knowingly and that this mental state led to voluntary actions that caused the serious bodily injury. The Supreme Court affirmed the conviction. The circumstantial evidence was of such a quality and quantity that a jury could decline to accept Allum's assertion that the child's injuries were self-inflicted or accidental and could conclude instead that Allum purposely and knowingly caused the injuries. St. v. Allum, 2009 MT 15, 349 M 49, 201 P3d 776 (2009). See also St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358 (1998), and St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 1111 (2001).

No Error in Refusal to Instruct Jury That Acquittal Required if Evidence Supportive of Either Guilt or Innocence: At Misner's deliberate homicide trial, Misner cited St. v. Sheriff, 188 M 26, 610 P2d 1157 (1980), in proposing a jury instruction stating that when a jury finds two interpretations of the evidence to be equally reasonable, one of which points to the defendant's guilt and the other to innocence, the jury must accept the interpretation that points to innocence. The trial court rejected the instruction, and on appeal, Misner asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Sheriff is no longer good law on this point. The correct rule, as set out in St. v. Hill, 2005 MT 216, 328 M 253, 119 P3d 1210 (2005), is that when circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one of which supports guilt and the other innocence, it is the function of the trier of fact to determine which is most reasonable. St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007).

Trier of Fact to Determine Reasonableness of Conflicting Circumstantial Evidence — Sufficient Evidence to Conclude Defendant Possessed Necessary Mental State for Robbery: At Hill's trial for robbery, only circumstantial evidence identified Hill as the perpetrator. At the close of the state's case, Hill's counsel moved for a directed verdict regarding Hill's identity as the perpetrator, but the motion was denied. Hill appealed on grounds that the trial court erroneously denied the motion, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to St. v. Bowman, 2004 MT 119, 321 M 176, 89 P3d 986 (2004), when circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one supporting guilt and one supporting innocence, the trier of fact determines which interpretation is most reasonable, and a directed verdict is appropriate only when there is no evidence whatsoever to support a guilty verdict. In this case, it could not be concluded that there was no evidence whatsoever from which the jury could conclude that Hill was the assailant and, given that reasonable inference, that Hill possessed the necessary mental state to commit the robbery. St. v. Hill, 2005 MT 216, 328 M 253, 119 P3d 1210 (2005).

Use of Ryan-Type Pattern Jury Instruction on Circumstantial Evidence Discontinued in Favor of Hall-Type Instruction: Based on the holding in St. v. Ryan, 229 M 7, 744 P2d 1242 (1987), Bowman contended that he was entitled to a jury instruction stating that to be convicted solely on circumstantial evidence, the facts and circumstances must not only be entirely consistent with the theory of guilt, but must be inconsistent with any other rational theory or conclusion. The Supreme Court noted that after the decision in St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929 (1999), the pattern jury instruction based on Ryan is no longer a correct statement of law and cautioned practitioners not to request it. The acceptable Hall instruction states that if circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one pointing to a defendant's guilt and one to innocence, the trier of fact determines which interpretation is most reasonable. St. v. Bowman, 2004 MT 119, 321 M 176, 89 P3d 986 (2004), followed in St. v. Hill, 2005 MT 216, 328 M 253, 119 P3d 1210 (2005). See also St. v. Raczy, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007), in which it was held that defense counsel's proposal to include a Hall-type instruction could not be considered ineffective assistance of counsel.

Test of Prejudicial Effect of Jury Instruction Under Sandstrom Rule — Inference: The true test of a jury instruction under the Sandstrom decision is whether that instruction has the effect of allocating to the defendant some part of the burden of proof that properly rests on the State throughout the trial. The Sandstrom instruction was by its terms mandatory, but the Coleman instruction is permissive and in terms of an inference which might be drawn by the jury. When read in conjunction with the other instructions, the instruction, stating that if the jury found defendant to have committed the homicide and that if no circumstances of mitigation, excuse, or justification were found the jury might infer that defendant acted knowingly or purposely, was not prejudicial to defendant. St. v. Coleman, 185 M 299, 605 P2d 1000, 36 St. Rep. 2237 (1979).

Evidence Susceptible to Two Constructions: Defendant's offered instruction would have instructed the jury that if the evidence is susceptible to two constructions, one consonant with guilt and the other consonant with innocence, it is the jury's duty to adopt the interpretation that is consonant with innocence. The District Court properly refused to give this instruction. That instruction is generally given where the State relies on circumstantial or indirect evidence to prove its case. The instruction has no application where the evidence is direct with respect to the crime charged. St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368, 36 St. Rep. 1622 (1979), followed in St. v. Ryan, 229 M 7, 744 P2d 1242, 44 St. Rep. 1735 (1987).

Presumption or Inference From a Presumption or Inference:

One inference cannot be drawn from any other inference or presumption. Monforton v. N. Pac. Ry., 138 M 191, 355 P2d 501 (1960).

While negligence may be established by direct evidence, i.e., by inferences and presumptions deducible from facts, one inference cannot be drawn from another inference or presumption and a presumption cannot rest upon an inference. Fisher v. Butte Elec. Ry., 72 M 594, 235 P 330 (1925).

Presumption Rebutted: Under Montana statutes, a presumption remains as indirect evidence until rebutted by preponderance of contrary evidence, which must be weighed and determined by trier of facts, and disappears only when party to whom it is opposed produces sufficient evidence to preponderate against it. New York Life Ins. Co. v. Gamer, 106 F2d 375 (9th Cir. 1939).

Exclusion of Other Medical Causes: Where the evidence showed that claimant under the Workers' Compensation Act was a strong, healthy young man prior to a traumatic injury, that thereafter he was stricken with shaking palsy totally disabling him, which disease generally follows certain causes, including trauma, all of which causes, except trauma, were excluded by medical testimony, an inference that the industrial accident was the cause of his condition was justified. Moffett v. Bozeman Canning Co., 95 M 347, 26 P2d 973 (1933), distinguished in Doty v. Indus. Accident Fund, 102 M 511, 59 P2d 782 (1936).

Controversion of Presumption: A presumption is a form of indirect evidence, and it is valid and effective only until controverted by other evidence, direct or indirect. Cooper v. Romney, 49 M 119, 141 P 289 (1914).

DIRECT EVIDENCE

Prior DUI Convictions Affirmed in Absence of Direct Evidence of Irregularity — Presumption of Regularity of Prior Convictions: Snell contended that it was improper for the state to use two prior DUI convictions to elevate a new DUI charge to a felony based on the fact that the prior convictions were invalid because Snell was not informed of the right to counsel. Although the state may not use a constitutionally infirm conviction to support an enhanced punishment, a defendant must overcome the presumption of the regularity of the prior convictions with direct evidence of irregularity. However, Snell was unable to recall facts about the judges involved in both prior DUI cases, casting considerable doubt on his ability to recall other critical details in those cases. The District Court correctly held that Snell's testimony was not sufficient to overcome the presumption of regularity through direct evidence and that the prior convictions were therefore constitutionally firm. Denial of the dismissal motion was affirmed. St. v. Snell, 2004 MT 334, 324 M 173, 103 P3d 503 (2004). See also St. v. Moga, 1999 MT 283, 297 M 1, 989 P2d 856 (1999), and St. v. Weldele, 2003 MT 117, 315 M 452, 69 P3d 1162 (2003).

Evidence Susceptible to Two Constructions: Defendant's offered instruction would have instructed the jury that if the evidence is susceptible to two constructions, one consonant with guilt and the other consonant with innocence, it is the jury's duty to adopt the interpretation that is consonant with innocence. The District Court properly refused to give this instruction. That instruction is generally given where the State relies on circumstantial or indirect evidence to prove its case. The instruction has no application where the evidence is direct with respect to the crime charged. St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368, 36 St. Rep. 1622 (1979), followed in St. v. Ryan, 229 M 7, 744 P2d 1242, 44 St. Rep. 1735 (1987).

Instruction Proper Only When No Direct Evidence: A confession, such as that appearing in the record, constitutes direct evidence of the corpus delicti; thus, it is not error to refuse a circumstantial evidence instruction. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

PRIMA FACIE EVIDENCE

Prima Facie Case Showing No Substantial Change in Evidence — Attack of Chain of Evidence at Trial: Defendant questioned whether evidence was properly admitted without the state's establishing a proper chain of evidence. Extensive testimony chronicled the labeling, storing, securing, transferring of possession, and testing of each exhibit. The state made a prima facie case showing that there had been no substantial change in the evidence, and defendant failed to produce any evidence to show if actual or even potential tampering could have occurred. Additionally, defendant vigorously attacked the chain of evidence at trial; thus, the jury had an opportunity to weigh this evidence. The Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Circumstantial Evidence as Basis for Prima Facie Case: In a case where no one could testify to actually seeing an oversize motorcycle tire bind with the fender, circumstantial evidence would have to be allowed or the court would be taking away the right of the plaintiff to recover on a strict liability action since it would be unrealistic to expect the rider of the motorcycle to actually observe the front tire bind. McGuire v. Nelson, 167 M 188, 536 P2d 768 (1975).

Statutory Rape: Prima facie case of statutory rape was established by testimony of rape victim on cross-examination and redirect examination that defendant had committed an act of sexual intercourse with her. St. v. Anderson, 156 M 122, 476 P2d 780 (1970).

Failure to Rebut: In action by administrator of estate of deceased partner against surviving partners to recover assets transferred by deceased during his last illness, evidence that deceased had a half interest in partnership cattle and failure of defendants to produce any of the partnership records at the trial in the lower court sustained finding that heir of deceased had overcome the prima facie showing of one-third interest in the partnership cattle arising from the recording of the brand in name of three persons. Marshall v. Minlschmidt, 148 M 263, 419 P2d 486 (1966).

Ownership of Cattle: Although under 70-1-307 and 81-3-105 prima facie the owners of the recorded brand have the same interest in the cattle bearing their brand as shown in brand record, joint ownership of the cattle may be contradicted and overcome by other evidence under this section. Marshall v. Minlschmidt, 148 M 263, 419 P2d 486 (1966).

TRANSACTION RULE GENERALLY

Reference to Defendant's Prior Sexual Offenses Inextricably Intertwined With Improper Threats in Official and Political Matters — Evidence Probative of Defendant's Mental State in Threatening Police Officer — Prior Offenses Properly Admitted Under Transaction Rule. St. v. Hardin, 2023 MT 132, 413 Mont. 26, 532 P.3d 466.

Admissibility of Prior Acts to Provide Context Proper — Transaction Rule: The defendant staged a crime scene in order to implicate a local detective. He was charged with one count of arson, two counts of tampering with or fabricating physical evidence, and one count of impersonating a public servant. The detective had investigated the defendant on multiple prior occasions, resulting in two prior convictions, and following the convictions the defendant and his family had filed a civil lawsuit against the detective, alleging intimidation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant moved to exclude certain evidence of the defendant's past acts. The District Court denied the motion insofar as it related to the defendant's past acts relating to the detective, and the defendant was convicted on all but the arson charge. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed in part, finding that allowing the evidence was proper under both the Montana Rules of Evidence and 26-1-103, known as the transaction rule. Regarding the transaction rule, the court found that the details surrounding past events explained the circumstances underlying the charged offenses and allowed the "complete picture" to be presented to the jury by providing necessary context. St. v. Ellison, 2018 MT 252, 393 Mont. 90, 428 P.3d 826.

Transaction Rule — Evidence of Defendant's Gang Affiliations Properly Admitted — Evidence of Outstanding Warrant Not Grounds for Mistrial: The defendant was convicted of aggravated burglary and four counts of assault with a weapon. The crimes related to the defendant's attempts to recruit a former gang member to commit gang-related crimes. The defendant appealed the conviction, arguing that the District Court should not have admitted evidence relating to his gang affiliation because the prejudicial effect outweighed its probative value. The defendant also argued that the District Court should have granted his motion for a mistrial, following disclosure by a law enforcement witness that the defendant had an active warrant. The Supreme Court upheld the conviction, holding that evidence of the defendant's gang affiliation was central to the jury's understanding of what transpired, was allowed under the transaction rule, and was inextricably linked to and explanatory of the state's charges against him and the danger of unfair prejudice was not outweighed by its probative value. The court further held that the mention of the defendant's outstanding warrant was properly cured by an instruction from the District Court and there was no reasonable possibility that inadmissible evidence contributed to the defendant's conviction. St. v. Michelotti, 2018 MT 158, 392 Mont. 33, 420 P.3d 1020.

Denial of Motion in Limine of Defendant Yelling at Victim and Taking Victim's Car — Transaction Rule — Prejudice Outweighed by Probative Value: The defendant was charged with partner or family member assault. Prior to trial, he moved to prevent testimony that he had yelled at the victim and taken her car at the time of the incident. The District Court denied the motion and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing the testimony and that the prejudicial effect of the testimony outweighed its probative value. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, holding that the evidence was inextricably linked and explanatory of the nature and power dynamics of the relationship between the defendant and the victim. St. v. Saylor, 2016 MT 226, 384 Mont. 497, 380 P.3d 743.

No Error in Admitting Evidence of Alleged Threats and Prior Conduct: In a proceeding concerning a misdemeanor assault conviction, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of an altercation in a parking lot with another member of the victim's party prior to the incident and evidence of earlier threats from the defendant. The Supreme Court held that the events explained the charged offense and were inextricably linked with it. Furthermore, although the defendant argued that the evidence should be excluded under Rule 403, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), the trial court did not err in refusing to exclude the evidence because the rule does not require that relevant information be excluded simply because it is prejudicial. St. v. Lamarr, 2014 MT 222, 376 Mont. 232, 332 P.3d 258.

Evidence of Pot Parties, Pipe, or Paraphernalia Unrelated to Alleged Sex Crime — State Failed to Show No Reasonable Possibility Evidence Contributed to Conviction: Evidence of marijuana use and drug paraphernalia did not prove an element of sexual intercourse without consent or sexual assault, and the state was unable to demonstrate qualitatively that there was no reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to the defendant's conviction. When evaluating the impact of tainted evidence, the qualitative impact of the tainted evidence is the proper focus in determining whether trial error was harmless. St. v. Sage, 2010 MT 156, 357 Mont. 99, 235 P.3d 1284.

Scope of Transactional Rule — Time and Breadth: The transaction rule allows admission of evidence of acts that are inextricably or inseparably linked to and are explanatory of the offense, but the use of the rule is limited neither to occurrences immediately prior to the offense nor to evidence that is required for a conviction or defined by narrow ultimate issues such as the elements of a crime. St. v. Stout, 2010 MT 137, 356 Mont. 468, 237 P.3d 37.

Admissibility Under Transaction Rule of Evidence of Uncharged Violent Acts by Defendant Against Mother and Brother of Sexual Abuse Victim: Guill contended that the District Court erroneously interpreted and applied the transaction rule by admitting evidence of uncharged misconduct and violence against Guill's wife and son during the state's case of sexual misconduct by Guill against his daughter. The District Court interpreted the transaction rule as allowing evidence that is inextricably linked to the charged allegations, and the Supreme Court agreed. The rationale for admitting transaction evidence is that it is theoretically difficult to subdivide a course of conduct into discrete criminal acts and other conduct and that it is practically difficult for a witness to testify coherently to an event if the witness is permitted to reference only the minutely defined elements of a crime, so it is legitimate to admit properly limited evidence that is inextricably intertwined with a charged crime. The District Court also properly applied the transaction rule by dividing the challenged evidence into incidents of which the victim was aware, which was allowed, and incidents of which the victim was not aware, which was not allowed unless Guill himself opened the door to the testimony. St. v. Guill, 2010 MT 69, 355 Mont. 490, 228 P.3d 1152, distinguishing St. v. Lacey, 2010 MT 6, 355 Mont. 31, 224 P.3d 1247.

Evidence of Other Crimes Admissible Under Transaction Rule — No Limiting Instruction Required: When disputed evidence regarding prior bad acts is admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103, the requirements of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., do not apply to its admission, so a limiting instruction is not required as a matter of law. St. v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 M 344, 220 P3d 640 (2009).

Expert Testimony Regarding Grooming of Victims for Sexual Abuse Properly Allowed: The court in Berosik's incest trial allowed the state's witness to describe the characteristics of the grooming of potential child victims of sexual abuse and then allowed the complaining witnesses and others to testify about Berosik's prior acts that occurred with the victims over several years. The court ruled that the prior acts were evidence that Berosik was grooming his victims and thus were part of the transactions the state sought to prove. On appeal, Berosik asserted that the expert testimony on grooming was irrelevant and highly prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Expert testimony explaining the complexities of child sexual abuse is admissible, and the evidence of prior sexual activity occurring before the charged offenses was admissible under the transaction rule because the activity formed part of the transaction that was the fact in dispute and was explanatory of the charged offense. St. v. Berosik, 2009 MT 260, 352 M 16, 214 P3d 776 (2009). See also St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 M 114, 201 P3d 811 (2009), and St. v. Crosley, 2009 MT 126, 350 M 223, 206 P3d 932 (2009).

Failure to Give Notice of Intent to Introduce Evidence of Prior Intervention Hearing and Sanctions — New Trial Granted: At Campa's drug trial, the state sought to introduce evidence of a prior intervention hearing and of sanctions that were imposed as a result of the hearing. However, the state neglected to give Campa notice of its intent to introduce the evidence as required by 46-13-109 (now repealed). Campa appealed the lack of notice, but the state argued that no notice was required because the evidence was part of the transaction of the charged offense and thus admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103. The Supreme Court disagreed. Evidence of the intervention hearing and sanctions constituted evidence of a wrong at a time other than the offense charged, and because the state failed to comply with the procedural notice requirement, the evidence was improperly admitted, prejudicing Campa. The case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Campa, 2009 MT 251, 351 M 504, 213 P3d 1102 (2009).

Evidence of Escalating Sexual Abuse, Including Uncharged Incidents Occurring in Another State, Properly Admitted Under Transaction Rule — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel for Failure to Object to Admissible Evidence: At Crosley's incest trial, the state sought to introduce evidence of several incidents of abuse that occurred in California and in a county outside Ravalli County, where the crimes were charged. Defense counsel did not object to admission of the evidence, and the trial court allowed it. On appeal, Crosley asserted error in admitting the evidence and claimed ineffective assistance of counsel based on defense counsel's failure to object to the testimony or to request that the trial court provide a contemporaneous admonition at the time the evidence was admitted. The Supreme Court affirmed on both issues. Evidence of Crosley's other acts of incest that occurred in places other than Ravalli County was not wholly independent of or unrelated to the charged offenses in Ravalli County, and all the acts of incest, regardless of where they occurred, were inextricably linked to and explanatory of the Ravalli County offenses, so evidence thereof was admissible under the transaction rule exception to other crimes evidence in Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The fact in dispute was whether various acts of incest occurred, including evidence of uncharged acts that occurred outside Ravalli County, because those acts were clearly related to and not independent of the continuous and escalating nature of Crosley's sexual abuse. The other crimes evidence was thus proper under the transaction rule, and there was no error in the trial court's other acts jury instruction or in the court's assessment of the state's notice of intent to introduce evidence of other acts. Additionally, Crosley's counsel could not have provided ineffective assistance based on failure to object to admissible evidence. St. v. Crosley, 2009 MT 126, 350 M 223, 206 P3d 932 (2009). See also St. v. Lozon, 2004 MT 34, 320 M 26, 85 P3d 753 (2004).

Defendant's Probationary Status Considered Inadmissible Trial Evidence of Prior Crimes — New Trial Warranted: At Derbyshire's trial on drug charges, defense counsel moved to exclude any references to the fact that Derbyshire was on probation or that the drug search was conducted by probation officers. The trial court denied the motion and allowed references to probation but gave cautionary instructions prohibiting the jury from using the information to assume that Derbyshire was more likely to be guilty of the offense. Derbyshire was convicted and appealed on grounds that probation references should have been disallowed because they constituted inadmissible evidence of prior crimes. The state did not comply with the requirement of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), inasmuch as Derbyshire was never notified that evidence of other crimes would be introduced. However, the state asserted that the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103 and therefore not subject to the procedural requirements of Rule 404(b). The District Court agreed with the state's theory and reasoned that the involvement of probation officers was part of the whole transaction and that the officers' status as probation officers was relevant to why they had certain knowledge and why they acted the way they did. Derbyshire contended that specific roles and titles of the officers who gathered the evidence were immaterial to the ultimate issue of whether Derbyshire possessed a dangerous drug with intent to distribute. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant may not be convicted based on the inference that because he committed crimes in the past he was more likely to have committed the crime charged, and that evidence of Derbyshire's status as a probationer constituted evidence that Derbyshire committed other crimes and thus was generally inadmissible unless an exception such as the transaction rule applied. However, in this case the transaction rule was inapplicable. The officers' status as probation officers and Derbyshire's status as probationer were neither part of nor evidence of the disputed issue of whether Derbyshire possessed a dangerous drug, nor were they "evidence of what transgressed immediately prior and subsequent to the commission of the offense charged" or inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense. Therefore, the District Court erred in denying Derbyshire's motion to exclude evidence of his status as a probationer. Further, the error was considered trial error rather than structural error, and although not presumptively prejudicial, the error was subject to harmless error review. In this case, there was a reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to Derbyshire's conviction, and the state failed to show that, qualitatively, there was no possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to Derbyshire's conviction. Absent a showing that the error was harmless, the conviction was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 M 114, 201 P3d 811 (2009), applying the prejudicial error analysis from St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Michelotti, 2018 MT 158, 392 Mont. 33, 420 P.3d 1020.

Defendant's Earlier Behavior on Night in Question Admissible Under Transaction Rule Not Inadmissible as Evidence of Other Crimes: Mackrill argued that the jury verdict against him finding him guilty of aggravated assault should be dismissed because the state had introduced evidence of his inebriated and aggressive behavior in other bars previous to his assaulting an individual later that night. Mackrill argued that the evidence, including portions of his taped interview after his arrest, was inadmissible as evidence of other crimes and that the prosecution did not give him prior notice of its intent to use the evidence as required by Montana case law. The Supreme Court held that the notice requirement does not apply to evidence of matters that are inextricably linked to and explanatory of the offense; in the present case, the evidence was not wholly independent of or unrelated to the charged offense and therefore was not evidence of other crimes but was admissible under the transaction rule. St. v. Mackrill, 2008 MT 297, 345 M 469, 191 P3d 451 (2008).

Admissibility of Documents Held by Insurer When Adjusting Claim — Hearsay Exception Inapplicable: Plaintiffs asserted that defendant insurance company committed unfair trade practices in settling plaintiffs' claim against two insured doctors for malpractice. At trial, the District Court refused to admit as hearsay correspondence written to the insurer by plaintiffs' counsel during settlement negotiations, allowing the insurer to suggest that plaintiffs did not want or try to settle the malpractice claim. The Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion and committed reversible error by not admitting the correspondence. The unfair trade practices claims tested the propriety of actions taken or not taken by the insurer in light of information possessed by the insurer at the time that the underlying malpractice claim was adjusted, so the correspondence was not merely testimonial evidence subject to a hearsay objection in the absence of the author. Thus, the insurer could not block admission of documents held when adjusting the claim. Peterson v. The Doctors' Co., 2007 MT 264, 339 M 354, 170 P3d 459 (2007), followed in Lorang v. Fortis Ins. Co., 2008 MT 252, 345 M 12, 192 P3d 186 (2008).

Admissibility of Evidence of Drug Use Inseparably Related to Crime Charged: Buck was charged with deliberate homicide with a weapon and burglary. At trial, the prosecution sought to introduce evidence of Buck's drug use, and the evidence was allowed. Following conviction, Buck appealed on grounds that the evidence was irrelevant and did not meet the procedural requirements of the modified Just rule regarding other crimes, wrongs, or acts. However, an exception to the Just rule provides that, in association with the transaction rule in this section, evidence of acts that are inextricably or inseparably linked with the charged offense is admissible notwithstanding the substantive and procedural criteria of the modified Just rule. Buck's drug use was explanatory of the circumstances surrounding the charged offenses, so evidence of drug use was relevant and not precluded by the modified Just rule and was properly admitted. St. v.

Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006). See also St. v. Lozon, 2004 MT 34, 320 M 26, 85 P3d 753 (2004).

Sufficient Evidence of Attempted Obstruction of Peace Officer — Jury Properly Instructed Regarding Mental Standards of Offense: When she saw heavily armed officers approaching a neighbor's residence, Baker called the neighbor and left a recorded message that it would be in the neighbor's interests to peek out the window. The message was subsequently confiscated, and Baker was charged with and convicted of attempted obstruction of a police officer. On appeal, Baker challenged the use of evidence regarding the neighbor's history and arrest, the purpose and use of the high-risk unit in arresting the neighbor, and an officer's outrage at Baker's interference with the police, contending that the evidence was irrelevant and unfairly prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under the transaction rule set out in St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371 (1999), the trial court did not err in allowing the evidence because it enabled the jury to understand the circumstances surrounding the police activity and how Baker's interference could have affected the outcome. Baker also contested the jury instructions. Under 45-7-302, a person obstructs an officer when the person knowingly hinders the enforcement of the criminal law, so for a person to commit the offense of attempted obstruction, the person need only perform any act toward the commission of obstruction while aware of the fact that the person is performing the act. The instructions to the jury contained an explanation of the "knowingly" standard and multiple instructions on Baker's purpose for making the call and thus were a fair and full instruction on the law. The conviction was affirmed. St. v. Baker, 2004 MT 393, 325 M 229, 104 P3d 491 (2004).

Evidence of Defendant's Intoxication Following Arrest Admissible Under Transaction Rule: At McCaslin's trial for aggravated assault, assault, and assault with a weapon, the state introduced evidence of McCaslin's intoxication after arrest. McCaslin contended that the evidence was irrelevant and prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under the transaction rule, McCaslin's behavior following arrest was relevant as part of the transaction, and the jury had a right to hear evidence regarding McCaslin's behavior subsequent to arrest in order to provide context to the criminal act. St. v. McCaslin, 2004 MT 212, 322 M 350, 96 P3d 722 (2004). See also St. v. Detonancour, 2001 MT 213, 306 M 389, 34 P3d 487 (2001), and St. v. McLaughlin, 2009 MT 211, 351 M 282, 210 P3d 694 (2009).

Motion In Limine to Exclude Relevant Statements Made During and After Assault Properly Denied: During a bar fight, Brasda brandished a knife and stated that he would use it because he was not afraid to go back to prison. After the fight, Brasda stated to a deputy that he didn't try to stab anyone. At trial, Brasda made a motion in limine to suppress the statements on grounds that they were irrelevant to any fact at issue or, alternatively, that they were statements of other crimes or acts and inadmissible because no exception applied. The trial court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Both statements were clearly relevant and integral to the state's proof of the elements of the crime and to the jury's ability to evaluate witness testimony. Further, the statements were admissible under the mental, emotional, or physical condition exception to the hearsay rule and under the transaction rule in this section. The court also noted that under St. v. Bauer, 2002 MT 7, 308 M 99, 39 P3d 689 (2002), statements regarding a defendant's history or imprisonment and probationary status that are inextricably linked to circumstances surrounding the crime are admissible. Denial of the motion in limine was proper. St. v. Brasda, 2003 MT 374, 319 M 146, 82 P3d 922 (2003).

Certain Relevant Evidence of Defendant's Conduct Following Sexual Assault Properly Admitted Under Transaction Rule: Immediately following a sexual assault, defendant went into the victim's daughter's room, then came back into the living room wearing a pair of the daughter's panties. Prior to trial, defendant moved in limine to exclude this evidence, as well as evidence that he then masturbated in front of the victim while wearing the panties. The District Court granted defendant's motion excluding testimony about the alleged masturbation, but allowed testimony about the panties and allowed the panties into evidence. Defendant contended on appeal that allowing the evidence was prejudicial and designed to inflame the jury. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule in this section. The conduct occurred immediately after the assault and was intertwined with the crime and relevant as part of the transaction, plus the victim testified that the conduct made her fearful. The evidence was highly probative, and the jury had the right to evaluate the evidence in the context in which the crime occurred. St. v. Detonancour, 2001 MT 213, 306 M 389, 34 P3d 487 (2001).

Sexual Abuse and Violence Against Women Act — Limitation of Evidence of Inappropriate Touching of Another: Evert sought damages against Swick based on Swick's alleged sexual abuse and violation of the federal Violence Against Women Act of 1994 (42 U.S.C. 13981). The District Court excluded proffered testimony of Evert's sister that Swick had also sexually and physically abused her. Swick was ultimately acquitted. Evert asserted on appeal that her sister's testimony was admissible to show opportunity, identity, or absence of mistake, that it was part of the res gestae, and that it should have been allowed as rebuttal testimony. The Supreme Court found no issue of opportunity, identity, or mistake because Swick and Evert had lived together, so the opportunity for abuse clearly existed. Moreover, the sister's testimony did not fall within any of the hearsay exceptions in Rule 803, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The res gestae argument, when properly phrased in the context of the transaction rule, showed no evidence that Swick's contact with the sister involved part of the same transaction contained in Evert's complaint, a necessary element under this section. The Supreme Court also concluded that the testimony had no rebuttal value that would outweigh its prejudicial effect. The District Court correctly deduced that the evidence of other inappropriate touching was offered to impugn Swick's credibility and bolster Evert's credibility, which is not permitted under Rule 404, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), and the modified Just rule. The court properly exercised its discretion in weighing the probative value of the testimony against its prejudicial effect in limiting the sister's testimony to the allegations contained in the complaint and excluding the portion of her testimony regarding other acts. Evert v. Swick, 2000 MT 191, 300 M 427, 8 P3d 773, 57 St. Rep. 757 (2000).

Evidence of Victim's Statements as to Perpetrator of Crime Not Within Concept of Corpus Delicti or Res Gestae — Use of Terms "Corpus Delicti" and "Res Gestae" Discouraged: The Supreme Court extensively reviewed the use of the terms "corpus delicti" and "res gestae", examining definitions and the historical development of Montana case law referencing the concepts. Here, statements by the victim to family members and friends regarding her troubled relationship with her husband, were not within the bounds of the concept of the corpus delicti because they tended to establish the perpetrator of the crime, which is not an element of the corpus delicti, and should not have been admitted under that rule. The statements were also inadmissible under the concept of res gestae. However, the admission of the victim's statements was merely cumulative and constituted harmless error. The Supreme Court urged that these vague and imprecise terms not be used in the future and advised that the court will henceforth review claims of error in the admission of evidence by determining whether the evidence was admissible under some provision of the Montana Code Annotated or under the Montana Rules of Evidence. St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999), clarifying numerous Montana cases that have properly or improperly applied the concepts.

Admissibility of Victim Testimony as to Sexual Acts Committed by Nondefendants — Not Hearsay: The trial court allowed the victim to testify not only to the sexual acts committed by defendants but also to similar acts committed at about the same time by three other men not on trial. Defendants contended that the court abused its discretion in allowing the testimony because it was hearsay and violated the res gestae doctrine. However, the evidence was admissible because it was closely related to and explanatory of the offense and was therefore part of the transaction, as contemplated under this section. The testimony was not considered hearsay because the testimony of the other three men was not offered into evidence to prove the sexual acts. St. v. Wing, 264 M 215, 870 P2d 1368, 51 St. Rep. 223 (1994), followed, with regard to admissibility of evidence that is closely related to and explanatory of an offense, in St. v. Atkins, 277 M 103, 920 P2d 481, 53 St. Rep. 561 (1996), St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998), and St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999). Atkins was also followed in Hayworth. See also St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999).

Effect on Parol Evidence Rule: In a real estate listing contract dispute, the court held that this statute is an exception to the hearsay rule and cannot be used to admit evidence that would otherwise be inadmissible under the parol evidence rule. Payne v. Buechler, 192 M 311, 628 P2d 646, 38 St. Rep. 799 (1981).

Hearsay — No Applicable Exception: In a wrongful death action, the court properly refused admission of hearsay testimony from people who were not present at the time of the drowning and who attempted to testify to the approximate location where the deceased entered the water. Neither the "present sense impression" exception to the hearsay rule nor the "res gestae" rule operated in this case. Folda v. Bozeman, 177 M 537, 582 P2d 767, 35 St. Rep. 1019 (1978).

Distance and Time Between Transaction and Declaration: The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit an allegedly res gestae statement offered by plaintiff to show that defendant was driving too fast at the time of collision because the observation was made by a witness overtaken at least 6.5 miles short of the point of impact on better road conditions than existed at such point. Kudrna v. Comet Corp., 175 M 29, 572 P2d 183 (1977).

Proof of Other Offenses: Proof of other offenses was admissible to show guilty knowledge, motive, or intent, and discussion of the defendant's attitude toward a prior sentence was admissible to show the defendant's motive to have pending charges dismissed and his intent to influence a Deputy County Attorney's prosecutorial discretion. St. v. Hensley, 171 M 38, 554 P2d 745 (1976).

Res Gestae — As Dying Statement of Murder Victim: Witnesses' testimony that deceased identified defendant as the person who shot her, while inadmissible as a dying declaration for lack of a proper foundation, is admissible as part of the res gestae. Deceased made her oral statement identifying defendant while still lying on the floor grievously wounded; therefore, her mind was still laboring under the excitement aroused by the shooting, before there was time to reflect and fabricate. St. v. Caryl, 168 M 414, 543 P2d 389, 32 St. Rep. 1207 (1975).

Scope of Rule — Competency: This provision was not intended to embody the statement of a rule by which to determine the competency of declarations relative to a transaction but to be a mere direction that they must be considered competent when they are so connected with the main transaction as to form a part of it. Gunderson v. Brewster, 154 M 405, 466 P2d 589 (1970); Callahan v. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R.R., 47 M 401, 133 P 687 (1913).

Narrative of Future Intentions: Declaration by decedent that "I am buying a ranch and placing it in Bill's name until I get rid of my wife" was inadmissible in an action to establish a resulting trust since it was a narrative statement of future intentions and not a statement of present ownership. Platts v. Platts, 134 M 474, 334 P2d 722 (1959).

Admission Against Interest — Need Not Be Res Gestae: Where statements made by defendant tended to incriminate him, they were admissible as statements against interest regardless whether they were part of the res gestae. St. v. Allison, 122 M 120, 199 P2d 279 (1948).

Intent Shown by Declaration: Where the intention of a workman to aid in supporting his parents was an important fact in the matter of the parents' claim as his major dependents upon his death, the statement of a witness that decedent told him that he intended to send his next paycheck to his parents and thereafter every other check was admissible under this section as part of the res gestae, as evidence of the intent, and the Industrial Accident Board (now Workers' Compensation Court) was not warranted in rejecting the testimony as hearsay. Ross v. Indus. Accident Bd., 106 M 486, 80 P2d 362 (1938).

Declaration During Moment of Excitement: The declaration of a decedent, made in a building then on fire, that the smoke was caused by burning gas was admissible as a part of the res gestae, as an exception to the hearsay rule on the theory that it was made while the mind of the speaker was laboring under excitement and before there was time to reflect, thus rendering the solemnity of an oath unnecessary to give it probative value. Sellers v. Montana-Dakota Power Co., 99 M 39, 41 P2d 44 (1935).

Inadmissible Matters in Declaration — Insurance: While it is the general rule that where, in a personal injury action arising out of an automobile accident, the fact that defendant is protected by insurance against liability for damages may not be injected into the case by evidence or argument, evidence thereof may be admissible where it is a part of a conversation involving an admission of responsibility by defendant; thus where defendant, in answer to a query by plaintiff's husband, "What kind of driving was that?" replied that she was insured and that "the company will take care of me", the reply was admissible as an admission of negligence as well as a part of the res gestae. Tanner v. Smith, 97 M 229, 33 P2d 547 (1934), distinguished in Watkins v. Williamson, 132 M 46, 314 P2d 872 (1957).

CONTINUING COURSE OF CONDUCT

Explicit Photographs Inadmissible Under Transaction Rule: Sexually explicit photos that underscored the defendant's interest in the alleged victim and women in general provided context to the circumstances under which the offense occurred but were not evidence of facts in dispute and did not explain how the defendant had sexual intercourse without consent or committed sexual assault. As such, the Supreme Court concluded that the photos were not intrinsic to or inextricably intertwined with the charges and that the District Court erroneously admitted them under the transaction rule. St. v. Sage, 2010 MT 156, 357 Mont. 99, 235 P.3d 1284.

No Error in Admitting Evidence of Past Deviant Sexual Acts as Grooming for Future Sexual Abuse: At Marshall's trial for attempted sexual abuse of children, the trial court admitted evidence of Marshall's prior deviant sexual acts and comments over Marshall's objection that the prior acts were too spread out to constitute the same transaction and because the requirements of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), were not met. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was admissible as grooming, defined as the process of cultivating trust with a victim and gradually introducing sexual behaviors until reaching the point at which it is possible to perpetrate a sex crime against the victim. Thus, even though Marshall's prior acts may have been remote in time, grooming by definition must occur over a period of time, so the acts were inextricably linked to the charged offense. St. v. Marshall, 2007 MT 198, 338 M 395, 165 P3d 1129 (2007), followed in St. v. Bieber, 2007 MT 262, 339 M 309, 170 P3d 444 (2007), to the extent that evidence of defendant's legal acts was inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense and therefore admissible, notwithstanding the rules related to admissibility of evidence of other acts, and in St. v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 M 344, 220 P3d 640 (2009). See also St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Meeting of Decedent's Estate: Testimony, given by the executor of an estate and its attorney, of conversations had at a meeting of the persons interested in the estate and which culminated in a note given by way of settlement of a dispute was admissible under this section in an action on the note. Stagg v. Stagg, 96 M 573, 32 P2d 856 (1934).

Marital Relations: Where the question whether parties were husband and wife is at issue, their conduct during the entire time they cohabited is part of the res gestae; and whatever they did or said during that time, which sheds light upon the matter and aids in disclosing the relations they sustained toward each other, must be construed as part of the res gestae. Welch v. All Persons, 85 M 114, 278 P 110 (1929).

Preliminaries to Contract: In an action to recover a sum of money for communicating to the defendant valuable information about a mine, for which information the defendant promised to pay, whatever the defendant said and did, while engaged in one of the preliminary steps leading up to the consummation of the contract, without the doing of which there would have been no contract, is a part of the res gestae and is competent. McCrimmon v. Murray, 43 M 457, 117 P 73 (1911).

Agreement to Devise — Devisee Lived With Decedent: Where, in an action to enforce the performance of an agreement to devise, the evidence tended to show that the agreement was made by the deceased in consideration of the plaintiff's agreement to live with deceased and to render services and affection, the acts and declarations of deceased, made after the agreement and while plaintiff was living with him, were part of the res gestae and were admissible in evidence under this section. Burns v. Smith, 21 M 251, 53 P 742 (1898).

CRIMINAL ACTIONS

Text Messages Properly Admitted — Evidence Showing Conspiracy Involving Defendant Properly Admitted Under Coconspirator Exception — Probative Value Outweighed Danger of Unfair Prejudice — Statements Against Interest and Statements by Party Opponent — Defendant's Jury Instruction Regarding Reasonable Doubt Properly Refused. St. v. Wienke, 2022 MT 116, 409 Mont. 52, 511 P.3d 990.

Motion In Limine Proper — Evidence of Other Court Proceeding Irrelevant, Confusing, and Prejudicial: The defendant was charged in Justice's Court with 38 counts of outfitting without a license. The state filed a motion in limine to prevent the defendant from presenting evidence about a different court proceeding in which he was convicted of possession of drugs because the evidence was irrelevant, confusing, and prejudicial. The defendant argued that the evidence would help explain the circumstances of the charges. The Justice's Court granted the motion, and the District Court affirmed. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding that because the conviction occurred 3 years prior to the outfitting charges, no contemporaneous connection existed between the two proceedings. St. v. Keble, 2015 MT 195, 380 Mont. 69, 353 P.3d 1175.

Evidence of Other Offenses Not Inextricably Linked to Charged Offense — Absence of Showing That Admission of Evidence Harmless — Reversible Error: At the omnibus hearing on charges against Lacey of sexual intercourse without consent, the state indicated that it did not intend to introduce evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts as part of the case against Lacey. Nevertheless, the state subsequently sought to introduce evidence of other possible victims. Lacey objected, but the trial court held that the objection was untimely and that the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The evidence was not inextricably linked to the charged offense, so the transaction rule did not apply and the evidence was erroneously admitted. Because the state made no attempt to argue that the error was harmless, the evidence was considered prejudicial, warranting reversal. St. v. Lacey, 2010 MT 6, 355 Mont. 31, 224 P.3d 1247. See also St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 Mont. 215, 32 P.3d 735, and St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 Mont. 114, 201 P.3d 811.

Evidence of Other Theft and Property Damage and Threatening Note Admissible Under Transaction Rule: During defendant's trial for theft and burglary, the District Court allowed the introduction of evidence of a prior theft and property damage, as well as a threatening note, that defendant had been involved with earlier in the day. Defendant contended that the evidence related to other acts or crimes and should not have been admitted. However, the prior theft and property damage and the note were intertwined with the theft and burglary, and the jury was entitled to hear what had transgressed immediately prior to the commission of the crime charged, so the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule. St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004).

Statement Admitting Prior Drug Use Not Considered Evidence of Other Crimes — Admissibility of Statement Under Transaction Rule: When his probation officer searched Lozon's room early one morning, the officer discovered a vial that Lozon admitted contained methamphetamine, but Lozon would not say to whom the vial belonged. However, Lozon did admit taking methamphetamine the previous evening. When the state sought to admit Lozon's statement, Lozon objected on grounds that the statement constituted evidence of prior crimes and that because the state had not provided notice that the statement would be used and the purpose for the evidence, as required in Rule 404, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), it was inadmissible. The trial court admitted the statement under the transaction rule, and Lozon appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the transaction rule in this section, evidence of matters that are inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense is admissible, notwithstanding rules related to the admission of other crimes evidence, and when the evidence at issue is not wholly independent of or unrelated to the charged offense, it is not considered other crimes evidence for which notice of intent to introduce is required. Here, Lozon's statement established Lozon's knowledge and possession of drugs in his room shortly before the search, was closely related to the possession charge, and was therefore admissible. St. v. Lozon, 2004 MT 34, 320 M 26, 85 P3d 753 (2004), followed in St. v. Gittens, 2008 MT 55, 341 M 450, 178 P3d 91 (2008), and St. v. Hill, 2008 MT 260, 345 M 95, 189 P3d 1201 (2008).

Character Evidence Improperly Admitted — Harmless Error: Defendant was charged with manufacture of dangerous drugs and sex crimes. The drug charge was severed, and defendant was convicted. When the sex crimes came to trial, the District Court allowed evidence of defendant's drug use. Defendant contended that the evidence was improperly admitted as bad character evidence because the state failed to meet the procedural requirements of the modified Just rule. The state asserted that the evidence was not admitted as character evidence, but rather admitted pursuant to the transaction rule because the drug use explained the circumstances surrounding the alleged sex offenses. The Supreme Court held that although the challenged evidence may have been relevant to explain the transaction, the evidence was improperly admitted in this case because the District Court had earlier determined that the charges were sufficiently distinct to warrant separate trials, so admission of drug use evidence in the sex crimes trial somewhat undermined the benefit that defendant gained from the earlier granting of the request for severance. Having defended against the drug charges in the first trial, defendant was faced with the evidence again. However, the Supreme Court then went on to apply the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine if admission of the evidence prejudiced defendant's right to a fair trial and found that the error was harmless. The evidence of drug use did not go to the proof of an element of the sex crimes, and only brief mention was made of drug use in closing arguments and then only in conjunction with other admissible evidence related to the transaction. Thus, the impact of the tainted evidence was minimal, and given other ample evidence upon which the state could develop its case, there was no reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence contributed to the conviction, which was therefore affirmed. St. v. Insua, 2004 MT 14, 319 M 254, 84 P3d 11 (2004).

Facts Regarding Defendant's Prison Incarceration and Probationary Status Properly Admitted as Inextricably Linked to Circumstances Surrounding Incest Charge: At Bauer's incest trial, the District Court barred mention by the prosecution of Bauer's two prior felony convictions, but did rule that the fact of Bauer's lengthy prior prison incarceration and status as a probationer at the time of the incest were admissible as part of the transaction. Bauer contended on appeal that the incarceration and probation information were highly prejudicial and constituted evidence of other crimes that should have been admitted only after the appropriate notice under the Just rules. The state cited the transaction rule in this section, which provides that when a declaration, act, or omission forms part of a transaction that is itself the fact in dispute or evidence of that fact, then the declaration, act, or omission is admissible as part of the transaction. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. In order for the jury to understand the context of the alleged incest, the victim needed to explain that she had not known or seen her father because he had been incarcerated since she was a small child. Thus, the District Court acted conscientiously and within the bounds of reason in allowing the facts of Bauer's prison incarceration and probationary status into evidence. St. v. Bauer, 2002 MT 7, 308 M 99, 39 P3d 689 (2002).

Inflammatory Statements as Part of Same Transaction That Formed Basis of Criminal Offense Properly Admitted as Part of Res Gestae: Beavers contended that the trial court erred in admitting inflammatory statements made by a passenger in Beavers' car immediately after Beavers was stopped for speeding and just prior to his attempt to avoid arrest on an outstanding warrant. The Supreme Court held that the statements were properly admitted under the res gestae rule, along with the evidence of resisting arrest and the evidence of Beavers' felony warrant and classification as an escape risk, because they were part of the same transaction that included the acts that formed the basis of the underlying offense. Failure to admit the statements and evidence of flight would have left the jury with an incomplete picture of all the acts that transpired to result in the charge against Beavers. Relevance of the evidence outweighed any possible prejudice. St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999). See also St. v. Wing, 264 M 215, 870 P2d 1368, 51 St. Rep. 223 (1994).

Discussion of Intent to Kill Persons Other Than Those Assaulted Admissible as Part of Res Gestae, Transaction, or Corpus Delicti: Before Hayworth participated in shooting Bradford and Kunesh, Hayworth and another defendant discussed killing two men known as Tray and Big Rich. Hayworth tried to prevent testimony of his discussion with the other defendant from being given, but the District Court denied Hayworth's motion in limine and allowed the testimony. The Supreme Court held that the evidence of Hayworth's conversation about killing Tray and Big Rich was admissible, whether as part of the transaction, res gestae, or corpus delicti. St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Proof of Other Offenses: Proof of other offenses was admissible to show guilty knowledge, motive, or intent, and discussion of the defendant's attitude toward a prior sentence was admissible to show the defendant's motive to have pending charges dismissed and his intent to influence a Deputy County Attorney's prosecutorial discretion. St. v. Hensley, 171 M 38, 554 P2d 745 (1976).

Res Gestae — As Dying Statement of Murder Victim: Witnesses' testimony that deceased identified defendant as the person who shot her, while inadmissible as a dying declaration for lack of a proper foundation, is admissible as part of the res gestae. Deceased made her oral statement identifying defendant while still lying on the floor grievously wounded; therefore, her mind was still laboring under the excitement aroused by the shooting, before there was time to reflect and fabricate. St. v. Caryl, 168 M 414, 543 P2d 389, 32 St. Rep. 1207 (1975).

Complaint of Crime: In a prosecution for the crime against nature, the mother of the victim to whom the complaint was made could testify to that fact and state the time, place, and circumstances under which it was made but not what was said by the victim concerning the details of the crime. St. v. Shambo, 133 M 305, 322 P2d 657 (1958).

Applicability to Criminal Actions: Under the law of evidence, res gestae are the circumstances, facts, and declarations which grew out of the main fact, are contemporaneous with it, and serve to illustrate its character. St. v. Schlaps, 78 M 560, 254 P 858 (1927).

Condition of Victim's Body: Where husband and wife were murdered at about the same time and defendant was placed on trial for the killing of the wife, evidence as to the condition of the body of the husband was admissible as part of the res gestae. St. v. Schlaps, 78 M 560, 254 P 858 (1927), distinguished in St. v. Park, 88 M 21, 289 P 1037 (1930).

Victim Hospitalized — Identification of Defendant: Where a man was shot and afterward, in a hospital, identified the accused as the man who did the shooting, his testimony is admissible as touching a matter in issue, though no foundation was laid for it as a dying declaration. St. v. Fisher, 54 M 211, 169 P 282 (1917).

TIME BETWEEN TRANSACTION AND DECLARATION

Distance and Time Between Transaction and Declaration: The court did not abuse its discretion in refusing to admit an allegedly res gestae statement offered by plaintiff to show that defendant was driving too fast at the time of collision because the observation was made by a witness overtaken at least 6.5 miles short of the point of impact on better road conditions than existed at such point. Kudrna v. Comet Corp., 175 M 29, 572 P2d 183 (1977).

Between Beating and Death — Two-Day Span: Statements made by decedent to her neighbors to the effect that her husband had beaten her the previous evening and that morning and that she was anxious to leave the house were not part of the res gestae and not admissible in prosecution against husband for voluntary manslaughter where statements were made 12 to 13 hours after the alleged beating and decedent died nearly 24 hours later in a hospital as a result of a subarachnoid clot caused by external trauma. St. v. Newman, 162 M 450, 513 P2d 258 (1973).

Driver in Automobile Accident: In a negligence action by passenger of car struck by truck, testimony of truck driver concerning declarations of driver of automobile concerning speed at which he was traveling was admissible even though made some 10 minutes after collision. Blevins v. Weaver Constr. Co., 150 M 158, 432 P2d 378 (1967).

Details of Complaint of Criminal Act: In a prosecution for the crime against nature, it was error to permit the mother of the prosecuting witness to testify as to details of the crime as related by him when he complained to her, where there was no showing that the statement was made while in shock or immediately after the crime. St. v. Shambo, 133 M 305, 322 P2d 657 (1958).

Contemporaneous With Execution or Delivery of Documents: A statement made by plaintiff's alleged deceased grantor that "Mr. Poore has the papers" and that "they were in Mr. Poore's possession" was not contemporaneous with execution or delivery of the papers referred to, so was not admissible under this section. Wilson v. Davis, 110 M 356, 103 P2d 149 (1940).

Declarations Made Before Time to Reflect: While declarations, to be admissible as part of the res gestae, need not have been strictly contemporaneous with the main incident which gave rise to them, they must have been made while the mind of the speaker was laboring under the excitement aroused by the incident, before there was time to reflect and fabricate. Callahan v. Chicago, Burlington & Quincy R.R., 47 M 401, 133 P 687 (1913).

Later Discussion of Incident: In an action against a railroad company for the killing of livestock, the testimony of a witness that the section boss showed him where the animal was when struck and stated that after it was struck he killed it to end its sufferings was not admissible as res gestae. Poindexter & Orr Live Stock Co. v. Oreg. Short Line R.R., 33 M 338, 83 P 886 (1905).

26-1-104. Evidence of third person's obligation.

Case Notes

Judgment Roll as Evidence: Though the rights of one not made a party to an action are not affected by the resultant judgment, the judgment roll therein is admissible in a subsequent action, for the purpose of making out a prima facie case as to the rights of the party introducing it, in and to the subject matter of the action in which the judgment was entered. Sunburst Oil & Ref. Co. v. Callender, 84 M 178, 274 P 834 (1929).

26-1-106. Explanation of alterations in a writing.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Case Notes

Presumption of Authority — Alteration of Both Parties' Copies: Where plaintiff asserted that contract of sale was altered after its execution without his consent by adding to his name as vendee that of his wife, the trial court in weighing the evidence could properly indulge the presumption that the vendor, since deceased, was innocent of wrongdoing, i.e., that he would not have made the alteration without plaintiff's consent, the copies in both the hands of plaintiff and vendor containing the same alteration. Kern v. Eichhorn, 113 M 262, 124 P2d 311 (1942).

Criminal Cases — Alleged Alteration of Confession: Where alterations appeared in an alleged written confession of defendant charged with crime, it was incumbent upon the State, under this section, which is made applicable to criminal cases by 46-30-101, to account for them before it is admissible in evidence; in the instant case defendant testified that the writing was inaccurate. St. v. Crighton, 97 M 387, 34 P2d 511 (1934).

26-1-201. Questions of law.

Compiler's Comments

1983 Amendment: At beginning of section inserted exception clause; and at end of section, deleted "and all discussions of law addressed to it. Whenever the knowledge of the court is, by this code, made evidence of a fact, the court is to declare such knowledge to the jury, which is bound to accept it".

QUESTIONS OF LAW

Absent Disputed Facts, Liability in Takings Case Considered Question of Law for Court, Not Question of Fact for Jury: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court was presented with the issue of whether liability for a categorical or regulatory taking was a question of law to be decided by a court or a question of fact for a jury. While declining to adopt a bright-line rule regarding the role of the jury in the takings context, the court noted that given the primarily legal nature of takings inquiries, a jury determination should be required only in cases in which resolution of a factual dispute is necessary to determine whether a taking has occurred. In the present case, the District Court determined that the issue of takings liability was a question of law that, absent factual disputes, would be determined by the court, and that if liability was found, the question of damages would be presented to the jury. Under these particular circumstances, the District Court did not err in deciding the takings liability question without the presence of a jury. Buhmann v. St., 2008 MT 465, 348 M 205, 201 P3d 70 (2008).

Testimony of Chief of Police Concerning Legality of Traffic on Controlled Access Highway Properly Excluded: Plaintiffs sued the state for inverse condemnation and taking for constructing a highway improvement project that allegedly impaired access by large trucks to plaintiffs' business on a main street in Dillon. Plaintiffs asserted that the trial court improperly excluded evidence from the city Chief of Police regarding the illegality of maneuvering trucks on the reconstructed limited access highway. The Supreme Court found no error in the trial court's decision because all questions of law, including the admissibility of testimony and the rules of evidence, must be decided by the court. Williams Feed, Inc. v. St., 2007 MT 79, 336 M 493, 155 P3d 1228 (2007).

Sale of Automobile Franchise — Error in Failure to Resolve Mootness as Threshold Issue Before Underlying Dispute Addressed: Ford Motor Company (Ford) notified franchisee Shamrock Motors (Shamrock) that it intended to terminate Shamrock's automobile dealer franchise because Shamrock had sold 80% of its stock without Ford's knowledge or consent, which violated their franchise agreement. The Motor Vehicle Division of the Department of Justice issued a ruling that Ford had good cause, so Shamrock filed for judicial review in the District Court. Ford then removed to federal court, where the ruling was reversed, so Ford appealed to the Ninth Circuit Court. Shamrock then sold the dealership, and the decision was vacated because of lack of jurisdiction. The case was remanded to state court, where Ford moved to dismiss for mootness. The District Court denied the motion without discussion and ruled for Shamrock, concluding that the franchise could not be terminated as a result of the sale of 80% of the franchise stock. Reversing on appeal, the Supreme Court cited Adkins v. Livingston, 121 M 528, 194 P2d 238 (1948), in holding that mootness is a threshold issue that must be dealt with before the underlying dispute may be addressed. A matter is moot when, because of an event or happening, the issue has ceased to exist and no longer presents an actual controversy. A question is moot when a court cannot grant effective relief. If the parties cannot be restored to their original position, an appeal becomes moot. When Shamrock chose to sell the franchise during the appellate process, the question of whether Ford had good cause to terminate the franchise in the first instance became academic and thus moot. The District Court erred when it did not resolve the issue of mootness before addressing the merits of the claim, not recognizing that once Shamrock sold the dealership and was no longer the franchisee, there was no effective relief that the court could fashion under Title 61, ch. 4, part 2, so the appeal from the Motor Vehicle Division's ruling should have been dismissed as moot. Shamrock Motors, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 1999 MT 21, 293 M 188, 974 P2d 1150, 56 St. Rep. 99 (1999), followed in Shamrock Motors, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., 1999 MT 39, 293 M 317, 974 P2d 1154, 56 St. Rep. 164 (1999).

Constitution "Other Writing" — Compelling State Interest Analysis — Application of Strict Scrutiny Test — Questions of Law — Harmless Error: In a suit for wrongful discharge from employment, it was harmless error for the District Court to submit to the jury the question of whether the right that plaintiff asserted was a constitutionally protected right and, if constitutionally protected, whether it was a fundamental right and, if it was a fundamental right, whether the state provided a compelling interest for infringing upon it. Wadsworth v. St., 275 M 287, 911 P2d 1165, 53 St. Rep. 146 (1996).

Relevance of Evidence — Remoteness in Time: A trial court is not guided by fixed rules in determining whether evidence is too remote in time to be relevant. The nature of the evidence and the circumstances of the case control. For this reason the determination is left in great part to the discretion of the judge and is subject to review only in the event of manifest abuse. Preston v. McDonnell, 203 M 64, 659 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 297 (1983), followed in In re Marriage of Cole, 224 M 207, 729 P2d 1276, 43 St. Rep. 2136 (1986), and in In re Marriage of Starks, 259 M 138, 855 P2d 527, 50 St. Rep. 719 (1993).

Lesser Included Offense Instruction — When Required: Defendant, convicted of burglary and theft, alleged error in the failure to instruct the jury on the lesser included offense of criminal trespass. The Supreme Court noted the fundamental rule that the defendant is entitled to an instruction on a lesser included offense if the evidence would enable the jury rationally to find him guilty of a lesser offense and to acquit him of the greater. However, if the evidence is such to show that the defendant is either guilty of the offense charged or entitled to an acquittal, the District Court does not err by refusing to instruct as to the lesser included offense. Once the determination was made that the mobile home was an occupied structure within the meaning of the statute, the evidence was not in dispute and the defendant was either guilty of burglary or entitled to an acquittal. St. v. Kyle, 192 M 374, 628 P2d 260, 37 St. Rep. 1447 (1980).

Definition of "Occupied Structure" — Question of Law: Because the trial court judge determined that a furnished mobile home located on a sales lot was an "occupied structure" for the purposes of 45-6-204, he correctly denied defendant's motion for directed verdict on the burglary charge. St. v. Kyle, 192 M 374, 628 P2d 260, 37 St. Rep. 1447 (1980).

Questions of Statutory Construction — Court Determination: All questions of law, including the construction of statutes, are to be decided by the court and not by the jury. Therefore, it was not error for the court to refuse plaintiff's instruction regarding statutory construction. Stenberg v. Neel, 188 M 333, 613 P2d 1007, 37 St. Rep. 1170 (1980).

Judge to Instruct Jury on Law — Testimony of Constitutional Expert Excluded: The interpretation and application of the United States Constitution was a question of law and not a fact in issue in a prosecution for failure to file proper state tax returns. It was a determination to be made by the trial judge within his statutory powers. Instructing the jury on the law necessary for the jury's rendering of a verdict in a criminal case is a duty within the exclusive province of the trial judge. It was proper to exclude the testimony of an expert on the United States Constitution. St. v. Poncelet, 187 M 528, 610 P2d 698, 37 St. Rep. 760 (1980).

Interpretation of Lease: Interpretation of lease of building was matter for court in dispute between lessor and lessee. Solich v. Hale, 150 M 358, 435 P2d 883 (1967).

Corporate Business Activities: The determination whether an out-of-state publisher who advertised Montana land for sale was doing business in Montana within the purview of section 15-1701, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), or was carrying on the business of a real estate broker were questions of law under this section. Union Interchange, Inc. v. Parker, 138 M 348, 357 P2d 339 (1960), explained in Minnehoma Fin. Co. v. Van Oosten, 198 F. Supp. 200 (D.C. Mont. 1961).

ADMISSIBILITY

Attorney as Witness — Testimony as to Legal Opinions on Legal Issues: Defendant claimed on appeal that plaintiffs' former attorney testified as to ultimate legal issues in the case and his legal opinion on the law involved. In view of defendant's limited trial objection that the offer of an opinion may improperly invade the province of the jury in determining the facts in the case and in view of no objection that the attorney was testifying as to legal opinions, the court refused to find error in allowing the testimony. Baird v. Norwest Bank, 255 M 317, 843 P2d 327, 49 St. Rep. 1026 (1992).

Exhibit Not Linked to Event in Dispute — Notice Period Not Met — Exhibit Properly Excludable: Defendant attempted to introduce BB pellets as physical evidence that he did not fire in the direction of another person. The pellets were properly excluded as lacking probative value since no ballistics tests were conducted that would tie the pellets to the alleged weapon or the alleged time and place of the incident. Further, defendant attempted to introduce the exhibit as tangible evidence after the 30-day notice period set out in 46-15-323 and was unable to vouch for the exhibit to the trial court's satisfaction. St. v. Keup, 228 M 194, 741 P2d 1330, 44 St. Rep. 1451 (1987).

Expert — Duty to Determine Qualifications — Relevance of Degree of Qualifications: Whether a witness is an expert is largely within the discretion of the trial judge. Defendant objected that a witness was not qualified. The trial judge said: "The court is going to permit her to testify. If the jury doesn't believe she is qualified—well, that will be up to the jury to decide". The judge did not leave to the jury the decision whether the witness was qualified. He made that decision when he permitted the testimony and then stated that the jury could determine the degree of the qualifications. The degree of qualification affects the weight, not the admissibility, of the testimony. St. v. Berg, 215 M 431, 697 P2d 1365, 42 St. Rep. 518 (1985), followed in St. v. Martin, 226 M 463, 736 P2d 477, 44 St. Rep. 804 (1987), and in St. v. Baker, 249 M 156, 815 P2d 587, 48 St. Rep. 685 (1991).

Evidence Admitted Pertaining to Charge Later Dismissed — Jury Instructed to Disregard: Defendant was charged with deliberate homicide and with conspiracy to commit homicide. The conspiracy charge was dismissed at the close of the State's case. The District Court instructed the jury to consider only the evidence pertaining to the charge of deliberate homicide and to disregard evidence pertaining to the conspiracy charge. Such an instruction is presumed to cure any error that may have been committed by the introduction of evidence pertaining to the conspiracy charge. St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368, 36 St. Rep. 1622 (1979).

Sound Recorded Evidence: In order for sound recordings to be admissible into evidence there must be showing of: (1) the capability of the recording device; (2) the competency of the operator; (3) the authenticity of the recording; (4) the fact that no changes or deletions have been made; (5) the manner of the preservation of the recording; and (6) the identification of the speakers. St. v. Smith, 164 M 334, 523 P2d 1395 (1974).

Dying Declaration — Admissibility by Judge — Weight by Jury: The question whether a dying declaration is admissible is one for the court's decision after hearing preliminary proof concerning the condition of the declarant and the circumstances surrounding the making of the statement, whereupon, if admitted, the question of its sufficiency and the weight to be given it is for the jury's determination; hence refusal to submit instructions stating the rule governing the admission of such declarations was not error. St. v. Vetter, 76 M 574, 248 P 179 (1926).

Witnesses Capacity to Testify: The orthodox division of function between judge and jury allots, without question, to the judge the determination of all matters of fact on which the admissibility of evidence depends and therefore of the facts of a witness' capacity to testify. St. v. Newman, 66 M 180, 213 P 805 (1923).

Confession — Circumstances Under Which Made: The question of the admissibility of a confession, alleged to have been made by defendant while in custody, is to be determined by the court after hearing evidence, in the presence of the jury, relative to the circumstances under which it was made, and its finding thereon will not be disturbed on appeal unless clearly against the weight of the evidence. St. v. Berberick, 38 M 423, 100 P 209 (1909).

Admission — Jury Not to Decide Admissibility: It is error to submit the question of the admissibility of an admission to the jury, and testimony relative thereto taken before the court sitting without the jury will not be examined on appeal. St. v. Sherman, 35 M 512, 90 P 981 (1907), overruling St. v. Tighe, 27 M 327, 71 P 3 (1903). See also Territory v. McClin, 1 M 394 (1871), and Territory v. Underwood, 8 M 131, 19 P 398 (1888).

26-1-202. Questions of fact.

Compiler's Comments

1983 Amendment: At end of first sentence concerning trial by jury, changed "this code" to "law"; inserted last sentence concerning trial of a question of fact not by jury; and made minor changes in style and phraseology.

Case Notes

Absent Disputed Facts, Liability in Takings Case Considered Question of Law for Court, Not Question of Fact for Jury: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court was presented with the issue of whether liability for a categorical or regulatory taking was a question of law to be decided by a court or a question of fact for a jury. While declining to adopt a bright-line rule regarding the role of the jury in the takings context, the court noted that given the primarily legal nature of takings inquiries, a jury determination should be required only in cases in which resolution of a factual dispute is necessary to determine whether a taking has occurred. In the present case, the District Court determined that the issue of takings liability was a question of law that, absent factual disputes, would be determined by the court, and that if liability was found, the question of damages would be presented to the jury. Under these particular circumstances, the District Court did not err in deciding the takings liability question without the presence of a jury. Buhmann v. St., 2008 MT 465, 348 M 205, 201 P3d 70 (2008).

Error in Exclusion of Evidence of Stress-Provoking Event Other Than Accident in Determining Loss of Established Course of Life: Maurer was injured in a car accident, after which he was depressed. This depression led him to leave the family ranch and contributed to his "course of life" damages. Defendants should have been allowed to introduce evidence of another stress-provoking incident that occurred about the same time and could have contributed to Maurer's depression.

The incident involved the injury of Maurer's girlfriend, criminal charges against Maurer, and his subsequent trial and acquittal on felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charges. The link between the incident and Maurer's depression was self-evident, and the jury should have been allowed to consider evidence of the incident from a common sense viewpoint to determine to what degree, if any, the stress from the incident contributed to Maurer's loss of established course of life. The probative value of evidence of the incident was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial nature. Maurer v. Clausen Distrib. Co., 275 M 229, 912 P2d 195, 53 St. Rep. 78 (1996).

Jury Trial — ERISA Action: A jury trial is appropriate when suit is brought in state court based on a breach of contract claim under ERISA to recover benefits under a group health insurance plan when issues of fact are controverted. Head v. Cent. Reserve Life of N. America Ins. Co., 256 M 188, 845 P2d 735, 50 St. Rep. 20 (1993).

Conclusion Through Evidence and Instructions That Mental State Existed for Conviction of Felony Attempted Theft: Given the evidence and instructions presented to the jury, it could reasonably conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had the requisite mental state for conviction of felony attempted theft. When the evidence, viewed in a light most favorable to the prevailing party, permits a rational trier of fact to find the essential elements of a crime, the Supreme Court will not reverse the conviction. St. v. Johnstone, 244 M 450, 798 P2d 978, 47 St. Rep. 1715 (1990).

Aggravating Circumstances Related to Sentencing — Jury Determination Not Required: Defendant argued that the aggravating circumstances with which the trial court justified the death penalty were equivalent to a finding of malice and that he was therefore entitled to have a jury determine facts constituting the aggravating circumstances. The Supreme Court held that defendant was not entitled to a jury determination because the aggravating circumstances were related to sentencing only and were not elements of the crime charged. Capital sentencing procedures do not require jury participation. St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988).

Evidence — When Sufficient to Support Verdict: Plaintiff appealed from jury verdict in favor of defendant, alleging the evidence did not support the verdict. The Supreme Court held that in order to overturn the verdict on the basis of insufficient evidence, it must find plaintiff entitled to judgment as a matter of law, and that there was insufficient evidence to warrant submitting the case to a jury. Here the court found credible evidence supporting a verdict either way and considered itself without power to set aside the decision of the trier of fact as a matter of law. The District Court properly denied plaintiff's motions for directed verdict and judgment notwithstanding the verdict. Gunlock v. W. Equip. Co., 219 M 112, 710 P2d 714, 42 St. Rep. 1882 (1985), followed in Weinberg v. Farmers St. Bank of Worden, 231 M 10, 752 P2d 719, 45 St. Rep. 391 (1988).

Conflicting Evidence Resolved by Jury — Substantial Evidence to Support Verdict: Where the plaintiff brought a negligence action against the defendant for injuries sustained at an outdoor beer party when the defendant allegedly tossed a large rock that struck the plaintiff on the head, the Supreme Court found that there was substantial evidence to support the jury's verdict for the defendant. The evidence was equally supportive of the defendant's theory (that the plaintiff tripped and fell) as it was of the plaintiff's theory. The court held that if there is conflicting evidence in the record, the credibility and weight given to that evidence is the province of the jury and not the Supreme Court. Anderson v. Jacqueth, 205 M 493, 668 P2d 1063, 40 St. Rep. 1451 (1983). See also Wheeler v. Bozeman, 232 M 433, 757 P2d 345, 45 St. Rep. 1173 (1988), Stewart v. Fisher, 235 M 432, 767 P2d 1321, 46 St. Rep. 116 (1989), and Young v. Horton, 259 M 34, 855 P2d 502, 50 St. Rep. 662 (1993).

Conflicting Testimony — Substantial Credible Evidence — Sufficiency of Verdict: Plaintiff alleged defendant negligently failed to close a farm gate when returning a tractor to plaintiff, allowing plaintiff's horses to escape onto a highway where they were subsequently killed. Plaintiff's wife testified that defendant had admitted leaving a gate open. Defendant disputed this. Two boys who had accompanied the defendant testified that he had closed the gate. The Supreme Court held, on appeal, that there was substantial credible evidence to support the jury finding for defendant, and it refused to overturn the verdict on the basis of insufficiency. Brogan v. Blanchard, 200 M 399, 650 P2d 1390, 39 St. Rep. 1829 (1982).

Aggravated Assault — Sufficiency of Circumstantial Evidence: An aggravated assault appeal was sustained for the state despite the fact that no eyewitness testified that the defendant stabbed the victim and that the weapon was never found because the circumstances surrounding the assault, including the defendant striking the victim in the area in which he was stabbed and the actions of the defendant prior to and following the assault, were sufficient to support a conviction viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution aided by a strong presumption in favor of the correctness of the judgment. St. v. Lozeau, 200 M 261, 650 P2d 789, 39 St. Rep. 1729 (1982), followed in St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992).

Jury Discretion to Award Exemplary Damages: In awarding exemplary damages a jury may consider such attendant circumstances as the malice or wantonness of an act and the motive for an act and thus has discretion, without being in the realm of passion and prejudice, to calculate a punishment for defendant's actions after listening to the testimony and weighing the evidence. Lauman v. Lee, 192 M 84, 626 P2d 830, 38 St. Rep. 499 (1981).

Evidence Sufficient to Support Verdict — Jury to Weigh Evidence — Presumption of Correctness: In judging whether there is evidence sufficient to support a verdict, the Supreme Court recognizes that the jury is in the best position to weigh the evidence and consider the credibility of witnesses. Thus, in examining the sufficiency of the evidence, review will be made in a light most favorable to the prevailing party, presuming that the findings of the District Court are correct. Rock Springs Corp. v. Pierre, 189 M 137, 615 P2d 206, 37 St. Rep. 1378 (1980).

Polygraph Test Results: The results of a polygraph test regarding a friend's understanding of the defendant's intentions and actions were correctly denied admissibility by the trial court because Montana does not recognize the admissibility of polygraph test results in criminal actions. Because the friend's testimony could be made to the jury, as the trier of facts, the use of polygraph test results going to the credibility of the witness was properly for the jury, not the polygraph operator to determine thus the use of the polygraph test was not scientific evidence used to assist the trier of fact to understand the evidence or determine a fact in issue under Rule 702, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470, 37 St. Rep. 1098 (1980).

Mental State (Intent) — Theft: Where intent is necessary in the commission of a crime, it may be proved by circumstances and by the action of the party at the time. The question of intent is a question for the jury. It may be inferred by them from what the accused does and says and from all the facts and circumstances involved in the transaction. One will be held accountable for the logical and ordinary consequences resulting from his acts. Where defendant admitted knowing the property was "hot" and displayed furtive actions in the presence of such property, he acted with purpose and knowledge to sustain a felony theft conviction. St. v. Jackson, 180 M 195, 589 P2d 1009, 36 St. Rep. 169 (1979).

Credibility and Weight of Evidence: Under this section the court may not invade the province of the jury when the verdict is supported by substantial evidence. The credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given their testimony are questions for determination by the jury. The verdict in the case at bar being supported by substantial evidence, the Supreme Court is thereby precluded as to the issues of fact. Gilmore v. Mulvihill, 109 M 601, 98 P2d 335 (1940).

Criminal Cases: This section is applicable to both civil and criminal cases. St. v. Sherman, 35 M 512, 90 P 981 (1907).

26-1-203. Who to judge effect and value of evidence.

Compiler's Comments

1983 Amendment: In first sentence concerning jury as judge of effect and value of evidence, before "is the judge", deleted "in the cases specified in this code" and substituted "effect and value" for "effect or value"; and inserted last sentence concerning court as judge of effect and value of evidence.

Case Notes

Limited Scope of Supreme Court Review of Jury Verdict: The Supreme Court's scope of review of a jury verdict is very limited, and the court will not reverse a jury verdict that is supported by substantial credible evidence. It is within the province of the jury to determine the weight and credibility afforded to the evidence, and it is not the court's function to agree or disagree with the jury's verdict. The Supreme Court will view evidence in the light most favorable to the prevailing party. Byers v. Cummings, 2004 MT 69, 320 M 339, 87 P3d 465 (2004). See also Magart v. Schank, 2000 MT 279, 302 M 151, 13 P3d 390 (2000), and Satterfield v. Medlin, 2002 MT 260, 312 M 234, 59 P3d 33 (2002).

Standard of Review of Refusal to Issue Proposed Jury Instruction: The standard of review of a District Court's refusal to issue a proposed jury instruction is whether the court abused its discretion. In reviewing for abuse of discretion, the Supreme Court does not determine whether it agrees with the District Court, but rather whether the District Court abused its discretion by acting arbitrarily without employment of conscientious judgment or by exceeding the bounds of reason in view of all the circumstances. Byers v. Cummings, 2004 MT 69, 320 M 339, 87 P3d 465

(2004). See also Finstad v. W.R. Grace & Co., 2000 MT 228, 301 M 240, 8 P3d 778 (2000), and Schuff v. A.T. Klemens & Son, 2000 MT 357, 303 M 274, 16 P3d 1002 (2000).

Failure to Give Unsupported Accountability Jury Instruction Proper: Hall contended that the District Court erred in refusing to give an accountability instruction in Hall's trial for theft because certain evidence at the crime scene implicated that a witness was an accomplice in the crime, so the jury should have been instructed that the witness's testimony should be viewed with distrust. The Supreme Court disagreed. In this case, the accomplice instruction was inconsistent with Hall's theory of complete innocence, and the witness's testimony established no element of accountability. It is not proper to give an accountability instruction when it is not supported by the evidence and is inconsistent with a defendant's claim of innocence. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Evidence Supporting Jury's Verdict of Zero Damages for Lost Earning Capacity Resulting From Automobile Accident: Magart was injured in a collision with Schank, who admitted negligently causing the accident. The case proceeded to jury trial on the issue of damages, and the jury awarded damages for everything except Magart's claim for lost earning capacity. Magart appealed, arguing that that portion of the verdict was not supported by substantial evidence and that the jury was required to find a loss of earning capacity because uncontroverted expert testimony at trial established that Magart suffered continuing shoulder problems because of his job duties that rendered him unable to continue his employment as a result of the injury. As a general rule, a jury may not disregard uncontradicted, credible nonopinion evidence, but this rule applies only to nonopinion lay witness testimony, and a jury may disregard expert testimony if it finds the testimony unpersuasive. In this case, the jury could reasonably have determined that future deterioration of Magart's shoulder, together with a concomitant inability to perform his job, was not reasonably certain to occur. Further, lay testimony from Magart's former employers implied that the shoulder injury did not impair the ability to perform the job and that Magart left employment not because of the injury but rather to accept different employment. This evidence, coupled with Schank's 23-minute videotape of Magart performing his current job without apparent difficulties, was sufficient to support the jury's verdict of zero damages for loss of earning capacity with regard to past and present employment. Magart v. Schank, 2000 MT 279, 302 M 151, 13 P3d 390, 57 St. Rep. 1167 (2000), distinguishing Tappan v. Higgins, 240 M 158, 783 P2d 396 (1989).

Judging Inconsistencies in Circumstantial Evidence: It is for the jury, not the judge on a motion for acquittal, to judge inconsistencies in circumstantial evidence. When the evidence is susceptible of an interpretation supporting guilt and an interpretation supporting acquittal, the jury determines which is most reasonable. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Imprecision of Expert Opinion — Relates to Weight of Evidence, Not Admissibility: An expert witness testified that shoe prints found at the scene of a crime were exactly like the defendant's shoes, but that he could not positively identify the defendant's shoes as making the shoe prints. The Supreme Court dismissed the defendant's contention that unless the expert could positively identify the prints to a degree of scientific certainty, the testimony should be inadmissible. The Supreme Court said that relevance means having a tendency to make a fact more or less probable than it would have been without the testimony, and this testimony linked the defendant to the scene of the crime. Any imprecision of expert opinion goes to the weight of evidence, not admissibility. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Any Evidence Consistent With Theory of Innocence — Jury Not Bound to Acquit: Because of the presumption of innocence, the defendant contended that the jury must accept his interpretation of facts in a criminal trial when testimony at trial could reasonably be interpreted to support either the State's or defendant's view. A jury is not bound to accept defendant's view and reject State's view simply because the defendant would be found not guilty under the former and guilty under the latter. It is the duty of the jury to resolve conflicts of evidence. St. v. Greenwell, 206 M 233, 670 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1616 (1983).

Criminal Mental State — Jury Question: Whether a defendant acted with the requisite mental state is a question for the jury, and because a state of mind is rarely susceptible of direct or positive proof, it must usually be inferred from the facts testified to by witnesses and the circumstances as developed by the evidence. St. v. Greenwell, 206 M 233, 670 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1616 (1983).

Conflicting Evidence Resolved by Jury — Substantial Evidence to Support Verdict: Where the plaintiff brought a negligence action against the defendant for injuries sustained at an outdoor beer party when the defendant allegedly tossed a large rock that struck the plaintiff on the head, the Supreme Court found that there was substantial evidence to support the jury's verdict for the defendant. The evidence was equally supportive of the defendant's theory (that the plaintiff tripped and fell) as it was of the plaintiff's theory. The court held that if there is conflicting evidence in the record, the credibility and weight given to that evidence is the province of the jury and not the Supreme Court. Anderson v. Jacqueth, 205 M 493, 668 P2d 1063, 40 St. Rep. 1451 (1983). See also Wheeler v. Bozeman, 232 M 433, 757 P2d 345, 45 St. Rep. 1173 (1988), Stewart v. Fisher, 235 M 432, 767 P2d 1321, 46 St. Rep. 116 (1989), and St. v. Barrack, 267 M 154, 882 P2d 1028, 51 St. Rep. 983 (1994).

Aggravated Assault — Sufficiency of Evidence: An aggravated assault appeal was sustained for the state despite the fact that no eyewitness testified that the defendant stabbed the victim and that the weapon was never found because the circumstances surrounding the assault, including the defendant striking the victim in the area in which he was stabbed and the actions of the defendant prior to and following the assault, were sufficient to support a conviction viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution aided by a strong presumption in favor of the correctness of the judgment. St. v. Lozeau, 200 M 261, 650 P2d 789, 39 St. Rep. 1729 (1982), followed in St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992).

Alibi Defense: Defendant's presentation of alibi defense did not entitle him to reversal as a matter of law. Jury could believe alibi witnesses and still determine that witnesses did not fully account for defendant's time. St. v. Maxwell, 198 M 498, 647 P2d 348, 39 St. Rep. 1149 (1982).

Credibility of Witnesses — Conflicts of Evidence:

In prosecution for sexual intercourse without consent, inconsistencies in victim's prior statements did not render her testimony incredible as a matter of law. St. v. Maxwell, 198 M 498, 647 P2d 348, 39 St. Rep. 1149 (1982).

The jury is to judge the credibility of witnesses and it is its province to decide conflicts in the evidence, and unless the testimony of the prevailing party is characterized by such inherent improbability as in effect to destroy it, the Supreme Court will not interfere. Callan v. Hample, 73 M 321, 236 P 550 (1925).

The jury members, in the first instance, are the exclusive judges of the credibility of a witness and of the weight to be given to his testimony. Bowen v. Webb, 37 M 479, 97 P 839 (1908).

Instruction That Witness Will Not Change Pretrial Identification: Whether a witness is likely or unlikely to change his mind from a previous identification is a question for the jury, not the courts, to determine as a matter of law; thus an instruction which suggests that once a witness makes a pretrial photographic identification he will not change this identification is properly withheld from a jury by a judge. St. v. Strain, 190 M 44, 618 P2d 331, 37 St. Rep. 763 (1980).

Evidence Susceptible to Two Conclusions — Jury Upheld: The Supreme Court does not substitute its view of the evidence for that of the jury; thus when the evidence furnishes reasonable grounds for different conclusions, the finding of the jury will not be disturbed. Rock Springs Corp. v. Pierre, 189 M 137, 615 P2d 206, 37 St. Rep. 1378 (1980).

Evidence Susceptible to Two Constructions — Criminal Action: Defendant's offered instruction would have instructed the jury that if the evidence is susceptible to two constructions, one consonant with guilt and the other consonant with innocence, it is the jury's duty to adopt the interpretation that is consonant with innocence. The District Court properly refused to give this instruction. That instruction is generally given where the State relies on circumstantial or indirect evidence to prove its case. The instruction has no application where the evidence is direct with respect to the crime charged. St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368, 36 St. Rep. 1622 (1979), followed in St. v. Ryan, 229 M 7, 744 P2d 1242, 44 St. Rep. 1735 (1987).

Jury to Resolve Conflicts in Evidence: Where the jury has before it all the elements of the conflict, it is entitled to consider the evidence for both sides and to make its decision thereon. The resolution of conflicts in the evidence by the jury is binding upon the appellate court unless the testimony on which the decision depends is so inherently improbable or transparent or so contradictory to other testimony in the case as to deny such testimony all claims to belief. In this medical malpractice case, the jury had before it conflicting expert testimony and was entitled to make its decision thereon. Frisnegger v. Gibson, 183 M 57, 598 P2d 574, 36 St. Rep. 1335 (1979).

Effect of Uncontradicted Evidence: Where there is direct testimony in the record, uncontradicted by other direct testimony, a court or jury is not bound thereby and can render a decision contrary to such direct testimony based on adverse circumstantial evidence. Holenstein v. Andrews, 166 M 60, 530 P2d 476 (1975).

Weighing Evidence — Jury Instructions:

The propriety of submitting instructions to the jury based upon the rules prescribed by this section for weighing evidence is a matter addressed to the trial court, and its determination is subject to review only for abuse of discretion; ordinarily an instruction in the words of 26-1-302 is sufficient. St. v. Sedlacek, 74 M 201, 239 P 1002 (1925).

In instructing the jury as to the manner in which they should exercise their power of judging the effect of evidence, the court should be guided by the provisions of this section, which are authoritative and sufficient. Murray v. Butte, 51 M 258, 151 P 1051 (1915).

Weighing Testimony of Police: An instruction, requested by defendant to the effect that, in weighing the testimony given by police officers and detectives, the jury should exercise greater care than in the case of other witnesses because of the natural and unavoidable tendency and bias of such persons to construe everything as evidence against the accused and disregard all matters which did not tend to support their preconceived opinions of the case, was properly refused as, if given, it would have invaded the province of the jury. St. v. Paisley, 36 M 237, 92 P 566 (1907).

Part 3

Weight and Effect of Evidence

Part Case Notes

Defendant's Testimony That Conflicts With State's Evidence Not Sufficient to Set Aside Guilty Verdict: Barrack argued that there was insufficient evidence to support his conviction in an assault case in light of his argument that he had used justified force. The Supreme Court held that the fact that Barrack's testimony conflicted with that of the state's witnesses did not render the evidence insufficient to support a conviction. St. v. Barrack, 267 M 154, 882 P2d 1028, 51 St. Rep. 983 (1994), following St. v. Sorenson, 190 M 155, 619 P2d 1185 (1980), and St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106 (1992).

Negligent Suppression of Evidence — Harmless Error: In an appeal involving the negligent suppression of evidence, the court agreed with appellant that the state acted improperly in suppressing four taped witness statements during discovery and a possibly incriminating statement made by appellant during his arrest and in endorsing an additional witness on the first day of trial. However, the court found that the suppressed evidence was either repetitive of other testimony or minimally supportive of a self-defense theory, and that since the defense knew of the additional witness' connection with and importance in the case, it could not convincingly claim surprise at the endorsement. Therefore, all errors were held to be harmless and not grounds for reversal. St. v. Wallace, 223 M 454, 727 P2d 520, 43 St. Rep. 1908 (1986), followed, with regard to application of the harmless error rule to admissibility of hearsay testimony, in St. v. Alexander, 265 M 192, 875 P2d 345, 51 St. Rep. 474 (1994).

Evidence as a Whole to Be Considered — Not Individual Pieces: Armstrong contended that the state's evidence is not sufficient to find him guilty of deliberate homicide, and he points out individual pieces of evidence that tend to indicate his innocence. The Supreme Court, however, finds that the jury had other evidence to consider and when all the evidence is considered, it is consistent with his guilt and inconsistent with his innocence. The Supreme Court finds no fault with the jury verdict based on the evidence. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341, 37 St. Rep. 1563 (1980).

Supreme Court as Final Authority: The Supreme Court of Montana is the final authority on the legal weight to be given a presumption instruction under Montana law, but it is not the final authority on the interpretation which a jury could have given to the instruction. Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Perjury	32

GENERAL APPLICATION OF SECTION

District Court Denial of Proposed Jury Instruction on Sixth Amendment of U.S. Constitution — No Abuse of Discretion: A trooper observed a vehicle that appeared to be speeding, activated radar, and checked the speed at 80 miles an hour in a 65-mile-an-hour zone. The trooper issued the driver of the vehicle a citation for speeding. The trooper was unaccompanied and the radar gun did not produce a printout of the speed reading. The driver proposed that the text of the sixth amendment to the United States Constitution be included as a jury instruction because the text includes a right to "be confronted with the witnesses against him" in the plural. The District Court denied the instruction, having already ruled as a matter of law that one witness is sufficient to prove any fact. The Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the District Court did not abuse its discretion. St. v. French, 2018 MT 289, 393 Mont. 364, 431 P.3d 332.

No Reasonable Grounds to Believe Defendant DUI — Sole Testimony of Defendant Sufficient to Prove No DUI Occurred: Eustance drove to the airport to pick up his daughter and grandson who were arriving on a flight. Because of hip pain, it was more comfortable to wait in his car. Eustance parked in the lot of a nearby car rental agency and fell asleep. Eustance was later awakened by a Deputy Sheriff who requested that Eustance perform field sobriety tests and a breath test, but Eustance refused to perform both tests, so his license was seized and suspended. At a hearing on a petition for reinstatement of his license, Eustance was the only witness. He testified that he had been operating his vehicle in a safe and legal manner prior to arrest, that his ability to drive was not impaired, and that he did not believe there was reasonable suspicion or probable cause to justify his arrest. The District Court agreed and granted the petition reinstating the license. On appeal, the state cited Hunter v. St., 264 M 84, 869 P2d 787 (1994), contending that Eustance had not met the burden of establishing that suspension of the license was improper because without the deputy's testimony, Eustance's own testimony was self-serving and insufficient to meet the burden. The Supreme Court disagreed. The testimony of one witness is sufficient to prove any fact. Nowhere in Hunter was it held that a petitioner in a license reinstatement hearing cannot meet the burden of proof without testimony from the arresting officer or that a petitioner's testimony, without more, is insufficient to meet the burden of proof. Thus, the District Court was entitled to accept Eustance's uncontradicted testimony as true. Absent evidence supporting the state's position, Eustance met the burden of proof and his license was properly reinstated. Eustance v. St., 2005 MT 34, 326 M 77, 107 P3d 478 (2005).

Criminal Trespass — Testimony Sufficient to Support Conviction — Testimony of One Witness Sufficient: Gladue was charged with criminal trespass after he was found to be in a home in which he had previously lived with Joyce Nanini but was no longer welcome. The only prosecution witness to testify at trial on the issue of the trespass was Nanini, who testified that Gladue had lived there previously but was not living there at the time that the trespass occurred, that Gladue was unwelcome in her home at the time that the trespass occurred, that she had asked the County Attorney to keep Gladue away from her, that she did not give Gladue permission to be in her home, and that she did not know how Gladue gained entrance to the home. The Supreme Court, citing St. v. Flack, 260 M 181, 860 P2d 89 (1993), and this section, held that the testimony of Nanini alone was sufficient for the purposes of the conviction, even though Gladue had testified in a manner somewhat contrary to the testimony of Nanini and testified that Nanini had given him a key to the home. Because the testimony indicated that Gladue did not have permission from Nanini to enter the home and the criminal trespass statute prohibits both unlawful entry and remaining unlawfully, the Supreme Court declined to consider whether the evidence showed that Gladue remained unlawfully in the home. St. v. Gladue, 1999 MT 1, 293 M 1, 972 P2d 827, 56 St. Rep. 1 (1999).

Court May Expect Corroboration of Self-Serving Testimony: Welch argued that the lower court erred in using his 1992 income tax return to determine his income for child support purposes when he had testified that his 1993 income was significantly less. The Supreme Court held that although the testimony of one witness is generally sufficient to establish a fact, a court may legitimately expect the witness to corroborate self-serving testimony, which Welch had failed to do. In re Marriage of Welch, 273 M 497, 905 P2d 132, 52 St. Rep. 1081 (1995).

Question of Witness Credibility — Summary Judgment Improper: Where credibility, including that of defendant, is crucial, summary judgment becomes improper and a trial indispensable. Morrow v. FBS Ins. Montana-Hoiness LaBar, Inc., 230 M 262, 749 P2d 1073, 45 St. Rep. 188 (1988), following Arnstein v. Porter, 154 F2d 464 (2nd Cir. 1946).

Sufficiency to Prove Contributory Negligence of Decedent: When the defendant testified that the plaintiff's decedent was contributorily negligent in the accident causing death, there was sufficient evidence for a contributory negligence instruction to the jury. Allen v. Moore, 167 M 330, 538 P2d 1352 (1975).

Appellate Review — Substantial Evidence: Where there is any substantial evidence, even from only one witness, to support the findings of the trial court, even though the evidence is conflicting, the Supreme Court will not interfere with the judgment and findings of the trial court. Hankins v. Waitt, 120 M 596, 189 P2d 666 (1948).

Execution and Objection to Attestation of Will: Even though section 91-107, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), made two attesting witnesses an indispensable requirement to a valid will, the satisfactory testimony of one witness, under this section, entitled the will to probate as against the objection of defective execution of the attestation clause. In re Bragg's Estate, 106 M 132, 76 P2d 57 (1937).

Credibility of Witness — "Full Credit": In order for the direct evidence of one witness to be sufficient to prove a fact, he must be one who is entitled to full credit. In re Silver's Estate, 98 M 141, 38 P2d 277 (1934); Bowen v. Webb, 37 M 479, 97 P 839 (1908).

Instructions to Jury:

An instruction in the words of this section, that the "direct evidence of any witness who is entitled to full credit is sufficient proof of any fact", etc., was proper and not in conflict with section 93-2001-1, R.C.M. 1947 (now 26-1-203, 26-1-303, 26-1-403, and 26-2-301), dealing with the weight and effect of evidence. St. v. Park, 88 M 21, 289 P 1037 (1930).

Refusal of an instruction to the effect that the uncorroborated testimony of a witness is insufficient in law to prove a fact was proper. Williams v. Thomas, 58 M 576, 194 P 500 (1920).

Statutory Rape Prosecutions:

The rule requiring a prosecutrix raped by force to make immediate outcry or disclosure, or stand discredited on the trial, has no application to a prosecution for the rape of a female under the age of consent. St. v. Paddock, 86 M 569, 284 P 549 (1930); St. v. Peres, 27 M 358, 71 P 162 (1903). See also St. v. Gaimos, 53 M 118, 162 P 596 (1916).

In a prosecution for statutory rape, the evidence of the prosecutrix, if believed by the jury, is sufficient to sustain a conviction of the crime charged. St. v. Vinn, 50 M 27, 144 P 773 (1914). See also St. v. Gaimos, 53 M 118, 162 P 596 (1916).

PREPONDERANCE OF EVIDENCE — SINGLE WITNESS

Evidence of Flight Unacceptable as Sole Corroboration of Inconsistent Statement: After Giant's conviction of aggravated assault for attacking his wife in her home, he moved for dismissal on grounds that the evidence was insufficient to convict him as a matter of law because evidence of flight was the only corroboration of the prior inconsistent statements of the victim identifying him as the assailant. The victim initially identified Giant as the assailant in pretrial statements, but at trial, she identified her son as the attacker. No forensic testing was performed on evidence seized from the home, and there was no other testimony to corroborate either statement. The state argued, and the trial court agreed, that undisputed testimony of Giant's flight behavior was sufficient to corroborate the victim's prior inconsistent statements and that evidence seized from the home matched her statements. When considering a motion for a directed verdict to determine whether any rational trier of fact could find the elements of a crime satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt, the Supreme Court will consider trial testimony and the evidence properly admitted and before the jury according to the criminal rules of evidence, but will not consider potential unintroduced evidence or other evidence outside the trial setting. A criminal conviction cannot be sustained when the only evidence of some essential element of a crime is a prior inconsistent statement. In Montana, all prior inconsistent statements are admissible as substantive evidence under Rule 801(d)(1)(A), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10); however, prior inconsistent statements admitted as substantive evidence of guilt must be corroborated in order to sustain a conviction. Evidence of flight is not sufficient in itself to prove guilt or to support a conviction as a matter of law because evidence of flight by itself is as consistent with innocence as it is with guilt. Therefore, evidence of flight cannot be the sole corroboration of a prior inconsistent statement admitted as substantive evidence of guilt. Here, the physical evidence recovered from the home and photographs of the victim's injury, which would normally be sufficient corroborating evidence, were insufficient because they did not corroborate the essential element of identity because the victim identified another possible assailant. Further, the victim's prior inconsistent statements alone were insufficient as a matter of law to support Giant's conviction, in light of evidence that the victim stopped cooperating with the County Attorney's office when Giant was released on bail and asked that the case be dismissed after her divorce proceedings against Giant were voluntarily dismissed—actions that affected the reliability of the prior inconsistent statements but did not independently corroborate the statements. Giant's conviction was reversed. St. v. Giant, 2001 MT 245, 307 M 74, 37 P3d 49 (2001). See also St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636 (1981).

Employee's Testimony Regarding Discharge Due to Poor Work Relationship Sufficient to Confirm Grievance Committee Findings: The testimony of an employee that a poor working relationship with her employer was directly related to the termination of her employment constituted sufficient proof that a department director improperly rejected a grievance committee's findings of a misapplication of department policies and procedures. Brander v. Dept. of Institutions, 247 M 302, 806 P2d 530, 48 St. Rep. 207 (1991).

Statutory Rape Not Proved Solely by Unreliable Prior Inconsistent Statement: Charge of sexual intercourse without consent was properly dismissed at the end of the state's presentation of its case where the only evidence upon which conviction could be based was an unreliable prior statement of the alleged victim that was inconsistent with her testimony at trial in which she repudiated the statement. St. v. White Water, 194 M 85, 634 P2d 636, 38 St. Rep. 1664 (1981).

Sufficiency of Evidence: Numerical superiority of witnesses is not the test of sufficiency of evidence. The testimony of a single witness entitled to full credit is sufficient to prove any fact. The correct test is whether there is substantial evidence supporting the conviction. St. v. Azure, 181 M 47, 591 P2d 1125, 36 St. Rep. 514 (1979).

Credibility of Witness: When there was testimony that clearly tended to incriminate defendant, the jury was at liberty not to believe the testimony of defendant and his fiancée and find from credible evidence that defendant committed the offense. St. v. Seitzinger, 180 M 136, 589 P2d 655, 36 St. Rep. 122 (1979).

One Witness Sufficient: It is long established that the testimony of one witness is sufficient to establish a fact. St. v. Radi, 176 M 451, 578 P2d 1169 (1978).

One Witness Over Many — Produced Conviction in Mind of Judge: In deciding the facts of a case, the trial judge could accept "the direct evidence of one witness who is entitled to full credit" to prove any fact and he was not bound to decide the facts in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, who did not produce conviction in his mind, against a less number or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying his mind. Davis v. Burton, 128 M 434, 278 P2d 213 (1955).

Party as Sole Witness:

The party seeking reformation of a contract on the ground of mistake has the burden of establishing his claim by a preponderance of the evidence, and such preponderance may be established by the plaintiff's own testimony as against that of a greater number of witnesses to the contrary. Ayers v. Buswell, 73 M 518, 238 P 591 (1925).

Since the burden of proof is not to be determined by the number of witnesses introduced and the direct evidence of one witness entitled to full credit is sufficient to prove any fact, the direct evidence of the plaintiff, upon whom was the burden of showing nonpayment of the certificate of deposit in suit, was sufficient to establish that fact. O'Langan v. First St. Bank of Hilger, 59 M 190, 196 P 149 (1921).

Preponderance of Evidence — Established by One Witness: A preponderance of the evidence may be established by the testimony of a single witness as against a greater number of witnesses who testify to the contrary. Doane v. Marquisee, 63 M 166, 206 P 426 (1922); Parchen v. Chessman, 53 M 430, 164 P 531 (1917).

PERJURY

Evidentiary Standard: The evidentiary standard for the proof of perjury was not met, resulting in dismissal of the charges, when the State failed to produce the direct testimony of two witnesses or one witness and admissible corroborating circumstances and establish that the alleged perjured statement was material. St. v. Scanlon, 174 M 139, 569 P2d 368 (1977), replacing opinion in 33 St. Rep. 1355 (1976).

Elements of Perjury: The court dismissed each of 18 counts of perjury based upon the absence of one of these elements: lack of direct evidence as to the falsity of the statement, lack of corroboration, or lack of materiality. All dismissals except two were proper. St. v. Scanlon, 33 St. Rep. 1355 (1976).

Prisoner Entitled to "Full Credit": Whether a convict under sentence of imprisonment in the state prison, appearing as a witness for the State in a perjury trial, was entitled to full credit, under the rule that perjury may be proved by the testimony of two witnesses or one witness and corroborating circumstances, was, under the circumstances, for the determination of the jury. St. v. Jackson, 88 M 420, 293 P 309 (1930).

Perjury — Instruction: Upon a trial for perjury, an instruction that "the direct evidence of one witness alone is not sufficient to convict of the crime of perjury, unless corroborated by other facts and circumstances proved on the trial" is not error under this section. St. v. Gibbs, 10 M 213, 25 P 289 (1890).

26-1-302. Witness presumed to speak the truth — how presumption rebutted.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1983 Amendment: Substituted entire section (see 1983 Session Law for text) for “A witness is presumed to speak the truth. This presumption, however, may be repelled by the manner in which he testifies, by the character of his testimony, by evidence affecting his motives or his character for truth, honesty, or integrity, or by contradictory evidence; and the jury is the exclusive judge of his credibility.”

Case Notes

Posttrial Recantation by Victim Witness — New Trial Properly Denied Based on Overwhelming Evidence of Guilt: The defendant was charged with violently assaulting his girlfriend. At trial, the girlfriend testified that the defendant had assaulted her. Her testimony was corroborated by another witness, who saw the victim shortly after the assault. After the trial, the victim contacted the prosecutor to recant her testimony, claiming that she had fallen off a cliff instead. The defendant filed a motion for a new trial based on the victim’s recantation, which the District Court denied. Despite the recantation, the District Court concluded that the forensic evidence against the defendant, and exclusive of the victim’s testimony, was overwhelming. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying the motion for a new trial. St. v. Jones, 2020 MT 7, 398 Mont. 309, 459 P.3d 841.

Indistinguishable DUI Reports — Preclusion of Defendant From Introducing or Referencing Reports for Purpose of Impeachment — Abuse of Discretion: A defendant accused of DUI sought to introduce police reports from other cases prepared by the reporting officer. The reports contained identical or nearly identical language that led to at least one mistake in another case in which the officer reported that the suspect had failed a field sobriety test that the officer did not administer. Because the reports were relevant and admissible to attack the police officer’s credibility and truthfulness, the District Court abused its discretion by granting the state’s motion in limine to preclude the defendant from introducing or referencing the arresting officer’s reports for purposes of impeachment. St. v. Zimmerman, 2018 MT 94, 391 Mont. 210, 417 P.3d 289.

Conflicting Testimony Regarding Value of Spouse’s Interest in Limited Partnership for Medicaid Eligibility Consideration — Court Not to Substitute Judgment for Hearings Officer’s Weighing of Witness Testimony: The Department of Public Health and Human Services (Department) sought repayment for Medicaid payments because a Medicaid recipient had failed to disclose his spouse’s interest in her family’s limited partnership. At the hearing, witnesses for the recipient and the Department offered conflicting testimony regarding the value of the spouse’s interest in the partnership. The hearings officer accepted the valuation offered by the Department’s witness and the recipient eventually filed for judicial review in District Court, claiming that the hearings officer’s findings were clearly erroneous. The District Court affirmed the Department’s ruling, and the recipient appealed. In affirming the District Court, the Supreme Court noted that it would not substitute its judgment for that of the hearings officer with regard to what weight to assign to witness testimony and that the recipient had not offered any evidence that the valuation by the Department’s witness was clearly erroneous. Micone v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2011 MT 178, 361 Mont. 258, 258 P.3d 403.

Trial Court’s Improper Determination of Veracity of Recanted Testimony — Remand: In ruling on Crosby’s motion for a new trial based on the recanted testimony of a witness, the District Court erroneously concluded that Crosby was entitled to a new trial only when the trial judge was satisfied that the recantation was untrue, which improperly placed the court in the role of factfinder. Instead, the court should have applied the test in St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P.3d 1099 (2005), to determine whether a new trial should be granted based on newly discovered evidence. The Supreme Court remanded for application of the Clark standard in determining whether Crosby was entitled to postconviction relief and a new trial. Crosby v. St., 2006 MT 155, 332 M 460, 139 P.3d 832 (2006). In Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742, the Supreme Court overruled Crosby to the extent it applied the fifth factor in the Clark test to a petition for postconviction relief that is based upon newly discovered evidence.

Recantation of Sexual Assault Victim’s Testimony — Remand for Consideration of New Trial — Perry Partially Overruled: Following Clark’s conviction of sexual assault against his stepdaughter, she recanted her testimony and Clark moved for a new trial, citing St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P.2d 268 (1988). The Supreme Court overruled Perry to the extent that it stands for the proposition that a trial judge is required to grant a new trial only when satisfied that the recantation of the witness is true. However, the Perry proposition that the weight to be given to recanted testimony is for the trial judge to determine was retained as authoritative precedent to be considered as part of the analysis set out in Berry v. St., 10 Ga. 511 (Ga. 1851), describing when it is proper to grant a new trial based on newly discovered evidence, as adopted in St. v. Greeno, 135 M 580, 342 P.2d 1052 (1959). In applying the restated Berry test, a District Court is not to make factual determinations as to the veracity of the recantation, but should evaluate the recantation for materiality and its tendency to be cumulative or impeaching and should determine whether there is a reasonable probability that a new trial would produce a different outcome, keeping in mind the aspects of recantations that make them inherently suspect. If the Berry elements are met, a new trial is warranted; if not, the prior judgment stands. Here, the record was not clear as to the District Court's reasons for denying a new trial and whether the court correctly applied the law, so the case was remanded to allow the District Court to readdress Clark's motion for a new trial. St. v. Clark, 2005 MT 330, 330 M 8, 125 P3d 1099 (2005), followed in St. v. Jones, 2020 MT 7, 398 Mont. 309, 459 P.3d 841.

On remand, the District Court found that evidence of the victim's recanted testimony was neither cumulative nor impeaching and that a new trial based on the testimony had no reasonable probability of resulting in a different outcome, so Clark's motion for a new trial was denied. Clark appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. In the first trial, the jury had already heard Clark's theory, which was essentially confirmed by the recanted testimony, but had rejected the theory and convicted Clark. Thus, there was no probability that a new trial based on the same theory would result in a different outcome, so a new trial was unwarranted. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 391, 347 M 113, 197 P3d 977 (2008), following Crosby v. St., 2006 MT 155, 332 M 460, 139 P3d 832 (2006). In Marble v. St., 2015 MT 242, 380 Mont. 366, 355 P.3d 742, the Supreme Court held that it erred in applying the Clark factors to a petition for postconviction relief, in particular the fifth factor, and overruled three cases to the extent they applied that factor to a petition for postconviction relief.

Failure to Give Unsupported Accountability Jury Instruction Proper: Hall contended that the District Court erred in refusing to give an accountability instruction in Hall's trial for theft because certain evidence at the crime scene implicated that a witness was an accomplice in the crime, so the jury should have been instructed that the witness's testimony should be viewed with distrust. The Supreme Court disagreed. In this case, the accomplice instruction was inconsistent with Hall's theory of complete innocence, and the witness's testimony established no element of accountability. It is not proper to give an accountability instruction when it is not supported by the evidence and is inconsistent with a defendant's claim of innocence. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003).

Substantive Changes to Deposition Testimony Properly Viewed With Distrust: Albert filed an action to determine a claim for a prescriptive easement and quiet title to a road across Hastetter's property. Hastetter was deposed, and in addition to the original transcript, Hastetter also submitted three pages of corrections, which contained numerous substantive changes to the original testimony. Hastetter died prior to trial, so the entire deposition was entered into evidence. Hastetter's trustee contended that because Hastetter's credibility was not directly attacked at trial, the judge was not at liberty to view the amended testimony with distrust and that the original and amended testimony should stand as probative evidence for every fact stated because Hastetter was presumed to speak the truth. In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court noted that a witness may make any changes in form or substance in altering deposition testimony, but that the witness who changes testimony on a material matter between the giving of the deposition and appearance at trial may be impeached by the former answers and cross-examined as to why the answers were changed. However, Hastetter's death foreclosed Albert's right to cross-examination, raising an issue regarding the evidentiary value of the substantive changes to the deposition testimony and challenging the trial court with conflicting evidence without the benefit of witness cross-examination. In the event that a party deponent is unavailable to address apparent conflicts in amended deposition testimony, the trial court must exercise sound discretion in weighing the value of the evidence, and the Supreme Court will not second-guess a trial court's determination regarding the strength and weight of conflicting evidence. With Hastetter unavailable to explain the extensive changes to his original deposition testimony, the trial court appropriately exercised its discretion in viewing Hastetter's deposition changes with great distrust. Albert v. Hastetter, 2002 MT 123, 310 M 82, 48 P3d 749 (2002). See also Lutig v. Thomas, 89 F.R.D. 639 (N.D. Ill. 1981), and J.H. Harvey Co. v. Reddick, 522 SE 2d 749 (Ga. 1999).

Evidence of Prior Acts Not Tending to Impeach Expert Testimony Properly Excluded: Plaintiff who alleged that he was sexually abused as a child sought to have evidence of the prior acts of the alleged abuser introduced to impeach the testimony of a doctor who testified that there was no reliable, third-party documentation that plaintiff was abused and that as a result, the scientific validity of plaintiff's claim was in doubt. The prior acts evidence was properly excluded because it was not the type of evidence that the doctor said would document the abuse and thus would not have tended to impeach the doctor's testimony. Benjamin v. Torgerson, 1999 MT 216, 295 M 528, 985 P2d 734, 56 St. Rep. 847 (1999).

Evidence on Issue of Witness's Credibility — Probative Rather Than Prejudicial: The presumption that a witness speaks the truth and is credible may be rebutted by evidence of the witness's character for truth, honesty, and integrity, but evidence bearing on the issue of the witness's credibility, in order to be admissible, must be more probative than prejudicial. St. v. Sor-Lokken, 246 M 70, 803 P2d 638, 47 St. Rep. 2264 (1990), following St. v. Hammer, 233 M 101, 759 P2d 979 (1988).

Weight Given to Recanted Accomplice Testimony — Discretion of Trial Court to Determine Veracity: An accomplice recanted testimony relied on in the conviction of defendant 15 years earlier. Defendant contended the District Court improperly applied the presumption of truthfulness to the original testimony but not to the recantation. In light of the inherent suspicion surrounding recanted testimony and the public interest in swift and sure justice, the Supreme Court adopted the view that the weight to be given such testimony is for the judge passing on the motion for a new trial to determine. Absent a clear abuse of discretion, the trial court will be upheld. St. v. Perry, 232 M 455, 758 P2d 268, 45 St. Rep. 1192 (1988).

Evidence of Witness's Misrepresentations and Omissions Improperly Excluded — "Collateral Matters" Rule Incorrectly Applied: The District Court excluded evidence of a witness's misrepresentations and omissions after holding that the evidence constituted impeachment on collateral matters. The Supreme Court found the exclusion of evidence improper on two issues: the issue of the credibility of the witness and the issue of punitive damages. Further, the Supreme Court noted that the rule on collateral matters was abolished in favor of the relevancy approach contained in Rule 607, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). Cooper v. Rosston, 232 M 186, 756 P2d 1125, 45 St. Rep. 978 (1988), followed in St. v. Kowalski, 252 M 166, 827 P2d 1253, 49 St. Rep. 197 (1992), and McEwen v. MCR, LLC, 2012 MT 319, 368 Mont. 38, 291 P.3d 1253, in which the Supreme Court concluded that evidence of the defendant's bid on state trust land, for which it had no use, was properly admitted to prove the plaintiffs' punitive damages claim as it was relevant to whether the defendant was acting maliciously toward the plaintiffs.

Expert Testimony on the Credibility of Children: A psychologist testified that 5- and 6-year-old children are unable to sustain a lie about sexual abuse. While acknowledging that an expert may not testify to the credibility of a particular witness, the Supreme Court allowed testimony on the reliability of a class of witnesses, such as child victims of sexual abuse. In re J.W.K., 223 M 1, 724 P2d 164, 43 St. Rep. 1483 (1986).

Witness' Statement Not Referred to in Affidavit — No Ex Post Facto Problem — Admissible as Prior Inconsistent Statement: Defendant was convicted of operating a motor vehicle while designated a habitual traffic offender. Proceeding pro se, the defendant argued on appeal that failure to refer to a witness' statement in the affidavit supporting leave to file information constituted an ex post facto problem. The court held that he simply misunderstood that legal theory. The court further held that the statement, which asserted that defendant drove from Great Falls to Loma, was admissible as a prior inconsistent statement because the witness testified at trial that he, not the defendant, drove that distance. St. v. Grant, 217 M 357, 704 P2d 1064, 42 St. Rep. 1248 (1985).

Discovery Limited by Court — Witness' Bias a Jury Question: The defendant, convicted of theft in the holdup of a truckstop, contended that the trial court had erred in refusing to allow discovery of the "rap sheet" of a suspected accomplice. Defendant argued on appeal that he was denied due process. The reviewing court disagreed saying that (unlike the defendant in the case this defendant relied upon, who was unable to make a record from which to argue the witness's bias or lack of impartiality because the witness' criminal record could not be presented to the jury) this defendant was permitted to present fully evidence of the criminal character and bias of the suspected accomplice. The jury was aware of the immunity bargain between the witness and the prosecution and of the witness' complicity in the truckstop theft. The trial court's denial of the defendant's motion was well within its discretion to control cross-examination. St. v. Dolan, 190 M 195, 620 P2d 355, 37 St. Rep. 1860 (1980).

Credibility of Witness — Impeached on Different Issue: Findings of fact may not be set aside unless clearly erroneous, and due regard will be given to the opportunity of the trial court to judge the credibility of the witnesses. The District Court did not abuse its discretion by ruling in favor of the defendant on one issue after the defendant's credibility had been impeached on a separate issue. Kis v. Pifer, 179 M 344, 588 P2d 514, 35 St. Rep. 1965 (1978).

Constitutional Right to Observe Witness: Cases which permit testimony, given by a witness in a first trial, to be read into evidence in a second trial, in the absence of such witness, are based upon the theory that the accused has been present when the witness gave the testimony in the first trial and had the opportunity of then cross-examining such witness. Such cases proceed upon the theory that the observation by the jury of the manner and demeanor of the witness is no essential part of the right of a defendant to meet the witness face to face. Montana subscribes to no such theory. To do so would be to make this section a useless and meaningless thing and would deny the defendant the right to meet the witness against him face to face, a right guaranteed him by Art. III, sec. 16, 1889 Mont. Const. (now Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const.). St. v. Pivaler, 127 M 427, 265 P2d 969 (1953), overruled in St. v. Bouldin, 153 M 276, 456 P2d 830 (1969).

Previous Testimony Read Into Record: It was error for the trial court to allow the testimony of a witness at the first trial to be read into evidence at the second trial of the defendant. It was the right of the defendant to have the jury see and observe the witness upon the witness stand. It was his right that the jury see how the witness acted while under direct and cross-examination. It was his right to have the jury judge the credibility of the witness from his appearance and manner while upon the witness stand. None of these rights could be had except and unless the witness met the defendant "face to face" in the presence of the jury during the course of the trial. St. v. Storm, 127 M 414, 265 P2d 971 (1951), overruled in St. v. Bouldin, 153 M 276, 456 P2d 830 (1969).

Jury Verdict — Substantial Evidence: Where there is ample substantial evidence to sustain a jury's verdict, the Supreme Court will not disturb it. Roberts St. Bank v. O'Rourke, 121 M 228, 191 P2d 321 (1948).

Variance in Testimony — Credibility: Testimony of defendant that when his sister-in-law delivered a deed to him covering an apartment house shortly before her death she said he could now "send her to the poor farm", while in a prior deposition he stated that she said now "he could break her", did not indicate falsity, both expressions having the same meaning: impoverishment of vendor. Walsh v. Kennedy, 115 M 551, 147 P2d 425 (1944).

Credibility of Witnesses: Courts may reject the most positive testimony though the witness be not discredited by direct evidence impeaching him or contradicting his statements. Credibility is not to be considered commensurate with the facility or vehemence with which a witness swears. It is swearing credibly that is to conclude their judgment. McLaughlin v. Corcoran, 104 M 590, 69 P2d 597 (1937), distinguished in St. v. Keating, 134 M 372, 332 P2d 906 (1958).

Credibility — Judgment of Jury Controls: As against the contention that the testimony of the State's witnesses relative to occurrences incident to a homicide was incredible, the Supreme Court may not, in the absence of such inherent weakness therein as would destroy it as legal evidence, substitute its judgment for that of the jury, which is the exclusive judge of the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given to their testimony. St. v. Gunn, 89 M 453, 300 P 212 (1931).

Instructions to Jury — Use of This Section: The propriety of submitting instructions to the jury based upon the rules prescribed by section 93-2001-1, R.C.M. 1947 (now 26-1-203, 26-1-303, 26-1-403, 26-2-301), for weighing evidence, is a matter addressed to the trial court, and its determination is subject to review only for abuse of discretion; ordinarily an instruction in the words of this section is sufficient [section has since been amended—annotator]. St. v. Sedlacek, 74 M 201, 239 P 1002 (1925).

Manner of Testifying — Goes to Weight: In determining the weight to be given to testimony, it is necessary to consider not only what is said but also the manner of saying it. Sanger v. Huguene, 65 M 236, 211 P 349 (1922).

Instructions to Jury — Weighing Evidence: An error in refusing an instruction that the jury should consider particular matters in weighing testimony of witnesses is not cured by submitting the language of this section, supplemented by the words that they were at liberty to disregard the testimony of any witness who had willfully and deliberately testified falsely to any material matter, unless corroborated. St. v. Beesskove, 34 M 41, 85 P 376 (1906).

Interest in Cause of Action — Determinant of Credibility: Error in refusing to permit cross-examination of plaintiff's witness to the extent of his admitted interest in the suit is not ground for reversal where other evidence shows that, for purposes of collection, the witness had assigned to plaintiffs his account against defendants, which constituted one of the causes of action, it being thus apparent that the jury clearly understood the extent of his interest and was thereby enabled to weigh properly his credibility. Hefferlin v. Karlman, 30 M 348, 76 P 757 (1904).

JUDGING EFFECT OF EVIDENCE

Defendant Not Entitled to Jury Instruction on Testimony of Jailhouse Informants — Proposed Instruction Named Informants and Directed Jury to Scrutinize Their Testimony in Particular — District Court Did Not Err by Giving Several Pattern Instructions on Witness Credibility Instead. St. v. Hardy, 2023 MT 110, 412 Mont. 383, 530 P.3d 814.

Jury Instruction on Circumstantial Evidence — Defendant Failed to Show Instruction Adversely Affected Rights: During a high-speed chase, the defendant hit and killed a Deputy Sheriff. At trial, the defendant unsuccessfully objected to a jury instruction that, he argued, relieved the state of its burden to prove him guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed. The court concluded that when the instructions were considered as a whole, they fully and fairly instructed the jury. The court also held that the instruction, on its face, did not relieve the state of any of its burdens to prove the defendant guilty beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Sanchez, 2017 MT 192, 388 Mont. 262, 399 P.3d 886.

Safe Use of Product — Inadequate Jury Instruction — Cumulative Error: The District Court properly ruled for the plaintiff on a partial summary judgment motion in a products liability case concerning a liquid nail product, holding that the defendant could not argue affirmative defenses, including unreasonable misuse because the skin contact by the liquid nail product was reasonably foreseeable. However, the District Court then allowed the product distributor to present expert testimony that its product was “safe as used”, which referred to the inclusion of an ingredient in the product rather than to a nail technician’s skin contact with the product. The court abused its discretion when it failed to give a full and fair jury instruction by not instructing the jury that the defendant knew skin contact occurred and did not consider this to be misuse of the product. The District Court also erred by instructing the jury as to the meaning of “safe as used” without authority to support the court’s definition and by refusing to instruct the jury that skin contact is common in the nail industry. Due to cumulative error, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case. Kenser v. Premium Nail Concepts, Inc., 2014 MT 280, 376 Mont. 482, 338 P.3d 37.

Burden on State in Justifiable Use of Force Case to Prove Absence of Justification: The enactment of 46-16-131 in 2009 abrogated St. v. Henson, 2010 MT 136, 356 Mont. 458, 235 P.3d 1274, St. v. Longstreth, 1999 MT 204, 295 Mont. 457, 984 P.2d 157, and other cases to the extent they held the burden of establishing justifiable use of force was the defendant’s. Under 46-16-131, a defendant has the initial burden of offering evidence of justifiable use of force; the burden then shifts to the state to prove the absence of justification beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Daniels, 2011 MT 278, 362 Mont. 426, 265 P.3d 623.

Multiple Cause Instruction Not Appropriate When Only One Negligent Defendant Involved: Neal’s vehicle was rear-ended by Nelson’s vehicle. During trial, Nelson repeatedly referred to Neal’s unrelated medical conditions and injuries and argued that other causes injured Neal, so Neal contended that the trial court should have instructed the jury on multiple causation. The Supreme Court disagreed. Citing Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122 (1996), the court noted that when there are allegations that the acts of more than one person combined to produce a result, a multiple cause instruction is warranted. However, when, as here, only one negligent defendant is involved and the injury was not caused by anyone other than the defendant, a multiple cause instruction is not appropriate. Neal v. Nelson, 2008 MT 426, 347 M 431, 198 P3d 819 (2008).

No Error in Refusal to Instruct Jury That Acquittal Required if Evidence Supportive of Either Guilt or Innocence: At Misner's deliberate homicide trial, Misner cited St. v. Sheriff, 188 M 26, 610 P2d 1157 (1980), in proposing a jury instruction stating that when a jury finds two interpretations of the evidence to be equally reasonable, one of which points to the defendant's guilt and the other to innocence, the jury must accept the interpretation that points to innocence. The trial court rejected the instruction, and on appeal, Misner asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Sheriff is no longer good law on this point. The correct rule, as set out in St. v. Hill, 2005 MT 216, 328 M 253, 119 P3d 1210 (2005), is that when circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one of which supports guilt and the other innocence, it is the function of the trier of fact to determine which is most reasonable. St. v. Misner, 2007 MT 235, 339 M 176, 168 P3d 679 (2007).

Negligence for Injury — New Trial Warranted When Evidence of Pain and Mental Distress Uncontroverted: Hoffman was rear-ended by a logging truck while attempting a turn off of a two-lane highway. The jury resolved conflicting evidence and concluded that the truck driver was 50% negligent in causing the accident, but limited Hoffman's damage award to past medical expenses even though Hoffman presented uncontroverted evidence of other damages, including pain and suffering, mental distress, and depression. The Supreme Court reversed. Once the jury concluded that the driver caused Hoffman's injuries, the jury was not free to disregard Hoffman's uncontroverted evidence, and the case was remanded for a new trial as to Hoffman's damages for pain and mental distress. Hoffman v. Austin, 2006 MT 289, 334 M 357, 147 P3d 177 (2006), following Thompson v. Bozeman, 284 M 440, 945 P2d 48 (1997), and Renville v. Taylor, 2000 MT 217, 301 M 99, 7 P3d 400 (2000), and distinguishing Ele v. Ehnes, 2003 MT 131, 316 M 69, 68 P3d 835 (2003).

No Negligence Ascribed to Trucking Company for Failure to Train and Supervise Driver: Hoffman was rear-ended by a logging truck while attempting a turn off of a two-lane highway, and Hoffman sued the trucking company that employed the driver on grounds that the company failed to adequately train and supervise the driver. The jury found that the company was not liable, and Hoffman appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Hoffman relied solely on the driver's deplorable driving record and pointed out that the company's training practices differed from other companies, but presented no evidence that the company's lack of training and supervision caused Hoffman's injuries. The company met federal requirements by checking the driver's driving record prior to employment and by requiring the driver to take a drug test after the accident. The jury properly weighed the evidence and determined that Hoffman failed to show that the company breached its duty of care in training or supervising the driver, and the Supreme Court declined to disturb the verdict. Hoffman v. Austin, 2006 MT 289, 334 M 357, 147 P3d 177 (2006), following Ele v. Ehnes, 2003 MT 131, 316 M 69, 68 P3d 835 (2003).

Sufficient Evidence of Violation of Turn Signal Law to Justify Plaintiff's Comparative Negligence: Hoffman was rear-ended by a logging truck while attempting a turn off of a two-lane highway, and the jury found that Hoffman was 50% negligent in the collision. Hoffman appealed on grounds that insubstantial evidence supported the jury's verdict. Although the evidence was conflicting regarding Hoffman's use of turn signals prior to the accident, Hoffman himself testified that he began signaling as much as 225 feet before stopping. However, 61-8-336 requires use of a turn signal not less than 300 feet before making a turn in a nonurban area. A jury is not free to disregard uncontradicted, credible, nonopinion testimony, and Hoffman's admission that he failed to signal for the full 300 feet was substantial credible evidence to support the jury's finding that Hoffman contributed to the crash and to his own injuries. The Supreme Court declined to disturb the verdict, and denial of Hoffman's motion for a new trial was affirmed. Hoffman v. Austin, 2006 MT 289, 334 M 357, 147 P3d 177 (2006), following Thompson v. Bozeman, 284 M 440, 945 P2d 48 (1997).

Trier of Fact to Determine Reasonableness of Conflicting Circumstantial Evidence — Sufficient Evidence to Conclude Defendant Possessed Necessary Mental State for Robbery: At Hill's trial for robbery, only circumstantial evidence identified Hill as the perpetrator. At the close of the state's case, Hill's counsel moved for a directed verdict regarding Hill's identity as the perpetrator, but the motion was denied. Hill appealed on grounds that the trial court erroneously denied the motion, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Pursuant to St. v. Bowman, 2004 MT 119, 321 M 176, 89 P3d 986 (2004), when circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one supporting guilt and one supporting innocence, the trier of fact determines which interpretation is most reasonable, and a directed verdict is appropriate only when there is no evidence whatsoever to support a guilty verdict. In this case, it could not be concluded that there was no evidence whatsoever from which the jury could conclude that Hill was the assailant and, given that reasonable inference, that Hill possessed the necessary mental state to commit the robbery. St. v. Hill, 2005 MT 216, 328 M 253, 119 P3d 1210 (2005).

Use of Ryan-Type Pattern Jury Instruction on Circumstantial Evidence Discontinued in Favor of Hall-Type Instruction: Based on the holding in St. v. Ryan, 229 M 7, 744 P2d 1242 (1987), Bowman contended that he was entitled to a jury instruction stating that to be convicted solely on circumstantial evidence, the facts and circumstances must not only be entirely consistent with the theory of guilt, but must be inconsistent with any other rational theory or conclusion. The Supreme Court noted that after the decision in St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929 (1999), the pattern jury instruction based on Ryan is no longer a correct statement of law and cautioned practitioners not to request it. The acceptable Hall instruction states that if circumstantial evidence is susceptible to two interpretations, one pointing to a defendant's guilt and one to innocence, the trier of fact determines which interpretation is most reasonable. St. v. Bowman, 2004 MT 119, 321 M 176, 89 P3d 986 (2004), followed in St. v. Hill, 2005 MT 216, 328 M 253, 119 P3d 1210 (2005). See also St. v. Racz, 2007 MT 244, 339 M 218, 168 P3d 685 (2007), in which it was held that defense counsel's proposal to include a Hall-type instruction could not be considered ineffective assistance of counsel.

Failure to Give Unsupported Accountability Jury Instruction Proper: Hall contended that the District Court erred in refusing to give an accountability instruction in Hall's trial for theft because certain evidence at the crime scene implicated that a witness was an accomplice in the crime, so the jury should have been instructed that the witness's testimony should be viewed with distrust. The Supreme Court disagreed. In this case, the accomplice instruction was inconsistent with Hall's theory of complete innocence, and the witness's testimony established no element of accountability. It is not proper to give an accountability instruction when it is not supported by the evidence and is inconsistent with a defendant's claim of innocence. St. v. Hall, 2003 MT 253, 317 M 356, 77 P3d 239 (2003). See also St. v. Charlo-Whitworth, 2016 MT 157, 384 Mont. 50, 373 P.3d 845.

No Prejudicial Error in Failure to Give Negligent Homicide Mental State Instruction in Wrongful Death Action When Other Instructions Adequately Reflect Negligence: Samson's son was killed by Bercier, a youth who walked away from a nonsecure, supervised licensed youth group home. Samson sued the state for foreseeable negligence. To boost the theory of foreseeability, Samson offered a jury instruction that defined Bercier's conduct as reckless and postulated therefrom that the conduct was foreseeable because of Bercier's background, seeking to undermine the state's theory that the shooting was an unforeseeable accident. The District Court refused to offer the instruction, instead instructing the jury on elements of wrongful death, and Samson appealed. The state argued that the mental state of Bercier was not a controlling issue and contended that it was not necessary to instruct the jury on the mental state of negligent homicide because the instructions as a whole properly included the key concepts of a wrongful death action. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. The fundamental issue concerned the state's negligence, not Bercier's mental state. Nevertheless, Samson was still able to present the foreseeability theory under the instructions that were given, so failure to give Samson's offered instruction did not result in prejudice to Samson's case. It is within a District Court's discretion to decide how to instruct the jury, taking into account the theories of the contending parties, and absent an abuse of discretion, the District Court was affirmed. Samson v. St., 2003 MT 133, 316 M 90, 69 P3d 1154 (2003). See also Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122 (1996).

Jury Question Concerning Amount of Damages in Injury Case — Use of Special Verdict Form Not Abuse of Discretion: Ele alleged that he was injured in a motor vehicle accident for which Ehnes admitted liability. In the pretrial order, Ehnes agreed that the sole issue of fact at trial was the amount of Ele's accident-related injury and damage claims. The first question on the District Court's verdict form stated that Ehnes had admitted responsibility for the accident and asked if Ele was injured as a result. The jury said no and returned the verdict. Ele contended that the verdict form was inconsistent with instructions on negligence because it did not ask if Ehnes' conduct was the cause of damages. Ele also asserted that the verdict form should not have included the question of whether he was injured because the amount of injury was the only question for trial. The Supreme Court considered whether the District Court abused its discretion and decided that it did not. Causation was in fact the first issue posed in the instruction, and inclusion of that issue did not conflict with the pretrial order. The use of the term “accident-related” in the pretrial order confirmed that the issue remaining for trial was not merely the amount of Ele’s damages, but the amount of damages caused by and related to the accident. Ele v. Ehnes, 2003 MT 131, 316 M 69, 68 P3d 835 (2003), distinguished in Reis v. Luckett, 2015 MT 337, 381 Mont. 490, 362 P.3d 632.

Argument Regarding Weaker or Less Satisfactory Evidence More Appropriately Made in Closing Statement Than in Jury Instructions: Bauer contended that his incest victim’s testimony should be viewed with distrust, and requested a jury instruction on weak and less satisfactory evidence. After a discussion with both counsel, the trial court declined to give the proposed instruction, recognizing that the instruction would amount to a comment on the victim’s credibility and the weight to be given to her testimony. The court concluded that the defense could make an argument regarding weak and less satisfactory evidence in the closing statement to the jury. The Supreme Court agreed that such comments are better reserved for closing arguments and affirmed the trial court’s rejection of the proposed jury instruction. St. v. Bauer, 2002 MT 7, 308 M 99, 39 P3d 689 (2002).

Burden on Defendant in Justifiable Use of Force Case to Raise Reasonable Doubt of Guilt: Longstreth was charged with deliberate homicide and relied on a defense of justifiable use of force. After being convicted of negligent homicide, Longstreth alleged that the jury was incorrectly instructed in violation of her due process rights, contending that the instructions improperly allocated the burden of proof by failing to require the state to prove an absence of justification beyond a reasonable doubt. Citing St. v. Daniels, 210 M 1, 682 P2d 173, 41 St. Rep. 880 (1984), and St. v. Miller, 1998 MT 177, 290 M 97, 966 P2d 721 (1998), the Supreme Court reiterated that justifiable use of force is an affirmative defense and that only the defendant has the burden of producing sufficient evidence to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt. The state’s burden is to prove the elements of the charged offense beyond a reasonable doubt, which does not include the absence of justification. Further, 45-5-112 allows for a permissive inference by the jury rather than a mandatory inference. As long as the instructions given to the jury make it clear that the burden of proof of guilt and all necessary elements of guilt lies squarely with the state, placing the burden of presenting evidence to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt on the defendant is not unconstitutional. St. v. Longstreth, 1999 MT 204, 295 M 457, 984 P2d 157, 56 St. Rep. 795 (1999). St. v. Daniels, 2011 MT 278, 362 Mont. 426, 265 P.3d 623, held that the enactment of 46-16-131 in 2009 abrogated Longstreth. St. v. Henson, 2010 MT 136, 356 Mont. 458, 235 P.3d 1274, and other cases to the extent they held the burden of establishing justifiable use of force was the defendant’s in a justifiable use of force case. See also Leland v. Oreg., 343 US 790, 96 L Ed 1302, 72 S Ct 1002 (1952), Patterson v. N.Y., 432 US 197, 53 L Ed 281, 97 S Ct 2319 (1977), and St. v. Lopez, 185 M 187, 605 P2d 178 (1980).

Conclusion Through Evidence and Instructions That Mental State Existed for Conviction of Felony Attempted Theft: Given the evidence and instructions presented to the jury, it could reasonably conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that defendant had the requisite mental state for conviction of felony attempted theft. When the evidence, viewed in a light most favorable to the prevailing party, permits a rational trier of fact to find the essential elements of a crime, the Supreme Court will not reverse the conviction. St. v. Johnstone, 244 M 450, 798 P2d 978, 47 St. Rep. 1715 (1990).

Instruction on Flight Proper When Based on Evidence: A jury instruction allowing consideration of testimony showing flight or concealment by the defendant as a circumstance tending to prove consciousness of guilt was proper in light of defendant’s admission that he left the scene of the crime. St. v. Hurlbert, 232 M 115, 756 P2d 1110, 45 St. Rep. 923 (1988), citing St. v. Walker, 148 M 216, 419 P2d 300 (1966). Walker was followed in St. v. Patton, 280 M 278, 930 P2d 635, 53 St. Rep. 1402 (1996). Patton was followed in St. v. Johnson, 1998 MT 289, 291 M 501, 969 P2d 925, 55 St. Rep. 1186 (1998), in which it was held that even in the limited environment of prison, a defendant may fly to wherever the defendant thinks is safe to dispose of evidence, but that only some departure from a crime scene is necessary to support giving an instruction on flight. Patton was also followed in St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999). See also St. v. Hall, 1999 MT 297, 297 M 111, 991 P2d 929, 56 St. Rep. 1190 (1999), in which the Supreme Court reconsidered the probative value of the flight instruction and directed that the better policy in future cases when evidence of flight has been properly admitted is to reserve comment on the significance of flight to counsel, rather than to the court through jury instructions. However, in Hall’s case, no prejudice attached because the instruction included the qualification that evidence of flight was not, by itself, sufficient evidence of guilt, but rather only one circumstance to be considered by the jury. Hall was followed in St. v. Hatten, 1999 MT 298, 297 M 127, 991 P2d 939, 56 St. Rep. 1198 (1999).

Instruction Necessary — Interference With Contract: An instruction on interference with contract must address the element of unjustifiability or impropriety of the alleged tortious actions and provide that the act is “without right or justifiable cause on the part of the actor”. NW. Nat’l Bank of Great Falls v. Weaver-Maxwell, Inc., 224 M 33, 729 P2d 1258, 43 St. Rep. 1995 (1986), distinguished in Weinberg v. Farmers St. Bank of Worden, 231 M 10, 752 P2d 719, 45 St. Rep. 391 (1988).

Evidence Sufficient to Instruct in Tort Action on Driving Under Influence — Statutory Violation and Proximate Cause Instructions: During the course of a tort trial involving an automobile accident, some evidence was produced indicating the driver may have consumed some alcohol prior to the accident, and drug paraphernalia was found in his car. There was sufficient evidence to instruct the jury regarding driving under the influence. It was not error to give a jury instruction stating that a Montana statute makes it unlawful to drive under the influence because the instruction must be read in conjunction with other instructions, one of which provides that although conduct in violation of a statute constitutes negligence as a matter of law, such a violation is of no consequence unless it was the proximate cause of an injury suffered by the plaintiff. Foreman v. Minnie, 211 M 441, 689 P2d 1210, 41 St. Rep. 1478 (1984).

Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — “Easy to Charge but Difficult to Defend” Instruction Improper: The cautionary jury instruction providing that sexual intercourse without consent is an easy charge to make but is difficult to defend is an improper instruction. The Supreme Court, in holding that the instruction is an unwarranted and improper comment on the evidence which is not required by law or public policy, specifically overruled St. v. Smith, 187 M 245, 609 P2d 696, 37 St. Rep. 583 (1980). St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918, 41 St. Rep. 1293 (1984).

Conflicting Testimony — Substantial Credible Evidence — Sufficiency of Verdict: Plaintiff alleged defendant negligently failed to close a farm gate when returning a tractor to plaintiff, allowing plaintiff’s horses to escape onto a highway where they were subsequently killed. Plaintiff’s wife testified that defendant had admitted leaving a gate open. Defendant disputed this. Two boys who had accompanied the defendant testified that he had closed the gate. The Supreme Court held, on appeal, that there was substantial credible evidence to support the jury finding for defendant, and it refused to overturn the verdict on the basis of insufficiency. Brogan v. Blanchard, 200 M 399, 650 P2d 1390, 39 St. Rep. 1829 (1982).

Unjust Enrichment Instruction — When Error: The trial court erred in instructing jury that if the lessee of agricultural land expended money and labor on the strength of a provision in the lease agreement, which later became unenforceable, he could still recover either the cost or the value of the improvements he had placed on the land, under a theory of unjust enrichment. This instruction incorrectly permitted the jury to find for the lessee regardless of the meaning of the lease agreement. Overcast v. Akra, 197 M 276, 642 P2d 1058, 39 St. Rep. 558 (1982).

Required Instruction on Elements of Crime: Defendant was charged with theft after he sold an engine to cover an overdue repair bill. In the instructions the jury was told that each element of the crime as defined by statute had to be proved, but the jury was never instructed as to the statutory elements of the crime. Without a correct statement of the elements of the crime being presented to the jury, the Supreme Court found that defendant had not received a fair trial. St. v. Lundblade, 191 M 526, 625 P2d 545, 38 St. Rep. 441 (1981), followed in St. v. Forsyth, 197 M 248, 642 P2d 1035, 39 St. Rep. 540 (1982), and distinguished in St. v. Williams, 2015 MT 247, 380 Mont. 445, 358 P.3d 127.

Substantial Evidence to Support Verdict — Evidence to Support Contrary Findings Not Proper Consideration: The plaintiff offered evidence that a leaking pipe caused damage to a house. The defendant introduced evidence tending to show that the damage was caused by either melting snow or because of improper construction. The jury found that the evidence presented by the defendant was more credible. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that there was substantial evidence on which the jury could base its verdict. It is not the Supreme Court’s function to determine if there is sufficient evidence to support contrary findings. Judgment was affirmed. Cissel v. W. Plumbing and Heating, 188 M 149, 612 P2d 206, 37 St. Rep. 966 (1980).

Jury Not to Act Capriciously: Under this section, juries may not arbitrarily and capriciously disregard the testimony of witnesses, not only unimpeached in any of the usual modes known to the law, but supported by all the circumstances in the case. Haddox v. N. Pac. Ry., 43 M 8, 113 P 1119 (1911).

NUMBERS OF WITNESSES OR PRESUMPTIONS

Evidence Supporting Jury’s Verdict of Zero Damages for Lost Earning Capacity Resulting From Automobile Accident: Magart was injured in a collision with Schank, who admitted

negligently causing the accident. The case proceeded to jury trial on the issue of damages, and the jury awarded damages for everything except Magart's claim for lost earning capacity. Magart appealed, arguing that that portion of the verdict was not supported by substantial evidence and that the jury was required to find a loss of earning capacity because uncontroverted expert testimony at trial established that Magart suffered continuing shoulder problems because of his job duties that rendered him unable to continue his employment as a result of the injury. As a general rule, a jury may not disregard uncontradicted, credible nonopinion evidence, but this rule applies only to nonopinion lay witness testimony, and a jury may disregard expert testimony if it finds the testimony unpersuasive. In this case, the jury could reasonably have determined that future deterioration of Magart's shoulder, together with a concomitant inability to perform his job, was not reasonably certain to occur. Further, lay testimony from Magart's former employers implied that the shoulder injury did not impair the ability to perform the job and that Magart left employment not because of the injury but rather to accept different employment. This evidence, coupled with Schank's 23-minute videotape of Magart performing his current job without apparent difficulties, was sufficient to support the jury's verdict of zero damages for loss of earning capacity with regard to past and present employment. Magart v. Schank, 2000 MT 279, 302 M 151, 13 P3d 390, 57 St. Rep. 1167 (2000), distinguishing Tappan v. Higgins, 240 M 158, 783 P2d 396 (1989).

Improper Grant of Partial Summary Judgment on Issue of Whether Train Crew Gave Adequate Auditory Warning at Railroad Crossing — Party Without Memory of Accident: Mickelson was injured when the fire truck that he was driving was struck by a Montana Rail Link (MRL) train and sought damages. In its order granting partial summary judgment to MRL, the District Court ruled, as a matter of law, that the MRL train crew had properly sounded the train whistle and bell, in accordance with 69-14-562 (now repealed), and that because Mickelson had no memory of the accident, he could not produce any specific facts that presented a genuine issue worthy of trial. In the brief opposing summary judgment, Mickelson pointed out several inconsistencies in the testimony of the train crew that raised factual and credibility issues concerning the crew's story about how the accident occurred, particularly with regard to Mickelson's prior common practice of loading the fire truck in a particular manner, which conflicted with the crew's story. The Supreme Court held that the trial court committed reversible error by preventing the jury from deciding crucial factual and credibility issues regarding adequate auditory warnings, citing several cases that precluded summary judgment on whistle issues because of disputed facts. Mickelson v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2000 MT 111, 299 M 348, 999 P2d 985, 57 St. Rep. 446 (2000). See also Easterwood v. CSX Transp., Inc., 933 F2d 1548 (11th Cir. 1991), Bowman v. Norfolk S. Ry. Co., 832 F. Supp. 1014 (D. S.C. 1993), and Borden v. CSX Transp., Inc., 843 F. Supp. 1410 (M.D. Ala. 1993).

Effect of Uncontradicted Evidence: Where there is direct testimony in the record, uncontradicted by other direct testimony, a court or jury is not bound thereby and can render a decision contrary to such direct testimony based on adverse circumstantial evidence. Holenstein v. Andrews, 166 M 60, 530 P2d 476 (1975).

Rebuttal of Statutory Presumption:

Whether sworn testimony to the contrary is sufficient to rebut a statutory presumption is a question for the triers of fact to determine, except where the facts proved are overwhelmingly against the presumed facts and permit but one rational and reasonable conclusion. St. v. Rice, 134 M 265, 329 P2d 451 (1958); McMahon v. Cooney, 95 M 138, 25 P2d 131 (1933).

A statutory disputable presumption is satisfactory if uncontradicted. Whether sworn testimony to the contrary is sufficient to rebut such a statutory presumption is a question for the triers of fact to determine, except where the facts proved are overwhelmingly against the presumed facts and permit but one rational and reasonable conclusion. N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Gamer, 106 F2d 375 (9th Cir. 1939).

Trial Judge Determining Credibility — Nonjury Trial: In deciding the facts of a case, the trial judge could accept "the direct evidence of one witness who is entitled to full credit" to prove any fact and the trial judge was not bound to decide the facts in conformity with the declarations of any number of witnesses, who did not produce conviction in his mind, against a less number or against a presumption or other evidence satisfying his mind. Davis v. Burton, 128 M 434, 278 P2d 213 (1955).

Presumption Against Suicide: The presumption of an accidental death, rather than suicide, is indirect evidence, stands even though controverted, and must be given weight in determining the fact. Lewis v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 113 M 151, 124 P2d 579 (1942).

Jurors Judge of Credibility:

A preponderance of the evidence may be established by the testimony of a single witness against a greater number of witnesses who testify to the contrary, the jurors being the exclusive judges of their credibility. In re Silver's Estate, 98 M 141, 38 P2d 277 (1934); State ex rel. Bourquin v. Morris, 67 M 40, 214 P 332 (1923); Doane v. Marquisee, 63 M 166, 206 P 426 (1922).

The party seeking reformation of a contract on the ground of mistake has the burden of establishing his claim by a preponderance of the evidence, and such preponderance may be established by the plaintiff's own testimony as against that of a greater number of witnesses to the contrary. Ayers v. Buswell, 73 M 518, 238 P 591 (1925).

Application to Criminal Cases: The rule that preponderance of the evidence may be established by the testimony of a single witness against a greater number of witnesses who testify to the contrary applies with equal force in criminal cases in which the State must prove the facts beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Park, 88 M 21, 289 P 1037 (1930).

Party as Sole Witness: Since the burden of proof is not to be determined by the number of witnesses introduced and the direct evidence of one witness entitled to full credit is sufficient to prove any fact, the direct evidence of the plaintiff, upon whom was the burden of showing nonpayment of the certificate of deposit in suit, was sufficient to establish that fact. O'Langan v. First St. Bank of Hilger, 59 M 190, 196 P 149 (1921).

Rebuttal of Prima Facie Evidence: Where the presumption of negligence on the part of a railroad company in the killing of livestock by one of its trains, arising by virtue of the statute making the fact of the killing prima facie evidence of such negligence, is rebutted by testimony of its train operatives that there was not any negligence on their part, the result is a conflict of evidence resolvable by the jury under subsection (2) of this section. Johnson v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry., 52 M 73, 155 P 971 (1916).

Statutory Rape — Conflicting Testimony: Under subsection (2) of this section, the fact that prosecutrix was contradicted or that conflicting impeaching evidence was given against her would not overthrow a conviction of statutory rape. St. v. Peres, 27 M 358, 71 P 162 (1903).

PART OF TESTIMONY FALSE

Applicability to Administrative Proceeding — Irrelevant When No Jury: One of the witnesses in a hearing before the Montana Human Rights Commission gave testimony that was untruthful in part. The defendant argued that the hearing officer should have disregarded the witness's testimony pursuant to 26-1-303. The Supreme Court held that a jury instruction statute is irrelevant to proceedings before a hearing officer. KB Enterprises, LLC v. Mont. Human Rights Comm'n, 2019 MT 131, 396 Mont. 134, 443 P.3d 498.

Attorney Not Ineffective for Failure to Request Accomplice Jury Instruction — Defendant's Claims of Innocence Inconsistent With Instruction: The defendant was convicted of attempted deliberate homicide stemming from a stabbing incident involving three people. On appeal, he argued that his attorney was ineffective for not requesting an accomplice jury instruction for one of the witnesses allegedly involved. This witness was never charged for his actions stemming from the incident. The Supreme Court disagreed with the defendant, holding that the defendant's attorney was not ineffective because the accomplice instruction would have conflicted with the defendant's argument that he did not stab the victim. St. v. Root, 2015 MT 310, 381 Mont. 314, 359 P.3d 1088.

Proof of Crimes Charged — Proof of Ownership of Stolen Money — Disbelief of Portion of Witness' Testimony as Not Requiring Total Disbelief: Defendant charged with robbery and theft was convicted of theft but found not guilty of robbery. One ground of his appeal was the assertion that the prosecution's evidence was insufficient to prove theft. Defense counsel argued that the jury must have distrusted the testimony of the truckstop cashier who was held up because they found the defendant not guilty of robbery. Further, since the cashier's testimony was critical to prove a theft was committed, the evidence was insufficient to prove theft if the jury disbelieved the cashier. The Supreme Court dismissed this argument because sufficient disbelief of the cashier's testimony to find the defendant not guilty of robbery would not require the jury to disbelieve all of the cashier's testimony. The jury had instructions about its right to believe or disbelieve any portion of a witness' testimony. As long as there was substantial evidence to support the verdict, it will not be disturbed on appeal. The Supreme Court found sufficient evidence to convict here and sufficient evidence to refute the defendant's argument that the truckstop did not own the stolen money. Here, proof of possession sufficed to prove ownership because the defendant's jury instruction to that effect was accepted by the court. St. v. Dolan, 190 M 195, 620 P2d 355, 37 St. Rep. 1860 (1980).

Cautionary Instruction as to Evidence at End of Trial Instead of Immediately Following Admission of Evidence: A cautionary instruction given by a court to a jury concerning evidence of a modus operandi of a criminal defendant at the end of trial instead of immediately following admission of the evidence was not error. St. v. Strain, 190 M 44, 618 P2d 331, 37 St. Rep. 1763 (1980), distinguishing St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979).

Instruction Lacking "Corroborated" Phrase — Not Error:

Conviction would not be reversed for giving of instruction based on statute but including words "except insofar as it may be corroborated by other and credible evidence in the case", in absence of specific showing of prejudice. St. v. Rollins, 149 M 481, 428 P2d 462 (1967).

Court's instruction relative to the credibility of a witness who has sworn falsely, framed in strict compliance with subsection (3) of this section, may not be held error for failure to include the qualifying phrase "except insofar as corroborated by other testimony". St. v. Keays, 97 M 404, 34 P2d 855 (1934).

Distrust Rather Than Disregard Testimony: In separate maintenance action by wife where evidence on most points was in sharp conflict, if the court thought some of plaintiff's story incredible, the most it could have done was to treat the rest of her testimony with distrust and the court was not bound to disregard all of her testimony. Reynolds v. Reynolds, 132 M 303, 317 P2d 856 (1957).

Deliberate Falsity on One Point — Error to Reject All Testimony: Although court was satisfied that testimony on one point was deliberately false, it would only furnish grounds for distrusting other parts of the witness' testimony and would not necessarily call for a rejection of all of it. Sanders v. Sanders, 124 M 595, 229 P2d 164 (1951), explained in Poepping v. Monson, 138 M 38, 353 P2d 325, 354 P2d 183 (1960).

Isolated False Testimony — Error to Deny Recovery: The mere fact that plaintiff in a personal injury action may have testified falsely in one particular, standing alone, does not justify denial of recovery but under subsection (3) would simply warrant the jury in distrusting his testimony in other respects. McCulloch v. Horton, 105 M 531, 74 P2d 1, 114 ALR 823 (1937).

Instruction to Disregard Whole of Testimony — Error:

An instruction in robbery case that the jury could disregard the entire testimony of a witness believed by it to have willfully and deliberately testified falsely unless corroborated by other and credible evidence was prejudicially erroneous irrespective of defendant's admission of four previous convictions for felony. St. v. Hogan, 100 M 434, 49 P2d 446 (1935).

An instruction that where a witness has willfully testified falsely as to a material matter in the case, the jury may disregard any and all of his testimony, except insofar as it was corroborated by other credible evidence, was erroneous, the statute going no further than to provide that the jury may look with distrust upon the testimony of any witness found to have so testified and making no exception in favor of one who has been corroborated. Vande Veegaete v. Vande Veegaete, 75 M 52, 243 P 1082 (1925), explained in St. v. Hogan, 100 M 434, 49 P2d 446 (1935).

An instruction that the jury could disregard the entire testimony of any witness whom they believed to have deliberately testified falsely to any fact material to the issue, etc., was erroneous under subsection (3) of this section. St. v. Kanakaris, 54 M 180, 169 P 42 (1917), explained in St. v. Hogan, 100 M 434, 49 P2d 446 (1935).

An instruction charging the jury on a trial for murder that if they were satisfied that any witness had knowingly and willfully testified falsely in any material matter, they had the right to reject the whole of his testimony, "unless on any point such testimony is corroborated by the facts and circumstances of the case or other credible evidence", is an unauthorized restriction upon the discretionary power of the jury to reject testimony and should not be given in any case. St. v. Penna, 35 M 535, 90 P 787 (1907).

Discarding Any Evidence of Contract — Disbelief in Other Testimony: If the trial court believed the witnesses who testified disputing the performance by the appellants, then it found the testimony of the appellants with reference thereto was false; and a witness who is false in one part is to be distrusted in others. The only testimony from which it would have been possible for the trial court to have found the existence of the contracts, or either of them, was the testimony of the respective appellants as to their verbal contracts with the deceased. Therefore, if the trial court determined on the conflicting testimony that the appellants' testimony was not worthy of credit and was to be distrusted, there was no credible evidence in the record to warrant a finding in favor of the appellants or either of them. Langston v. Currie, 95 M 57, 26 P2d 160 (1933).

Dying Declaration — Instruction on Falsity Therein: Where in a homicide case a general instruction in the language of subsection (3) of this section was given, an offered instruction that if the jury found a dying declaration false in any material part they could reject it in its entirety was erroneous and properly refused. St. v. Le Duc, 89 M 545, 300 P 919 (1931).

Use of Instruction — When: Whether an instruction “that a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others” shall be given lies largely in the discretion of the trial court, not to be interfered with on appeal unless abuse thereof is shown. Russell v. Sunburst Ref. Co., 83 M 452, 272 P 998 (1928).

Instruction Omitting “Willfully” and “Material Matter” — Not Error:

An instruction that “a witness who testifies falsely in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others” is proper where it is apparent that false testimony has been given, and the court is not required to modify it by confining the rule to testimony willfully false as to a material matter. Hageman v. Arnold, 79 M 91, 254 P 1070 (1927).

On appeal from the judgment in a criminal case, it will be presumed, in the absence of the evidence, that the giving of an instruction in the language of subsection (3) of this section was warranted by the case as submitted. Such instruction is not erroneous for failure to insert the word “willfully” before the word “false” and the words “as to a material matter” after the word “testimony”. St. v. Connors, 37 M 15, 94 P 199 (1908). See also Shea v. U.S., 260 F 807 (9th Cir. 1919).

Favor to Witness Corroborated — Instruction Error: An instruction making an exception to the statutory rule that a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others, in favor of one who has been corroborated by other credible evidence, was error. St. v. Belland, 59 M 540, 197 P 841 (1921), explained in St. v. Hogan, 100 M 434, 49 P2d 446 (1935); Vande Veegaete v. Vande Veegaete, 75 M 52, 243 P 1082 (1925).

Jury Allowed to Disregard Testimony — Corroboration: As a statute affecting the province of the jury members in weighing evidence, subsection (3) of this section requires them to view with distrust the testimony of a witness who willfully swears falsely as to a material matter. They must distrust such a witness, and under their general power of passing upon the credibility to be attached to each witness, they may discard such testimony entirely, except insofar as it is corroborated by other credible evidence. St. v. De Wolfe, 29 M 415, 74 P 1084 (1904); Cameron v. Wentworth, 23 M 70, 57 P 648 (1899). See also St. v. Fuller, 34 M 12, 85 P 369 (1906); St. v. Lee, 34 M 584, 87 P 977 (1906).

Instruction Regarding Subsection — Limitation Required: Subsection (3) of this section does not authorize an instruction that a witness false in one part of his testimony is to be distrusted in others without limiting it to willfully false statements as to material matters. Ashley v. Rocky Mtn. Bell Tel. Co., 25 M 286, 64 P 765 (1901).

“Willful” and “Material” — Effect of Minor Errors in Testimony: Subsection (3) of this section is not applicable to unintentional errors or evidence given upon immaterial matters and without intent to deceive. Its sense is to require the jury to distrust only a witness who willfully swears falsely as to material matters, and it ought always to be given with the words “willfully” and “material” expressed as qualifications of the rule it declares. Cameron v. Wentworth, 23 M 70, 57 P 648 (1899), explained in St. v. Connors, 37 M 15, 94 P 199 (1908).

TESTIMONY OF PERSON LEGALLY ACCOUNTABLE

Failure to Offer Accomplice Instruction When Inconsistent With Theory of Defense — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: When a defendant’s attorney did not offer an accomplice instruction, the attorney acted within the range of reasonable professional assistance because the instruction was a tactical decision and the instruction would have been inconsistent with the defendant’s theory of complete innocence. Therefore, the attorney’s performance did not fall below an objective standard of reasonableness. St. v. Flowers, 2018 MT 96, 391 Mont. 237, 416 P.3d 180.

Father’s Conviction for Incest With Daughter Upheld — Accountability Inappropriate for Incest — Sufficient Corroborating Evidence: The defendant was convicted of incest with his 17-year-old daughter. The defendant appealed the incest conviction, arguing that his daughter was not a victim of the incest as the District Court had found, that she was legally accountable for the incest, and that as such the state was required to provide a jury instruction and evidence corroborating her testimony. The Supreme Court upheld the District Court; however, it disagreed with the District Court’s reasoning that the daughter was a victim, ruling that the statutory language did not require a victim under the circumstances of the case. Ultimately, the Supreme Court found that accountability did not apply because the father and daughter were two participants in incest, that the daughter was not legally accountable for her father’s incest, that the denial of the jury instruction was proper, and that the state presented sufficient evidence corroborating the daughter's testimony. St. v. Kline, 2016 MT 177, 384 Mont. 157, 376 P.3d 132.

Jury Instruction to View Testimony With Distrust Based on Accomplice Liability Not Allowed — Defense of Total Innocence Inconsistent With Proposed Instruction: The defendant was charged with abusing his girlfriend's 2-year-old child. After the child was injured, but before being taken to the hospital, the defendant brought the child to the home of the girlfriend's aunt and uncle, who briefly watched the child. At trial, the defendant claimed that the girlfriend was responsible for the child's injuries. After the aunt and uncle testified against him, the defendant proposed a jury instruction to direct the jury to view the aunt and uncle's testimony with distrust under 26-1-303 because, he argued, they were legally accountable for the child's injuries. The District Court did not allow the jury instruction. After his conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the decision and agreed that the defendant's defense of total innocence precluded the jury instruction that the aunt and uncle were accomplices. St. v. Charlo-Whitworth, 2016 MT 157, 384 Mont. 50, 373 P.3d 845.

Failure of Counsel to Request Instruction on Accomplice Testimony Constituting Ineffective Assistance of Counsel — Failure of Court to Give Instruction Prejudicial: Koug1 was convicted of operating an unlawful clandestine laboratory and subsequently appealed on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel. The state's case was based largely on the testimony on three accomplices. At trial, both the prosecution and defense counsel pointed out to the jury in closing arguments that accomplice testimony should be viewed with suspicion because of the accomplices' criminal conduct and the deals that they cut with the state. However, Koug1's counsel did not request a jury instruction that accomplice testimony ought to be viewed with distrust and that it must be corroborated. Applying the Strickland test for effective assistance of counsel, the Supreme Court found that Koug1's counsel's failure to request the instructions constituted a failure to use the law to strike at the heart of the state's case, and because there was no plausible explanation for not asking for the instructions, counsel's performance was deficient and the first prong of Strickland was satisfied. Further, the trial court failed its duty to instruct the jury on the law, which is a duty that may not be delegated to counsel because what the court tells the jury carries the force of law, while counsel's comments do not. Thus, the second prong of Strickland requiring a showing of prejudice was also satisfied because if the jury had been properly instructed, there was a reasonable probability that it would have arrived at a different outcome. Therefore, Koug1 received ineffective assistance of counsel, and Koug1's conviction was reversed. St. v. Koug1, 2004 MT 243, 323 M 6, 97 P.3d 1095 (2004), following St. v. Rose, 1998 MT 342, 292 M 350, 972 P.2d 321 (1998), followed in St. v. Johnston, 2008 MT 318, 346 M 93, 193 P.3d 925 (2008), and St. v. Johnston, 2010 MT 152, 357 Mont. 46, 237 P.3d 70, and overruled in part in St. v. Maynard, 2010 MT 115, 356 Mont. 333, 233 P.3d 331.

Record Connecting Defendant With Alleged Accomplice — Jury Instruction on Accomplice Testimony Proper: Trial testimony indicated that the defendant had an accomplice and that one of his witnesses may have been the accomplice. The trial court instructed the jury that if the jury found the witness was the accomplice, his testimony must be corroborated by other evidence, but the court did not require the jury to make that finding. Because the record connected the actions of the defendant and his witness, it was not error to give the instruction on accomplice testimony. St. v. West, 245 M 298, 800 P.2d 1047, 47 St. Rep. 2129 (1990).

Receiver of Stolen Property Not Accomplice: The defendant in a burglary trial argued that the jury should have been instructed to view with distrust the testimony against him given by a witness who had received some of the stolen property. The Supreme Court ruled that one receiving stolen property is not an accomplice and no jury instruction was needed. St. v. Moreno, 241 M 359, 787 P.2d 334, 47 St. Rep. 351 (1990).

Failure to Give Mandatory Accomplice Jury Instruction — Harmless Error — Not Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: In petitioner's trial on the charge of attempted deliberate homicide, his lawyer withdrew a previous request, in a jury instruction mandated by 26-1-303, that testimony of an accomplice must be viewed with distrust. Petitioner's theory of defense was that his alleged accomplices had fabricated their testimony. The judge did instruct the jury that testimony of accomplices must be corroborated. In a proceeding for postconviction relief, the Supreme Court ruled that the court's failure to give the mandatory instruction was harmless error and that the withdrawal by petitioner's lawyer of the request for the mandatory instruction was not ineffective assistance of counsel under Strickland v. Wash., 466 US 668, 80 L Ed 2d 674, 104 S Ct 2052 (1984). Petition of Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P.2d 1100, 42 St. Rep. 1508 (1985).

Accomplice Testimony Instruction Required: Because the language of this section is mandatory, in a trial involving accomplice (now "person legally accountable") testimony, it is reversible error to fail to instruct the jury that such testimony must be viewed with distrust. St. v. Laubach, 201 M 226, 653 P2d 844, 39 St. Rep. 2074 (1982), followed in Bishop v. St., 254 M 100, 835 P2d 732, 49 St. Rep. 650 (1992), and overruled in St. v. Johnson, 257 M 157, 848 P2d 496, 50 St. Rep. 209 (1993), concerning mandatory giving of instruction.

Testimony of Accomplice: Jury instruction simply stating that the testimony of a person accountable for the same crime as the defendant ought to be viewed with distrust is sufficient. Rejection by the trial court of defendant's offered instruction emphasizing that accomplice's testimony is "particularly suspect" was not error. St. v. Forsyth, 197 M 248, 642 P2d 1055, 39 St. Rep. 540 (1982), followed in St. v. Anderson, 197 M 374, 643 P2d 564, 39 St. Rep. 629 (1982).

Accomplice as a Matter of Law — Insufficient Corroborating Evidence — Directed Verdict Required: The defendant was charged with suppressing evidence in connection with the investigation of his son on a deliberate homicide charge. The case against the defendant was based entirely on the testimony of Hopkins, who testified that the defendant gave him a pistol that belonged to the homicide suspect and asked him to dispose of it. Hopkins kept the pistol for 5 months before turning it over to the police. The court concluded that if the jury inferred from the evidence that the defendant intended to suppress the evidence then it would have to infer that the same intent existed for Hopkins. That would make Hopkins an accomplice as a matter of law. Since there was no corroborating evidence to support the testimony of Hopkins, the District Court should have entered a judgment of acquittal. St. v. Warren, 192 M 436, 628 P2d 292, 38 St. Rep. 773 (1981).

Instruction — Section Considered by Jury: Where the court gave a defendant's instruction quoting this section verbatim in a criminal case, it may be assumed that the instruction was considered by the jury in weighing the evidence. St. v. Barick, 143 M 273, 389 P2d 170 (1964).

Affects Weight — Not Admissibility: An accomplice is treated as any other witness, except that his credibility may be affected by the fact that he is charged with the same offense as the person against whom he testifies; his testimony that tends to connect the defendant with the commission of the offense is admissible, but its weight is for the jury. St. v. Harmon, 135 M 227, 340 P2d 128 (1959).

Instruction on Determination of Accomplice — May Be Prerequisite: Where the defense requested instructions as to the effect of accomplice's testimony and there was evidence in the record from which the jury might have concluded that a Deputy Sheriff was an accomplice of the defendant, the court should have instructed the jury that if they believed the Deputy Sheriff was an accomplice then they must weigh his evidence as provided by this section and that such evidence must be corroborated as required by section 94-7220, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed, similar to 46-16-213). St. v. Porter, 125 M 503, 242 P2d 984 (1952).

Character of Oral Admissions as Evidence: Statements as to declarations or admissions made by another are the weakest and least satisfactory character of evidence in persuasive value and should be received with great caution. Linn v. French, 97 M 292, 33 P2d 1002 (1934); Escallier v. Great N. Ry., 46 M 238, 127 P 458 (1912). See also Gauss v. Trump, 48 M 92, 135 P 910 (1913).

Instruction — Use of Subsection: Refusal of an offered instruction that the uncorroborated testimony of an accomplice should be received with great caution was not error, where the court had advised the jury, pursuant to subsection (4) of this section, that the testimony of an accomplice ought to be viewed with distrust. St. v. Lyford, 87 M 325, 287 P 214 (1930).

Careful Scrutiny Advised: Oral admissions of a party should be viewed with caution and subjected to careful scrutiny, no other class of testimony affording such opportunities for unscrupulous witnesses to distort the facts or to commit open perjury. Sylvain v. Page, 84 M 424, 276 P 16, 63 ALR 528 (1929).

Admission by One Now Deceased: Evidence of oral admissions must be viewed with caution, especially so where the party alleged to have made the admission is dead. Humble v. St. John, 72 M 519, 234 P 475 (1925).

Oral Admission — Instruction: Though the propriety of giving an instruction in the words of subsection (4) of this section is a matter of discretion in the trial court, refusal to give it was error in a case which hinged on an oral admission by defendant testified to by plaintiff and only one other witness. McCrimmon v. Murray, 43 M 457, 117 P 73 (1911).

CASES DECIDED UNDER SUBSECTION (5)

Criminal Defendant's Proposed Instruction — Jury to Consider State's Failure to Produce Evidence — Refusal Not Error: In a criminal homicide trial, it was not error for the District Court to refuse defendant's instruction to the effect that the jury could consider the State's failure to call a witness or produce other particular evidence. The defendant based his right to the instruction on his contention that several weapons discussed in the trial were not introduced into evidence and a witness was not called on rebuttal. The Supreme Court held his instruction went to how the jury should weigh the evidence, a concept different from that in civil cases provided in subsection (5) of this section. St. v. Daniels, 210 M 1, 682 P2d 173, 41 St. Rep. 880 (1984), followed in St. v. Longstreth, 1999 MT 204, 295 M 457, 984 P2d 157, 56 St. Rep. 795 (1999).

Failure to Produce Partnership Records: In action by administrator of estate of deceased partner against surviving partners to recover assets transferred by the deceased during his last illness, evidence that deceased had a half interest in the partnership cattle and failure of defendants to produce any of the partnership records at the trial in the lower court sustained finding that heir of deceased had overcome the prima facie showing of one-third interest in the partnership cattle arising from the recording of the brand in name of three persons. Marshall v. Minschmidt, 148 M 263, 419 P2d 486 (1966).

Failure to Introduce Own Land Survey: In an action to quiet title and establish a boundary, where the plaintiff and the defendant each had a survey made but the defendant did not produce any evidence of his survey, the court was justified in finding the survey as made by the plaintiff correct. Reel v. Walter, 131 M 382, 309 P2d 1027 (1957).

Failure to Call Participant: Where the president of an alleged political club in the name of which beer, etc., was dispensed in behalf of a candidate for office was not called as a witness in behalf of the candidate in an action to have him ousted for violation of the Corrupt Practices Act (since repealed), the trial court was justified in applying the provisions of subsection (5) of this section. Kommers v. Palagi, 111 M 293, 108 P2d 208 (1940).

Failure to Call Witness: Where the State had a witness in a criminal case present in the courtroom who might have contradicted the otherwise unimpeached testimony of defendant's witnesses but failed to put him on the stand, the jury in weighing the evidence should, under this section, have taken into consideration the State's failure in that behalf. St. v. Neely, 90 M 199, 300 P 561 (1931).

Interpretation of Subsections: Where a party has it within his power to introduce stronger and more satisfactory evidence than that offered by him, the evidence produced should be viewed with distrust. State ex rel. Foot v. Farmers' & Mechanics' St. Bank, 85 M 256, 278 P 828 (1929).

Part 4 Burdens of Proof

Part Case Notes

Circumstantial Evidence Sufficient for Conviction: A guard at the Montana State Prison was struck in the back by two handmade darts. The defendant's fingerprints were on the darts, and a plastic tube in the defendant's cell was loose and capable of being removed from the wall. The tube could be used to shoot the darts. The defendant had threatened the guard and was in a position to hit the guard with the darts. Based on this evidence, the defendant was convicted of assault. The defendant argued on appeal that the State failed to meet its burden of proof because it failed to produce an eyewitness to the assault. The Supreme Court held that although the State's case was based on circumstantial evidence, it was sufficient to meet its burden of proof. St. v. Shurtliff, 195 M 213, 635 P2d 1294, 38 St. Rep. 1798 (1981).

Amendment of Information to Greater Offense — Not Unconstitutional Shifting of Burden: Appealing her conviction of deliberate homicide, the defendant claimed that the information, which had first charged her with mitigated deliberate homicide but was later amended, constituted an unconstitutional shifting of the burden to the defendant to prove an element of mitigated deliberate homicide because one justification for the motion to amend the information was the fact that the defendant had failed to supply the State with the names of witnesses who would justify retaining the lesser offense; when it allows affirmative defenses at all, the State may regulate the burden of producing evidence and the burden of persuasion as long as it does not thereby shift to the defendant its own burden of proof as to each of the elements of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Sorenson, 190 M 155, 619 P2d 1185, 37 St. Rep. 1834 (1980).

Suppression of Defendant's Confession — When Miranda Warning Inadequate — Voluntariness: Appellant's statement was admitted into evidence erroneously for two reasons. First, the State failed to prove the voluntariness of appellant's confession at the suppression hearing by a preponderance of the evidence. When the State fails to show that appellant was advised of his Miranda rights or that appellant made the statement attributed to him or fails to introduce any evidence other than the evidence showing that the appellant had the mental capacity to make a voluntary statement, a finding that the State has carried its burden of proving voluntariness by a preponderance of the evidence is clearly against the weight of the evidence and must be overturned. Second, the Miranda warning allegedly given appellant was inadequate. The language “we have no way of giving you a lawyer, but one will be appointed for you, if and when you go to court”, was held confusing. Because the confession “undoubtedly weighed heavily in the minds of the jurors in finding [the] appellant guilty”, conviction was reversed. St. v. Dess, 184 M 116, 602 P2d 142, 36 St. Rep. 1929 (1979).

26-1-401. Who has burden of producing evidence.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1983 Amendment: Substituted “The initial burden of producing evidence as to a particular fact is on the party who would be defeated if no evidence were given on either side.” for “The party holding the affirmative of the issue must produce the evidence to prove it; therefore, the burden of proof lies on the party who would be defeated if no evidence were given on either side.”; and inserted second sentence concerning subsequent burden of producing evidence.

Case Notes

Termination of Visitation Agreement — Correctly Classified as Grandparent Visitation Agreement and Not Parental Visitation Agreement: The grandparents filed a petition for a parental interest determination after the mother moved to North Dakota with the child. Following mediation, the parties signed an agreement that allowed the child to live with the mother and gave day-to-day decisionmaking to the mother, but specifying certain visitation rights for the grandparents. Years later, the grandparents filed contempt motions, requesting that the District Court enforce the parties’ agreement. The District Court eventually terminated the agreement, finding that it was a grandparent visitation agreement subject to modification and termination and not a parental visitation agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the agreement was correctly classified and that the District Court correctly terminated the grandparents’ visitation. King v. Chilcott, 2020 MT 224, 401 Mont. 204, 472 P.3d 155.

Relevance of Criminal and Character Evidence in Wrongful Discharge: Dean’s employment as an administrative assistant to the Board of County Commissioners was terminated following the discovery of Dean’s involvement in a marijuana business and subsequent arrest. Dean subsequently sued the county for its negligent hiring of the officer who was involved in the drug investigation, for unlawful arrest and imprisonment, for wrongful discharge, and for malicious prosecution. A jury found for the county on all claims, and Dean appealed. The Supreme Court considered the evidence related to each claim and affirmed. The county’s actions in hiring the officer who was involved in the investigation were irrelevant as to whether Dean was falsely arrested, and evidence related to the hiring was properly excluded. Likewise, evidence gathered after Dean’s arrest concerning Dean’s personal drug use, although not admissible as evidence of false arrest, was relevant to a determination of whether Dean was wrongfully discharged or terminated for good cause and was properly admitted. Evidence in the record was substantial that probable cause existed to arrest Dean, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of Dean’s drug use and connection to persons involved in the marijuana business. Dean v. Sanders County, 2009 MT 88, 350 M 8, 204 P3d 722 (2009).

Signature Gathering Process Permeated by Pervasive and General Pattern and Practice of Fraud and Procedural Noncompliance — Votes for Ballot Issues Not to Be Counted: The District Court held that signature gatherers for three ballot measures engaged in a pervasive and general pattern and practice of fraud and procedural noncompliance. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that: (1) signature gatherers executed affidavits submitting signatures that were gathered outside the signature gatherers’ presence in violation of 13-27-111 (now repealed) and 13-27-302; (2) 43 signature gatherers gave false or fictitious addresses in their certification affidavits in violation of 13-27-111 and 13-27-302; and (3) a significantly large number of signature gatherers engaged in a fraudulent bait-and-switch tactic to induce people who knowingly signed one petition to unknowingly sign the other two petitions. Once opponents established the deceptive practices, it was the proponents’ burden to produce evidence to the contrary, but the proponents failed to do so. The District Court was affirmed, and because the signatures gathered in violation of the procedural safeguards tainted the initiative process, the Supreme Court ordered that votes on the ballot measures not be counted to the extent that was technically feasible or, if the votes were counted, that the votes would have no force or effect. Montanans for Justice: Vote No on CI-98 v. St., 2006 MT 277, 334 M 237, 146 P3d 759 (2006).

Burden of Proof on Party Asserting Claim in Contested Case Hearing to Present Evidence That Department Decision Violated Law: Plaintiffs requested a hearing before the Board of Environmental Review, contending that an air quality permit issued by the Department of Environmental Quality for a coal-fired power plant and the application for the permit suffered from various procedural and substantive deficiencies. The Board held a contested case hearing and, after establishing that plaintiffs had the burden of proof, approved the Department's decision to grant the permit. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed that, as the party asserting the claim in the contested case, plaintiffs had the burden of presenting evidence necessary to establish the fact that the Department's decision violated the law. Mont. Env'tl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2005 MT 96, 326 M 502, 112 P3d 964 (2005).

Failure to Prove Amount of Damages for Replacement Tail Insurance Coverage: A doctor was suspended from employment with a health care facility and was informed that the facility had removed her from the medical malpractice insurance that covered the clinic doctors. There was no immediate indication whether the doctor continued to be covered under the facility's policy for tail coverage, which is the portion of the policy that would cover any potential claims made against the doctor in the future related to the doctor's practice while employed at the facility, although the facility later contended that the doctor was in fact covered by the facility's tail insurance. Nevertheless, in order to cover her tail insurance, the doctor subsequently purchased her own malpractice insurance that included tail insurance for the time that she was employed at the clinic and later contended that the facility should be liable in damages for the cost of the replacement insurance. However, no evidence was presented to indicate a specific amount in the doctor's replacement insurance that related to the cost of tail insurance. Unable to prove that she incurred damages when she believed that she was without tail coverage, no damages were awarded. Marias Healthcare Serv., Inc. v. Turenne, 2001 MT 127, 305 M 419, 28 P3d 491 (2001).

Failure to Provide Sufficient Evidence That Employee Not Fully Compensated: A doctor claimed that a health care facility did not pay full compensation owing under an employment contract, that monthly income was miscalculated, and that a cost of living increase was not included in the base salary. As evidence of underpayment, the doctor provided payment stubs representing a portion of the monthly compensation. However, the District Court held that the doctor presented incomplete evidence by which to determine whether the doctor was underpaid in terms of the total monthly compensation package. The Supreme Court agreed. The compensation provisions were intentionally flexible for tax purposes and designed to benefit the doctor by withholding certain claims from paychecks. The doctor presented no evidence as to the appropriate or required monthly level of compensation, accounting for Social Security, workers' compensation or other withholding, or the favorable tax benefits that would adequately demonstrate whether the health care facility provided adequate compensation. Marias Healthcare Serv., Inc. v. Turenne, 2001 MT 127, 305 M 419, 28 P3d 491 (2001).

Motion to Dismiss on Grounds of Insufficient Evidence Properly Denied: When it was clear from the record that a reasonable juror could have concluded from the evidence taken in a light most favorable to the prosecution that guilt on several counts was proved beyond a reasonable doubt, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying defendant's motion for a directed verdict of acquittal, and further prosecution was not barred on double jeopardy grounds. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000). See also St. v. Bromgard, 261 M 291, 862 P2d 1140 (1993), and St. v. Campbell, 278 M 236, 924 P2d 1304 (1996).

Antenuptial Agreement Enforceable if Contract Conditions Met — Burden of Surviving Spouse to Prove Invalidity of Waiver and Absence of Fair Disclosure: Generally, an antenuptial agreement is valid and enforceable between two consenting parties if the agreement meets the requirements of a contract. Under this section, the party asserting a right in a case bears the burden of proving each of the material allegations of the cause of action. Thus, antenuptial agreements receive the same scrutiny as any other contract, except that there is an additional requirement of fair disclosure imposed on both parties in recognition of the confidential relationship between them. Therefore, the burden is on the surviving spouse to prove an invalid contractual waiver and to prove the absence of fair disclosure. Here, the surviving wife did not meet these burdens of proof, and the District Court did not err in holding that an antenuptial agreement was valid, precluding the wife from collecting a homestead allowance, an exempt property allowance, a family allowance, or an elective share from the husband's estate. Wiley v. Iverson, 1999 MT 214, 295 M 511, 985 P2d 1176, 56 St. Rep. 838 (1999). See also In re Estate of Lopata, 641 P2d 952 (Colo. 1982), and In re Estate of Thies, 273 M 272, 903 P2d 186, 52 St. Rep. 970 (1995).

Denial of Contractual Liability by Both Defendant Entities — Claims Put in Issue — Burden of Proof — Proposed Findings to Be Based Upon Evidence — No Evidence of Intent to Mislead as Basis for Relief From Judgment: Wright Oil sued Goodrich for petroleum products allegedly delivered but not paid for. Goodrich denied liability, claiming that the products were for the use of West Yellowstone Snowmobile Rentals, Inc. (WYSR), which owned Westgate Texaco, operated by Goodrich. Wright Oil amended its complaint to include WYSR, and after a bench trial, the District Court held against Goodrich because no evidence had been presented proving a contract between WYSR and Wright Oil. Wright Oil then filed a motion for relief from judgment under former Rule 60(b)(6), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), seeking relief from the District Court's failure to hold against WYSR. On the basis of evidence not presented at trial, the District Court granted the motion and ordered an evidentiary hearing to reopen the case against WYSR regarding WYSR's contractual liability to Wright Oil. WYSR appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly granted the motion because the circumstances of the District Court's failure to hold WYSR liable for the debt to Wright Oil were not so extraordinary as to warrant relief from judgment under former Rule 60(b)(6). The Supreme Court noted that WYSR's denial of its liability put the allegation of its contractual liability at issue under former Rule 8(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and under 26-1-402 and this section, Wright Oil had the burden of going forward with the evidence of WYSR's contractual liability but failed to present evidence of a contractual relationship between WYSR and Wright Oil. The fact that Goodrich alleged that WYSR was liable for the debt could not, the Supreme Court held, be taken as an admission by WYSR that it was liable for the amounts due. Further, the Supreme Court noted that Wright Oil should not have been surprised by WYSR's proposed findings of fact that it was not liable for the debt because under former Rule 52(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), a party's proposed findings of fact must be supported by the evidence, and Wright Oil failed to produce that evidence of liability. Wright Oil & Tire Co. v. Goodrich, 284 M 6, 942 P2d 128, 54 St. Rep. 811 (1997).

"Confusion Doctrine" Properly Considered — Specific Pleading Not Required — Burden of Proof: Gentry was arrested for DUI and raised the "confusion doctrine" — that he was confused over his right to counsel at the time that he was required to submit to a Breathalyzer test (see Blomeyer v. St., 264 M 414, 871 P2d 1338 (1994)). The Supreme Court held that the District Court was limited by 61-8-403 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) to consideration of only three issues and that because one of those issues was whether the person refused to take the test, the confusion doctrine was properly considered by the District Court because it relates to whether a true "refusal to submit" to the test was made. The Supreme Court also held that the doctrine need not be specifically pleaded but that the burden remains on the petitioner to prove that the license suspension was invalid. Gentry v. St., 282 M 491, 938 P2d 693, 54 St. Rep. 450 (1997).

Burden of Proof on Driver to Prove Invalidity of Revocation: Because there is a presumption of correctness to the state's action of revocation of a driver's license until otherwise shown to be improper, the burden of proof falls on the driver to prove the invalidity of the state's action rather than to require the state to justify its act of revocation. Jess v. St., 255 M 254, 841 P2d 1137, 49 St. Rep. 951 (1992), followed in In re License Revocation of Gildersleeve, 283 M 479, 942 P2d 705, 54 St. Rep. 735 (1997).

Disclosure of Rebuttal Witness Not Required: The law does not require the advance disclosure of rebuttal witnesses. Valley Properties Ltd. Partnership v. Steadman's Hardware, Inc., 251 M 242, 824 P2d 250, 49 St. Rep. 13 (1992), citing Massman v. Helena, 237 M 234, 773 P2d 1206 (1989). See also Lutz v. Nat'l Crane Corp., 267 M 368, 884 P2d 455, 51 St. Rep. 810 (1994).

No Error for Refusal to Allow Rebuttal Testimony: In a case involving the destruction of a building by fire, the trial court did not err in refusing to allow a retired firefighter to give his expert opinion on behalf of the plaintiffs during rebuttal testimony concerning the alleged negligent firefighting methods employed by the defendant city firefighters. The proposed testimony related to the issue of whether the city negligently fought the fire and was not a new matter raised by the defense; it was one of the main issues raised by the plaintiffs in their complaint. Having failed during their case in chief to meet the burden of proving that the defendant negligently fought the fire, the plaintiffs cannot then assert that the city's alleged negligent firefighting was a new issue first raised by the defense and open to rebuttal testimony. Massman v. Helena, 237 M 234, 773 P2d 1206, 46 St. Rep. 764 (1989).

Prima Facie Case Showing No Substantial Change in Evidence — Attack of Chain of Evidence at Trial: Defendant questioned whether evidence was properly admitted without the state's establishing a proper chain of evidence. Extensive testimony chronicled the labeling, storing, securing, transferring of possession, and testing of each exhibit. The state made a prima facie case showing that there had been no substantial change in the evidence, and defendant failed to produce any evidence to show if actual or even potential tampering could have occurred. Additionally, defendant vigorously attacked the chain of evidence at trial; thus, the jury had an opportunity to weigh this evidence. The Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Burdens of Proof in Case Involving Claimed Breach of Fiduciary Duty by Union Officers: In a dispute between a union and its former business managers, the District Court gave a general instruction that the party who asserts the affirmative of an issue has the burden of proving that issue by a preponderance of the evidence. The court further instructed the jury that if a fiduciary profits personally from the use of union funds, the burden shifts to the fiduciary to show he acted reasonably. Finally, the court instructed that a person with the duty to keep proper accounts has the burden of proving that he is entitled to the credits he claims. These instructions were consistent, clear, and accurate. Local Union No. 400 v. Bosh, 220 M 304, 715 P2d 36, 43 St. Rep. 388 (1986), followed in Luke v. Gager, 2000 MT 377, 303 M 474, 16 P3d 377, 57 St. Rep. 1599 (2000).

Break in Chain of Evidence Alleged — Burden of Proof: In a prosecution for deliberate homicide in which the defendant's fingerprints were found at the crime scene and the defendant objected to admission of the fingerprint evidence on the basis of an alleged break in the chain of evidence, which occurred because there could have been a master key that could have been used to gain access to the evidence, the court did not err in overruling the defendant's objection to the evidence. Once the State has shown prima facie that there has been no tampering or alteration of an exhibit, the burden of proving alteration shifts to the defendant. The speculation by the defendant is insufficient to meet the burden requiring proof of alteration. St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Assert Right — Carry Burden: Under this section, the party asserting a right in any case has the burden of proving each of the material allegations of his cause of action. D & K Distrib. v. Ford, 189 M 505, 616 P2d 1097, 37 St. Rep. 1693 (1980); McDonald v. Peters, 128 M 241, 272 P2d 730 (1954); Tucker v. Missoula Light & Ry., 77 M 91, 250 P 11 (1926); De Sandro v. Missoula Light & Water Co., 48 M 226, 136 P 711 (1913).

Jury Instructions on Diminished Capacity Defense — Constitutionality — Burden of Proof on Defendant: Under 46-14-201 (prior to the 1979 amendment) (renumbered 46-14-214), the State required the defendant to prove his legal insanity. Defendant objected, however, to the jury instruction on mental disease or defect (diminished capacity), saying it unconstitutionally shifted the burden to him to disprove intent, an essential element of the crime charged. Because psychiatric evaluation as to subtle gradations of mental impairment is highly subjective and not within the common experience of the layman juror, the State may in fairness require a defendant to convince the jury of his diminished capacity by a preponderance of the evidence. The State meticulously proved the facts constituting the deliberate homicide and aggravated kidnapping crimes beyond any reasonable doubt, based on all the evidence, including the evidence of defendant's alleged mental disease or defect. The State could then refuse constitutionally to sustain the affirmative defense of diminished capacity unless the defendant proved that defense by a preponderance of the evidence. The instructions here required defendant to establish his diminished capacity by raising a reasonable doubt, rather than by proof by a preponderance of the evidence. They posited a more liberal burden of proof than that to which the defendant was entitled. The instructions were, therefore, constitutional. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428, 37 St. Rep. 325 (1980).

Distribution of Property Based on Fraud — Burden of Proof: Where appellants alleged that a decree of distribution of the decedent's estate was based on a fraudulently obtained consent decree, the District Court's decree was proper, as the appellants failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that they would have taken more under the will but for the alleged fraud. Estate of Wallace v. McAlear, 186 M 18, 606 P2d 136, 37 St. Rep. 158 (1980).

Burden of Producing Evidence — Affirmative Defense to Res Ipsa: Based on language in Sweeney v. Erving, 228 US 233, 240 (1913), the Montana Supreme Court held that a res ipsa case does not put the defendant in a position of having to prove an affirmative defense to escape liability. Helmke v. Goff, 182 M 494, 597 P2d 1131, 36 St. Rep. 1104 (1979).

Burden of Producing Evidence — Prima Facie Case for Plaintiff: Once a discharged hospital employee had established that her discharge was brought about in substantial part by her refusal to participate in a sterilization, it then became the burden of the hospital to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that it would have discharged the employee even if she had not exercised her right of refusal. Swanson v. St. John's Lutheran Hosp., 182 M 414, 597 P2d 702, 36 St. Rep. 1075 (1979).

Products Liability — Burden of Proof: Summary judgment for defendant was proper when plaintiff failed to prove that product was defective at the time it left manufacturer's hands. Barich v. Ottenstror, 170 M 38, 550 P2d 395, 33 St. Rep. 481 (1976).

Failure to Prove Burden — Defeats Plaintiff's Claim: Plaintiff had burden of proof that disputed range rights were based on land other than that purchased jointly by plaintiff and defendant, and failure so to prove defeated plaintiff's claim that defendants were not entitled to one-half the appraised value of the range rights. Watson v. Barnard, 155 M 75, 469 P2d 539 (1970).

Partial Payment as Affirmative Defense: Partial payment by special deposit was an affirmative defense which debtor had burden of proving in suit on note; that burden of proof required that it be shown that payment was made on the particular obligation in controversy. Baker Nat'l Bank v. Lestar, 153 M 45, 453 P2d 774 (1969).

Allegation of Notice — Burden of Proof: Where plaintiff alleged giving of notice that defendant denied, notice or lack thereof was put in issue and plaintiff had burden of proof. Glacier Gen. Assurance Co. v. St. Farm Mut. Auto Ins. Co., 150 M 452, 436 P2d 533 (1968).

Negligence — Proof of Due Care: Where plaintiff's property was damaged by the dropping of fire retardant from airplanes and at the trial he failed to come forth with sufficient evidence to show lack of due care under the circumstances, the trial court properly nonsuited plaintiff upon defendant's motion. Stocking v. Johnson Flying Serv., 143 M 61, 387 P2d 312 (1963).

Res Ipsa Loquitur — Burden on Plaintiff: Res ipsa loquitur does not relieve the plaintiff of the burden of proving actionable negligence, nor is it sufficient that he show that he was injured and that the instrumentality which caused his injury was in the control of the defendant; he must also show that the accident would not have occurred in the ordinary course of events if the defendant had exercised due care. Stocking v. Johnson Flying Serv., 143 M 61, 387 P2d 312 (1963).

Mandamus: On application for Writ of Mandate in the District Court, in establishing the facts of his case, the petitioner is required to do no more than to show that the material allegations of his complaint are sustained by a preponderance of the evidence. State ex rel. Phillips v. Ford, 116 M 190, 151 P2d 171 (1944).

Alteration of Contract — Presumption: The presumption that the purchaser in a contract to purchase real property consented to alteration by addition of his wife's name as a purchaser could be overcome by the denial of an interested witness, and the court could take into consideration all available presumptions tending to corroborate the testimony of either, the interest of each, credibility, etc., and pass upon the weight of the evidence. Kern v. Eichhorn, 111 M 171, 107 P2d 873 (1940).

Proof That Defendant Used Excessive Force — Burden of Plaintiff Trespasser: Court erred in giving instruction that burden of proof rested upon defendant to justify means employed in trying to evict plaintiff when plaintiff and her husband were trespassers and contributed in provoking an alleged assault by defendant. The burden of proof is upon plaintiff to prove that force used by defendant in repelling trespass was excessive. Vaughn v. Mesch, 107 M 498, 87 P2d 177, 123 ALR 1106 (1939).

Ratification: Plaintiffs, by alleging ratification and issue being joined thereon by the defendants, assumed the burden of proof of that fact. Arnold v. Genzberger, 96 M 358, 31 P2d 296 (1934).

Marriage: While the right of dower (since eliminated) was favored in the law, the burden of establishing the existence of a valid marriage as the basis of that right rested upon the person asserting it. Shepherd & Pierson Co. v. Baker, 81 M 185, 262 P 887 (1927).

Life Insurance Fraud: Where a life insurance policy provided that the contract should not become effective unless the first premium had been paid and the policy issued during the "continuance in good health" of the insured, it being admitted that the first premium was paid, the widow was entitled to judgment on the policy in the absence of evidence tending to establish fraud upon which alone the defendant relied to avoid the contract; and the burden to show such fraud was on the defendant. Pelican v. Mut. Life Ins. Co., 44 M 277, 119 P 778 (1911).

Right to Use Water: If one asserts himself to be the owner of the right to use waters, the burden is on him to prove it. Smith v. Duff, 39 M 374, 102 P 981 (1909).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1983 Amendment: Substituted "Except as otherwise provided by law, a party has the burden of persuasion as to each fact the existence or nonexistence of which is essential to the claim for relief or defense he is asserting." for "Each party must prove his own affirmative allegations. Evidence need not be given in support of a negative allegation, except when such negative allegation is an essential part of the statement of the right or title on which the cause of action is founded, nor even in such case when the allegation is a denial of the existence of a document, the custody of which belongs to the opposite party."

Case Notes

Termination of Visitation Agreement — Correctly Classified as Grandparent Visitation Agreement and Not Parental Visitation Agreement: The grandparents filed a petition for a parental interest determination after the mother moved to North Dakota with the child. Following mediation, the parties signed an agreement that allowed the child to live with the mother and gave day-to-day decisionmaking to the mother, but specifying certain visitation rights for the grandparents. Years later, the grandparents filed contempt motions, requesting that the District Court enforce the parties' agreement. The District Court eventually terminated the agreement, finding that it was a grandparent visitation agreement subject to modification and termination and not a parental visitation agreement. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the agreement was correctly classified and that the District Court correctly terminated the grandparents' visitation. King v. Chilcott, 2020 MT 224, 401 Mont. 204, 472 P.3d 155.

Quantum of Evidence Appropriate in Determining Whether Mitchell Slough Was Natural Water Body: The District Court incorrectly concluded that the plaintiffs failed to sustain their burden to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the Mitchell Slough was a natural water body. The balancing of private property rights and stream access rights in deciding the status of the Mitchell Slough was appropriate. Bitterroot River Protective Assoc., Inc. v. Bitterroot Conserv. Dist., 2008 MT 377, 346 M 507, 198 P3d 219 (2008).

Burden of Proof on Party Asserting Claim in Contested Case Hearing to Present Evidence That Department Decision Violated Law: Plaintiffs requested a hearing before the Board of Environmental Review, contending that an air quality permit issued by the Department of Environmental Quality for a coal-fired power plant and the application for the permit suffered from various procedural and substantive deficiencies. The Board held a contested case hearing and, after establishing that plaintiffs had the burden of proof, approved the Department's decision to grant the permit. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed that, as the party asserting the claim in the contested case, plaintiffs had the burden of presenting evidence necessary to establish the fact that the Department's decision violated the law. Mont. Env'tl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2005 MT 96, 326 M 502, 112 P3d 964 (2005).

Denial of Contractual Liability by Both Defendant Entities — Claims Put in Issue — Burden of Proof — Proposed Findings to Be Based Upon Evidence — No Evidence of Intent to Mislead as Basis for Relief From Judgment: Wright Oil sued Goodrich for petroleum products allegedly delivered but not paid for. Goodrich denied liability, claiming that the products were for the use of West Yellowstone Snowmobile Rentals, Inc. (WYSR), which owned Westgate Texaco, operated by Goodrich. Wright Oil amended its complaint to include WYSR, and after a bench trial, the District Court held against Goodrich because no evidence had been presented proving a contract between WYSR and Wright Oil. Wright Oil then filed a motion for relief from judgment under former Rule 60(b)(6), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), seeking relief from the District Court's failure to hold against WYSR. On the basis of evidence not presented at trial, the District Court granted the motion and ordered an evidentiary hearing to reopen the case against WYSR regarding WYSR's contractual liability to Wright Oil. WYSR appealed. The Supreme Court held that the District Court incorrectly granted the motion because the circumstances of the District Court's failure to hold WYSR liable for the debt to Wright Oil were not so extraordinary as to warrant relief from judgment under former Rule 60(b)(6). The Supreme Court noted that WYSR's denial of its liability put the allegation of its contractual liability at issue under former Rule 8(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), and under 26-1-401 and this section, Wright Oil had the burden of going forward with the evidence of WYSR's contractual liability but failed to present evidence of a contractual relationship between WYSR and Wright Oil. The fact that Goodrich alleged that WYSR was liable for the debt could not, the Supreme Court held, be taken as an admission by WYSR that it was liable for the amounts due. Further, the Supreme Court noted that Wright Oil should not have been surprised by WYSR's proposed findings of fact that it was not liable for the debt because under former Rule 52(a), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), a party's proposed findings of fact must be supported by the evidence, and Wright Oil failed to produce that evidence of liability. Wright Oil & Tire Co. v. Goodrich, 284 M 6, 942 P2d 128, 54 St. Rep. 811 (1997).

Break in Chain of Evidence Alleged — Burden of Proof: In a prosecution for deliberate homicide in which the defendant's fingerprints were found at the crime scene and the defendant objected to admission of the fingerprint evidence on the basis of an alleged break in the chain of evidence, which occurred because there could have been a master key that could have been used to gain access to the evidence, the court did not err in overruling the defendant's objection to the evidence. Once the State has shown prima facie that there has been no tampering or alteration of an exhibit, the burden of proving alteration shifts to the defendant. The speculation by the defendant is insufficient to meet the burden requiring proof of alteration. St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Insanity Defense — Constitutionality of Burden of Proof: Defendant attacked the constitutionality of the statute requiring that defendant's counsel prove insanity because the Montana statute directly contradicted previous Montana case law. The case law relied on a U.S. Supreme Court decision later described by the U.S. Supreme Court as establishing no constitutional doctrine, but only the rule to be followed in the federal courts. Just as Congress could conceivably change the federal rule set forth in a Supreme Court case, the Montana Legislature clearly had the power to change the rule announced in the early Montana cases. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428, 37 St. Rep. 325 (1980).

Distribution of Property Based on Fraud — Burden of Proof: Where appellants alleged that a decree of distribution of the decedent's estate was based on a fraudulently obtained consent decree, the District Court's decree was proper, as the appellants failed to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that they would have taken more under the will but for the alleged fraud. Estate of Wallace v. McAlear, 186 M 18, 606 P2d 136, 37 St. Rep. 158 (1980).

Partial Payment — Affirmative Defense: Partial payment by special deposit was an affirmative defense which debtor had burden of proving in suit on note; that burden of proof required that it be shown that payment was made on the particular obligation in controversy. Baker Nat'l Bank v. Lestar, 153 M 45, 453 P2d 774 (1969), followed in Ins. Specialists, Inc. v. Longfellow, 201 M 132, 654 P2d 500, 39 St. Rep. 2005 (1982).

Notice Denied by Defendant: Where plaintiff alleged giving of notice which defendant denied, notice or lack thereof was put in issue and plaintiff had burden of proof. Glacier Gen. Assurance Co. v. St. Farm Mut. Auto. Ins. Co., 150 M 452, 436 P2d 533 (1968).

Proof of Allegations for Mandate: On application for Writ of Mandate in the District Court, in establishing the facts of his case, the petitioner is required to do no more than to show that the material allegations of his complaint are sustained by a preponderance of the evidence. State ex rel. Phillips v. Ford, 116 M 190, 151 P2d 171 (1944).

Nonpayment Alleged Necessary as Part of Claim for Relief: Where the allegation of nonpayment in a counterclaim is necessary to state a cause of action, it is material, and being deemed denied, it must be proved, the burden resting upon the defendant. Yancey v. N. Pac. Ry., 42 M 342, 112 P 533 (1910).

Ownership of Water Rights: If one asserts himself to be the owner of the right to use waters claimed by him, the burden is on him to prove it. Smith v. Duff, 39 M 374, 102 P 981 (1909).

Exemption From Taxation: In an action by the State to recover a license tax from a telephone company, the burden was on the defendant to establish the number of telephones used exclusively in interstate business and that they were the same instruments attempted to be taxed. St. v. Rocky Mtn. Bell Tel. Co., 27 M 394, 71 P 311 (1903).

CRIMINAL CASES

Plain Error — Failure to Instruct Jury That State Bore Burden of Proving Defendant's Actions Were Not Justified Beyond Reasonable Doubt and Implicated Defendant's Fundamental Right to Fair Trial: The defendant's assault conviction in Justice Court that was affirmed by the District Court was subsequently reversed because the Justice Court's failure to instruct the jury that the state bore the burden of proving the defendant's use of force was not justified constituted a plain error and implicated the defendant's right to a fair trial. St. v. Akers, 2017 MT 311, 389 Mont. 531, 408 P.3d 142.

Question of Whether Circumstantial Evidence Supports Finding of Guilt or Innocence for Trier of Fact: Bromgard moved for a directed verdict of acquittal on charges of rape, arguing that the state had only provided circumstantial evidence and no fingerprints or other forensic evidence. The Supreme Court held that a conviction could be based on circumstantial evidence alone and that if the evidence was susceptible to two interpretations, one supporting guilt and the other supporting innocence, the trier of fact determines which is most reasonable. St. v. Bromgard, 261 M 291, 862 P2d 1140, 50 St. Rep. 1320 (1993), followed in St. v. Sullivan, 266 M 313, 880 P2d 829, 51 St. Rep. 827 (1994), St. v. Treible, 275 M 59, 910 P2d 237, 53 St. Rep. 38 (1996), St.

v. Enright, 1998 MT 322, 292 M 204, 974 P2d 1118, 55 St. Rep. 1308 (1998), St. v. Sittner, 1999 MT 103, 294 M 302, 980 P2d 1053, 56 St. Rep. 434 (1999), and St. v. Billedeaux, 2001 MT 9, 304 M 89, 18 P3d 990 (2001).

Jury Instruction Reducing State's Burden of Proof — Reversible Error: The trial court used one of the prosecution's jury instructions, which the defendant argued allowed the jury to use a preponderance of the evidence standard to convict him. The Supreme Court agreed and held that the instruction constituted reversible error because it reduced the state's burden of proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Croteau, 248 M 403, 812 P2d 1251, 48 St. Rep. 484 (1991).

Reasonable Doubt Standard — Separate Instruction Eliminating Confusion: Defendant claimed two instructions defining the offense were inconsistent; both set forth the elements of the crime, but the second, prepared by the defendant, also incorporated some facts of the case and the reasonable doubt standard. Defendant claimed he could have been convicted under the first instruction under a standard less than that of reasonable doubt. This argument failed because a separate instruction requiring a reasonable doubt standard for acquittal was given the jury. St. v. DeSilva, 209 M 169, 679 P2d 1237, 41 St. Rep. 620 (1984).

Sandstrom Instruction — Not Harmless Error if Intent Disputed Issue at Trial: Hamilton appealed federal District Court's dismissal of his habeas corpus petition on grounds that Sandstrom instruction given in his homicide trial was not harmless error. The court of appeals held that the giving of a Sandstrom instruction cannot be held harmless error if intent is a disputed issue at trial. If a criminal defendant's intent is a disputed issue at trial, the reviewing court cannot rationally conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that an unconstitutional Sandstrom instruction given to a jury did not taint its verdict even if substantial evidence of intent exists. Petition of Hamilton, 721 F2d 1189 (9th Cir. 1983).

Sandstrom Instruction — Harmless Error — Not Related to Disputed Issue: Because the victim was shot four times in the head at close range and the only disputed issue in the case was the identity of the perpetrator, error by the trial court in using the Sandstrom instruction was harmless. McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981).

Clear and Convincing Evidence: Identification testimony, coupled with testimony to the effect that one defendant was seen with the codefendant immediately prior to the commission of a theft, is sufficient to meet the clear and convincing standard required to show association of another theft to the theft at which defendant was seen with the codefendant. St. v. Strain, 190 M 44, 618 P2d 331, 37 St. Rep. 1763 (1980).

Sandstrom Instruction — Viewing Instructions as a Whole — Assurance of Effect on Jury: Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus was filed in U.S. District Court. When the Sandstrom instruction (Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979)) was given at a homicide trial, it may be that the defect can be cured by viewing all of the instructions as a whole; other instructions may be so "rhetorically inconsistent" (ibid. 518-519, n. 7) with the Sandstrom instruction that they overcome its presumptive effect. The court may not speculate on the curative effects of the other instructions on the jury; it must be assured that the jury did not find the defendant guilty on the grounds that he merely acted voluntarily, rather than finding the necessary criminal intent. In examining the instructions given, the court was not so assured and the petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was granted. McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478, 37 St. Rep. 1159 (D.C. Mont. 1980), reversed, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981).

Sandstrom Jury Instruction — Presumptions of Intent of Consequences of Acts — Harmless Error: Defendant charged with mitigated deliberate homicide alleged as error the giving of the jury instruction, "The law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts." Under Montana law, causing the death of another becomes deliberate homicide only when it is committed purposely or knowingly. These elements are necessary to the proof of this particular crime and must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt by the prosecution. Intent is a difficult element to prove. The evidence normally must be in the nature of outward manifestations of the defendant's state of mind, but when a telephone line to the police station from the scene of the murder happened to be open and the defendant was overheard at length, the court knew what he was thinking from his own words. It is difficult to conceive of a better indication as to defendant's intent. Also, the officer heard the fight at the time these words were spoken and another officer found the defendant and the victim's body minutes later. The only contested element here was intent, and the evidence on it was overwhelming. Basing its holding on the probable impact of the instructions upon the minds of the average jury, in the light of the evidence, the impact of the instruction upon the jury could not reasonably have contributed to the verdict. The error in giving the contested instruction was harmless. St. v. Hamilton, 185 M 522, 605 P2d 1121, 37 St. Rep. 70 (1980), certiorari denied, 447 US 924, 65 L Ed 2d 117, 100 S

Ct 3017 (1980); dismissal of federal District Court habeas corpus petition reversed on Sandstrom grounds, sub nom. Petition of Hamilton, 721 F2d 1189 (1983).

Jury Instructions — Intention of Consequences of Acts — Sandstrom Distinguished: Distinguishing Sandstrom, the court noted that the jury was not given a mandatory presumption, but it was told it could reasonably infer the defendant's intent for all the consequences which one acting in a like position would reasonably have expected. Nothing in the instruction lessened the duty of the State to prove every element of the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt, nor did it affect the presumption of defendant's innocence. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113, 37 St. Rep. 45 (1980), distinguishing Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Jury Instructions — Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution for theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on the presumption of innocence, an instruction on the State's burden of proof could not supplant an instruction on the presumption of innocence. The standard for prejudicial effect of the lack of the instruction was established in St. v. Harrison, 23 M 79, 57 P 647 (1899), and is more strict than that used by the U.S. Supreme Court. It is per se reversible error to deny the instruction. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224, 36 St. Rep. 1959 (1979).

Direct Criminal Evidence Susceptible to Two Constructions: Defendant's offered instruction would have instructed the jury that if the evidence is susceptible to two constructions, one consonant with guilt and the other consonant with innocence, it is the jury's duty to adopt the interpretation that is consonant with innocence. The District Court properly refused to give this instruction. That instruction is generally given where the State relies on circumstantial or indirect evidence to prove its case. The instruction has no application where the evidence is direct with respect to the crime charged. St. v. Freeman, 183 M 334, 599 P2d 368, 36 St. Rep. 1622 (1979), followed in St. v. Ryan, 229 M 7, 744 P2d 1242, 44 St. Rep. 1735 (1987).

"Reasonable Doubt" Standard:

Defendant charged with crime may not be convicted on conjectures, however shrewd, on suspicions, however justified, or on probabilities, however strong, but only upon evidence which establishes guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, i.e., upon proof such as logically to compel the conviction that the charge is true. St. v. Konon, 84 M 255, 274 P 1060 (1929).

Suspicion, however well founded, that defendant is guilty of the crime for the commission of which he is being tried is not sufficient to meet the requirements of this section and does not justify a conviction. To justify a conclusion of guilt, the criminatory circumstances proved must be consistent with each other and so clearly justify that conclusion that they exclude any other rational hypothesis. St. v. Brower, 55 M 349, 177 P 241 (1918).

In a criminal case, the State must prove the defendant's guilt beyond a reasonable doubt; evidence that does no more than to cast suspicion upon the defendant is not enough; mere suspicions or probabilities, however strong, are not a sufficient basis for a conviction. St. v. Sieff, 54 M 165, 168 P 524 (1917).

"Moral Certainty" — Same Degree of Proof: That degree of proof in a criminal case which produces conviction in an unprejudiced mind is denominated "moral certainty", and "moral certainty" and the phrase "beyond a reasonable doubt" as employed in this section are synonymous. St. v. Mun, 76 M 278, 246 P 257 (1926).

Proof of Element of Crime: In a prosecution against a telegraph company for furnishing information for bets on horseraces, there must be evidence that the defendant communicated the information or guilt cannot be established beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Postal Tel. Cable Co., 53 M 104, 161 P 953 (1916).

CIVIL CASES

Improper Standard of Review Applied by Board of Environmental Review in Contested Case Hearing — Remand: Plaintiffs requested a hearing before the Board of Environmental Review, contending that an air quality permit issued by the Department of Environmental Quality for a coal-fired power plant and the application for the permit suffered from various procedural and substantive deficiencies. The Board held a contested case hearing, addressed plaintiffs' contentions whether the Department's decision was erroneous, arbitrary, capricious, or an abuse of discretion, and approved the Department's decision to grant the permit. Plaintiffs petitioned for judicial review of the Board's order, and the District Court affirmed the Board's findings, conclusions, and order. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that hearings related to the issuance of an air quality permit must be conducted under the contested case provisions of Title 2, ch. 4, part 6, rather than part 7, which sets out the standard of judicial review. The role of the Board was to receive evidence from the parties, enter findings of fact based on a preponderance of the evidence, and then enter conclusions of law based on the findings. The determination of whether an agency decision is erroneous, arbitrary, capricious, or an abuse of discretion is the role of the District Court. Thus, the Board applied a standard of review not legally available to it as the finder of fact in a contested case hearing. The District Court erred in determining that the Board applied the correct standard, so the case was remanded with instructions that the Board enter new findings of fact and conclusions of law in conformity with Title 2, ch. 4, part 6. Mont. Env'tl. Information Center v. Dept. of Environmental Quality, 2005 MT 96, 326 M 502, 112 P3d 964 (2005).

Not Error to Fail to Instruct That Severity of Injury Did Not Mean There Must Be Negligence: A doctor in a medical malpractice case argued on appeal that the judge should have given a "mere fact of injury" instruction because no instruction was given to prevent the jury from believing that because the injuries were so severe, there must have been negligence. There was no error because the given instructions stated in part: (1) that plaintiff had the burden of proving the doctor was negligent, that the plaintiff was injured, and that the doctor's negligence was a proximate cause of plaintiff's injury; (2) that it is the doctor's duty to use the skill and learning ordinarily used in like cases by other doctors practicing in that same specialty and holding the same national board certification and that violation of that duty is negligence; and (3) that the proper test for determining negligence in a doctor's actions is whether he met the accepted standards of skill and care. O'Leary v. Callender, 255 M 277, 843 P2d 304, 49 St. Rep. 1008 (1992).

Instruction on Negligent Misrepresentation Not Given — Action for Fraud: There was no error when District Court instructed the jury on constructive fraud but not on negligent misrepresentation. In Montana, an action for negligent misrepresentation is an action for fraud, so the jury was adequately instructed. Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986), partially overruled in Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995).

Instruction Given on Constructive Fraud — Instruction on Bad Faith Superfluous: The District Court instructed the jury on constructive fraud but not on breach of the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing, which plaintiff contended was error. The Supreme Court noted that the jury found no breach of duty under the instruction on constructive fraud, which does not require a showing of fraudulent intent. An instruction on bad faith would require plaintiff to prove intentional concealment. The court held that if plaintiff could not meet the burden of proof on constructive fraud, she could not meet the higher burden of proof on bad faith; thus, the instruction would have been superfluous. Bushnell v. Cook, 221 M 296, 718 P2d 665, 43 St. Rep. 825 (1986), partially overruled in Cechovic v. Hardin & Associates, Inc., 273 M 104, 902 P2d 520, 52 St. Rep. 854 (1995).

Jury Instructions — "Locality Rule" Standard Not Relevant for Judging Medical Specialist — "Loss of Chance": Woman sued her doctor, a national board certified orthopedic surgeon, for damages for alleged negligent medical treatment. Defendant had treated plaintiff for misdiagnosed knee problems for 4 months without ordering diagnostic X-rays before referring plaintiff for surgery to out-of-state doctor who discovered a giant cell tumor in plaintiff's knee. Plaintiff alleged that defendant's failure to order diagnostic films early in treatment resulted in her losing any chance to have less radical surgery and preserve her natural knee. Jury returned verdict in favor of defendant, and plaintiff appealed. Supreme Court vacated District Court judgment and remanded for new trial. Supreme Court held that District Court committed reversible error by instructing jury on the "locality rule" as appropriate standard of care rather than giving plaintiff's proposed instruction holding board certified specialists to national standards of the specialty. Supreme Court also held that on retrial, plaintiff is entitled to a "loss of chance" instruction. The trier of fact should determine whether defendant's negligence was a substantial factor in reducing plaintiff's chances of obtaining a better result rather than whether plaintiff would have obtained a better result with earlier diagnosis. Aasheim v. Humberger, 215 M 127, 695 P2d 824, 42 St. Rep. 235 (1985); holding explained and extended to include Board-certified family practitioners in Glover v. Ballhagen, 232 M 427, 756 P2d 1166, 45 St. Rep. 1168 (1988).

Conflicting Evidence Resolved by Jury — Substantial Evidence to Support Verdict: Where the plaintiff brought a negligence action against the defendant for injuries sustained at an outdoor beer party when the defendant allegedly tossed a large rock that struck the plaintiff on the head, the Supreme Court found that there was substantial evidence to support the jury's verdict for the defendant. The evidence was equally supportive of the defendant's theory (that the plaintiff tripped and fell) as it was of the plaintiff's theory. The court held that if there is conflicting evidence in the record, the credibility and weight given to that evidence is the province of the jury and not the Supreme Court. Anderson v. Jacqueth, 205 M 493, 668 P2d 1063, 40 St. Rep. 1451 (1983). See also Wheeler v. Bozeman, 232 M 433, 757 P2d 345, 45 St. Rep. 1173 (1988), and Stewart v. Fisher, 235 M 432, 767 P2d 1321, 46 St. Rep. 116 (1989).

Sufficiency of Objection — Incorrect Statement of Law — Sufficiency of Evidence: In settling a boundary dispute the Supreme Court held that the objection to a jury instruction as being an incorrect statement of law was insufficient, not having specified the defect. Considering the jury instructions as a whole, the Supreme Court held the jury was fully and correctly instructed on the law, that there was substantial evidence to support its verdict, and that no prejudice to the defendants arose from the failure of the court to give a proffered jury instruction. Nott v. Booke, 194 M 251, 633 P2d 678, 38 St. Rep. 1507 (1981).

Effect of Uncontradicted Evidence: Where there is direct testimony in the record, uncontradicted by other direct testimony, a court or jury is not bound thereby and can render a decision contrary to such direct testimony based on adverse circumstantial evidence. Holenstein v. Andrews, 166 M 60, 530 P2d 476 (1975).

Lease — Cancel and Terminate: In an action to cancel and terminate a lease, the burden was on the plaintiffs to prove, by a preponderance of the evidence, that the defendants had violated the lease as charged in the complaint. Davis v. Burton, 128 M 434, 278 P2d 213 (1955).

Divorce — Denial of Marriage: The denial in an answer of an allegation in a complaint for divorce that the plaintiff and defendant are husband and wife imposes upon the plaintiff the burden of proving that fact by a preponderance of the evidence. Sell v. Sell, 58 M 329, 193 P 561 (1920).

Contracts — Fraud or Lack of Mental Capacity: Under this section, fraud or lack of mental capacity to enter into a contract may be established by a bare preponderance of the evidence. Koerner v. N. Pac. Ry., 56 M 511, 186 P 337 (1919).

Single Witness: A preponderance of the evidence may be established by the testimony of a single witness as against a greater number of witnesses who testify to the contrary. Parchen v. Chessman, 53 M 430, 164 P 531 (1917).

Reformation of Instrument — Mistake: To warrant reformation of an instrument for mistake, it is not necessary that the mistake be made to appear beyond a reasonable doubt or by any quantum of proof beyond a bare preponderance, as provided in this section. Parchen v. Chessman, 53 M 430, 164 P 531 (1917).

Support of Verdict — Conflicting Evidence: In civil actions, where the evidence is conflicting, a preponderance of the evidence is the least that will support a verdict. Flaherty v. Butte Elec. Ry., 42 M 89, 111 P 348 (1910).

Support of Verdict — Evidence Not Conflicting: In civil actions, where the evidence is not conflicting, the verdict must be in favor of the party who has the affirmative of the issue and who has produced the uncontradicted evidence in support of it. Flaherty v. Butte Elec. Ry., 42 M 89, 111 P 348 (1910).

"Clearly and Distinctly Proven" — Greater Burden Than Preponderance: An instruction charging that fraud is never presumed "but must be clearly and distinctly proven" was erroneous, in that it advised the jury that something more than a bare preponderance of the evidence was necessary to prove fraud, and imposed too great a burden upon the party alleging it. Fleming v. Lockwood, 36 M 384, 92 P 962 (1907); Gehlert v. Quinn, 35 M 451, 90 P 168 (1907).

Partnership — Proof: Under this section, it was error to charge that, in actions against a firm by a third person, less strictness of proof was required to show partnership than is required in an action brought by one partner against another, preponderance of the evidence being required in both cases. Lawrence v. Westlake, 28 M 503, 73 P 119 (1903). See also Gallick v. Bordeaux, 31 M 328, 78 P 583 (1904).

1983 Amendment: Substituted "which the trier of fact may make from the evidence" for "which the reason of the jury makes from the facts proved, without an express direction of the law to that effect".

Case Notes

Possession of Dangerous Drugs — Mere Presence Jury Instruction Not Required for Passenger — District Court Discretion — Substantial Rights Not Affected: The jury was correctly instructed

on the charge of criminal possession of dangerous drugs during the defendant's second jury trial. The defendant argued that, since he was only a passenger in the vehicle and the state failed to prove he had possession over the drugs, a "mere presence" instruction be given. The District Court denied the defendant's request for the instruction, determining that it was only appropriate in accountability cases. The Supreme Court determined that the District Court fully and fairly instructed the jury on the applicable law on criminal possession of dangerous drugs and had the authority to instruct in this way, rather than give the defendant's "mere presence" instruction, because it had broad discretion in formulating and approving jury instructions. Based on the evidence presented at trial, and the instructions provided, the defendant could not demonstrate that the District Court's refusal to give his instruction affected his substantial rights and constituted reversible error. St. v. Ellerbee, 2019 MT 37, 394 Mont. 289, 434 P.3d 910.

Circumstantial Evidence Sufficient to Affirm Conviction for Threats and Improper Influence in Official and Political Matters: After a confrontation with state highway crew members, the Heffners were convicted of threats and other improper influence in official and political matters, a felony under 45-7-102. They appealed on grounds that the convictions were based on mere suspicion or conjecture. Although the evidence presented was circumstantial, a rational jury could nevertheless infer that the Heffners were upset that their swift travel on the road was impeded by the duties of the road grader operator and that the Heffners took out their anger and frustration on the grader operator. The circumstantial evidence was sufficient to support the convictions. St. v. Heffner, 1998 MT 181, 290 M 114, 964 P2d 736, 55 St. Rep. 732 (1998).

Experiments — Simulated Accident: In action by a father alleging negligent care and supervision of his son at the YMCA swimming pool, evidence showed that one of five qualified lifeguards at the pool found the 6-year-old boy submerged about 4½ feet from the surface, that the lifeguard and a young boy pulled the son to the surface, and that one or more lifeguards carried the boy to the edge of the pool. The trial judge admitted evidence of an experiment in which one of the lifeguards threw a diving ring into the pool where the son was recovered and timed how long it took two young boys (one of which had helped save the son) to retrieve it, and then threw a 10-pound diving weight into the pool so that it settled into the pool. The boys were unable to retrieve it. From this the lifeguard concluded that the son was not on the bottom of the pool when rescued. The evidence was properly admitted since it supported the conclusion that the son was rescued in a shorter period of time than it would take for brain damage to result through submersion in water, and the experiment was substantially similar to the accident and rescue so as to lay a sufficient foundation for admission of testimony regarding the experiment. Johnson v. YMCA, 201 M 36, 651 P2d 1245, 39 St. Rep. 1937 (1982).

Omission of Jury Instruction on Nonconclusiveness of Defendant's Proximity to Scene — No Error: The trial court did not err in omitting an instruction to the effect that defendant's proximity to the crime did not, in and of itself, support a finding of guilt when the prosecution's case was based on evidence other than mere presence of the defendant at the scene of the crime. St. v. Sheriff, 190 M 131, 619 P2d 181, 37 St. Rep. 1793 (1981).

Inference Distinguished From Suspicion: An inference is to be distinguished from mere suspicion, which is "the act or an instance of suspecting: imagination or apprehension of something wrong or hurtful without proof or on slight evidence" (quoting Webster's New International Dictionary, 3rd ed. 1961). St. v. Barick, 143 M 273, 389 P2d 170 (1964).

Continuing Condition Inferred — Foundation: If an inference is to be permitted to show a previous condition, the foundation must show that the substance was in the same state or condition at a time not too remote and that the nature of the substance is constant. Richardson v. Farmers Union Oil Co., 131 M 535, 312 P2d 134 (1957).

Instructions to Jury — Abstract of Section: An instruction containing an abstract statement of the statutory law as set out in this section and sections 93-1301-3, R.C.M. 1947 (superseded by Rule 301, M.R.Ev.), and 26-1-502 is not error when the facts are few and simple. Gobel v. Rinio, 122 M 235, 200 P2d 700 (1948).

Usual Propensities or Passions of Man: In an action for damages resulting from negligence in driving automobile, an instruction touching upon the usual propensities or passions of man when there was no evidence touching on such subject was harmless, if error. Gobel v. Rinio, 122 M 235, 200 P2d 700 (1948).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Case Notes

Inferring Injury Caused by Auto Accident: Jury trying personal injury action could properly choose to infer from the evidence presented that an auto accident allegedly caused by negligence of defendant was the direct cause of plaintiff's injuries, and Supreme Court would not supplant jury's findings with one of its own. Allers v. Willis, 197 M 499, 643 P2d 592, 39 St. Rep. 745 (1982).

Continuing Existing Conditions — Length of Time Permissible: The presumption of the continued existence of a person, a personal relation, or a state of things is prospective and not retrospective, and the law does not presume, from proof of the existence of present conditions or facts, that the same facts or conditions had existed for any length of time previously. Richardson v. Farmers Union Oil Co., 131 M 535, 312 P2d 134 (1957).

Circumstantial Evidence as Basis for Inference: This statute makes no distinction between "a fact legally proved" by direct evidence and "a fact legally proved" by circumstantial evidence. A fact, although arrived at by indirect or circumstantial evidence, may serve as a basis for an inference. Fegles Constr. Co. v. McLaughlin Constr. Co., 205 F2d 637 (9th Cir. 1953).

Instructions to Jury — Detail Required: After having correctly defined an inference and stating that it must be founded upon a fact legally proved, it is not error for the court to refuse to instruct the jury that an "inference cannot be founded upon another inference, or upon facts inferred from other facts legally proved". St. v. Blaine, 45 M 482, 124 P 516 (1912).

Verdict Supported by Inference: A verdict may be founded upon an inference; thus, if a passenger of one railroad company is injured at the depot platform of another company by stepping into an uncovered waterhole in the platform, an inference that the employees omitted to recover the hole is justified and authorizes a recovery against the latter company. Jenkins v. N. Pac. Ry., 44 M 295, 119 P 794 (1911).

Part 6

Part Compiler's Comments

Table D — Presumptions: The following table on Presumptions was prepared by the Montana Supreme Court Commission on the Montana Rules of Evidence as an aid for lawyers in considering the proposed Montana Rules of Evidence (adopted 1977, see ch. 10). The table contains references to the Revised Codes of Montana, 1947; the current disposition of those sections has been set forth in brackets by the annotator. The table has been updated to reflect statutory presumptions enacted since 1977. The presumptions added by the compiler appear in brackets.

Rule 301 of the Montana Rules of Evidence follows the case law in its interpretation of Montana statutes and gives presumptions the effect of evidence. Since such importance is given presumptions, the [Montana Supreme Court Commission on Rules of Evidence] has included this table listing in Part I Statutory Conclusive Presumptions, in Part II Statutory Disputable Presumptions, and in Part III Common Law Disputable Presumptions. This list is intended only as an aid to Montana judges and lawyers, and the inclusion or exclusion from this table of any particular presumption should have no effect on a court's treatment of that particular presumption. Therefore, this table is not intended as an authority for whether or not any particular presumption exists, but only as a research guide to presumptions generally.

Part I. Statutory Conclusive Presumptions

The general statute listing statutory conclusive presumptions is R.C.M. 1947, Section 93-1301-6 [26-1-601]. It reads as follows:

Citing every case relating to each of the following presumptions is a near impossibility. Therefore, the cases listed are an adequate representation of the presumptions for which they stand. Additional cases stating the presumptions may be found cited within those cases listed below.

Age

Parties are presumed to be of full age and without disability in the absence of a contrary showing. State ex rel. Hamilton v. District Court, 102 Mont. 341, 348, 57 P.2d 1227 (1936).

Appeal

(For related material see R.C.M. 1947 Section 93-1301-7(15) and (16) [26-1-602] and Montana Digest Key Numbers 900 through 939.)

Bill of Exceptions (This is no longer required by Rule 46, M.R.Civ.P.)

When a bill of exceptions is settled and verified, the presumption arises that the judge included all things in it which it should contain. Montana Ore Purchasing v. Lindsey, 25 Mont. 24, 29, 63 P. 719 (1901).

On appeal from a judgment it will be presumed that the court passed on all matters raised in the bill of exceptions. Whiter v. Kemper, 25 Mont. 432, 437, 65 P. 422 (1901).

The presumption of correctness from the settlement of the certification of a bill of exceptions is conclusive if not rebutted. State v. Tate, 55 Mont. 343, 344, 177 P. 243 (1918).

Bond

Where exception is not taken to the sufficiency of sureties on an appeal bond, it will be presumed that it was sufficient. O'Neil v. State Savings Bank, 34 Mont. 521, 87 P. 970 (1906).

Evidence

All evidence necessary to support the judgment will be presumed on appeal. Story v. Black, 5 Mont. 26, 41, 1 P. 1 (1883); Alder Gulch Consol. Mining Co. v. Hayes, 6 Mont. 31, 33, 9 P. 581 (1886); Clark v. Parker, 6 Mont. 153, 160, 9 P. 911 (1886); Blessing v. Sias, 7 Mont. 103, 106, 14 P. 663 (1887); *Sperling v. Judge's Consideration of Evidence

In a non-jury case, presume that the judge considered only competent evidence in reaching his findings. Montana Ore Packing Co. v. Butte & Boston Consol. Mining Co., 25 Mont. 427, 432, 65 P. 420 (1901); Colousa Mining & Smelting Co. v. Barnard, 28 Mont. 11, 16, 72 P. 45 (1903); Finlen v. Heinze, 28 Mont. 548, 568, 73 P. 123 (1903); Bordeaux v. Roosevelt Co., 71 Mont. 165, 185, 227 P. 811 (1924); Gallatin Natural Gas Co. v. Public Service Comm., 79 Mont. 269, 289, 256 P. 373 (1927); Minnesota L & T Co. v. Busby, 84 Mont. 373, 379, 275 P. 761 (1929); Newton v. Weiler, 87 Mont. 164, 174, 286 P. 133 (1930); Adornczik v. McCauley, 89 Mont. 27, 37, 297 P. 486 (1931); Williard v. Campbell, 91 Mont. 493, 507 11 P.2d 782 (1932); Bickford v. Bickford, 94 Mont. 314, 320, 22 P.2d 306 (1933); Murphy v. LaChapelle, 95 Mont. 36, 43, 24 P.2d 131 (1933); Clem v. Wolz, 110 Mont. 458, 463 102 P.2d 22 (1940).

However the presumption was not followed in Anaconda Copper Mining v. Heinze, 27 Mont. 161, 172, 69 P. 909 (1902) where the excluded evidence was important and it is reasonably apparent that it was regarded by the court, case reversed; State ex rel. Rankin v. Martin, 68 Mont. 392, 404, 219 P. 632 (1923) where the excluded evidence went to the heart of the matter, the presumption could not be indulged; State ex rel. Regis v. District Court, 102 Mont. 74, 85, 55 P.2d 1295 (1936) where the record of the proceeding shows affirmatively that the recitals contained in the judgment were untrue; and Cedar Creek Oil & Gas Co. v. Archer, 122 Mont. 477, 489, 117 P.2d 265 (1941) where the equities are clearly in favor of the losing party.

If a brief does not mention evidence supporting a contention, presume no such evidence exists. Kelley v. Granite Bi-Metallic Mining Co., 41 Mont. 1, 11, 108 P. 785 (1910).

Where evidence is entered late in the record presume it was considered by the trial court in making its decision. White v. Bailing, 41 Mont. 138, 141, 108 P. 654 (1910).

Instructions

The general rule is where instructions are not included in the record a presumption arises that all imperfections were cleared up and a correct statement of the law made. Howard v. Fraser, 83 Mont. 194, 199, 271 P. 444 (1928); Jones v. Northwestern Auto Supply, 93 Mont. 224, 232, 18 P.2d 305 (1932).

It is presumed that the jury followed an instruction to disregard testimony. Newton v. City of Roundup, 60 Mont. 24, 30 198 P. 441 (1921); Brown v. Homestake Exploration Co., 98 Mont. 305, 339, 39 P.2d 168 (1934).

Judge

Where the record indicates that the admission of a judgment roll from another action pending appeal was overruled, presume the judge was sufficiently aware of the pending appeal. Boucher v. Barsalou, 27 Mont. 99, 101, 65 P. 555 (1902).

Where change of venue is requested to a district where the judge is free of bias, such condition will be presumed to continue until shown otherwise. Stair v. Lunke, 56 Mont. 130, 132, 180 P. 569 (1919).

Judgment

In the absence of a showing to the contrary a judgment or order will be presumed proper. Rumney Land & Cattle Co. v. Detroit and Mont. Cattle Co., 19 Mont. 557, 559, 49 P. 395 (1897); Cornish v. Floyd-Jones, 26 Mont. 153, 156, 66 P. 838 (1901); Swain v. McMillan, 30 Mont. 433, 441, 76 P. 943 (1904); Bowen v. Webb, 34 Mont. 61, 66, 85 P. 739 (1906); Donivan-McCormick Co. v. Spaer, 34 Mont. 237, 245, 85 P. 1029 (1906); Passavant v. Arnold, 34 Mont. 513, 515, 87 P. 905 (1906); State v. Paisley, 36 Mont. 237, 251, 92 P. 566 (1907); Lozar v. Neill, 37 Mont. 287, 297, 96 P. 343 (1908); Moore v. Butte Electric Ry., 47 Mont. 467, 474, 138 P. 1098 (1914); Great Northern Ry. v. Benjamin, 51 Mont. 167, 174, 149 P. 968 (1915); *State v. Error will not be presumed, but must be affirmatively shown, the burden resting on appellant to show how trial court erred. (Many cases cited above also contain this rule.) State v. Matt, 29 Mont. 292, 307, 74 P. 728 (1903); Swain v. McMillan, 30 Mont. 433, 441, 76 P. 943 (1904); State v. Kremer, 34 Mont. 6, 11, 85 P. 736 (1906); Van Vranlsen v. Custer County, 132 Mont. 205, 211, 315 P.2d 993 (1957).

The presumption of correctness does not obtain under the following cases:

Judgments obtained by constructive service are not presumed regular. Palmer v. McMaster, 8 Mont. 186, 194, 19 P. 535 (1888).

The supreme court will not presume that the trial court considered a demurrer where appellants have not shown such a pleading. Bowen v. Webb, 34 Mont. 61, 66, 85 P. 739 (1906).

The presumption of correctness does not obtain where the trial court has lost jurisdiction. Evans v. Oregon Short Line Ry., 51 Mont. 107, 112, 149 P. 715 (1915).

The presumption that in the absence of the record the testimony supports the court's action does not obtain where the record is available to the supreme court. State ex rel. Ellan v. District Court, 97 Mont. 160, 168, 33 P.2d 526 (1934).

Where stipulated facts are submitted to both the trial court and the supreme court, the presumption that the trial court's findings are correct does not have the same force as in other cases. McCracken v. Liquor Control Board, 115 Mont. 347, 352, 143 P.2d 891 (1943).

The presumption of regularity has been variously applied in cases dealing with default judgments:

Presume that the court followed the law when entering a default judgment. Butte Butchering Co. v. Clarke, 19 Mont. 306, 311, 48 P. 303 (1897).

On motion to vacate a default judgment, presume the vacating ruling is not made on discretionary grounds. Beller v. LaBoeuf, 50 Mont. 192, 195, 145 P. 945 (1915).

Neglect is presumed where defendant allows statutory period to run without an appearance. Pacific Acceptance Corp. v. McCue, 71 Mont. 99, 103, 288 P. 761 (1924).

On appeal service of amended complaint or waiver thereof must establish jurisdiction over defendant as presumption of jurisdiction will not obtain in appeal from default judgment. Griffith v. Montana Wheat Growers Assoc., 75 Mont. 466, 473, 244 P. 277 (1926).

On appeal from a default judgment where the pleadings are before the supreme court the presumption that the judgment was supported by the complaint does not obtain. State ex rel. Costello v. District Court, 86 Mont. 387, 394, 284 P. 128 (1930).

Default judgments presumed properly entered in absence of showing to the contrary. State ex rel. Delmoe v. District Court, 100 Mont. 131, 142, 46 P.2d 39 (1935).

Presumption of regularity of the default judgment does not obtain where proper notice was not received by defendants. Holen v. Phelps, 131 Mont. 146, 152, 308 P.2d 624 (1957).

Motion for New Trial

When the court grants a motion for new trial on a general order without specifying grounds, the presumption arises that the court discretionarily granted motion on grounds of insufficient evidence to justify verdict. Norton v. Great Northern Railway, 78 Mont. 273, 285, 254 P. 165 (1927) and Brennan v. Mayo, 100 Mont. 439, 447, 50 P.2d 245 (1935).

Where a judge acts on a motion for new trial and has not tried the case, but acts only on the record of a predecessor, the rule applies that his order will not carry the presumption usually indulged on appeal in favor of such an order. Worden v. Alexander, 108 Mont. 208, 212, 90 P.2d 160 (1939).

Doctrine of Stare Decisis

A party calling for application of this doctrine is presumed to have relied upon a former decision. Continental Supply Co. v. Abell, 95 Mont. 148, 171, 24 P.2d 133 (1938).

Receiver

On appeal from order appointing receiver, presume the trial court decided plaintiff was likely to succeed. Beale v. Lindquist, 92 Mont. 480, 486, 15 P.2d 927 (1932).

Assignment

Presume assignment of accounts for value. Carver v. Lynde, 7 Mont. 108, 113, 14 P. 697 (1887).

Where assignee receives proceeds of judgment, the presumption obtains that he consented to action by assignor to protect debtor from double liability. Osborne v. MacDonald, 91 Mont. 83, 86, 5 P.2d 568 (1931).

Attorneys

Attorney's acts are presumed regular and by client's authority. (See also R.C.M. 1947, Section 93-2101 [37-61-401]). Pullen v. City of Butte, 45 Mont. 46, 56, 121 P. 878 (1911) (Notice); Missoula Belt Line Railway v. Smith, 58 Mont. 432, 441, 193 P. 529 (1920); Davenport v. Davenport, 69 Mont. 405, 410, 22 P. 422 (1924) (appearance); In re Miller's Estate, 71 Mont. 330, 338, 229 P. 851 (1924) (right to contest attorney's authority to represent); Union Bank and Trust Co. v. Penwell, 99 Mont. 255, 263, 42 P.2d 457 (1935); Rieckhoff v. Woodhull, 106 Mont. 22, 32, 75 P.2d 56 (1937); State ex rel. Coleman v. Dist. Court, 120 Mont. 372, 375, 186 P.2d 91 (1947) (neglect implied to party through attorney).

An attorney is presumed innocent in disbarment proceedings. In re Parsons, 35 Mont. 478, 482, 90 P. 163 (1907).

An order allowing attorney's fees is presumed to have followed proper considerations. Forrester & MacGinniss v. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co., 29 Mont. 397, 409, 74 P. 1088 (1914).

Although the court is presumed to be aware of the value of an attorney's services, evidence may be allowed showing what is just and reasonable. Hickey v. Parrot Silver & Copper Co., 32 Mont. 143, 158, 79 P. 698 (1904).

Where the record shows no evidence as to whether attorney's fees are reasonable, presume on appeal that the amount fixed by the court was correct. Britt v. Powder Butte Mine, 108 Mont. 174, 180, 89 P.2d 266 (1939).

Banking

In an action dishonoring a check, plaintiff could rely on the presumption of allowing him substantial damages temperately measured. Crites v. Security State Bank, 52 Mont. 121, 123, 155 P. 970 (1915); and Ward v. State Bank of Yates, 52 Mont. 328, 330, 157 P. 573 (1916).

Presume that in the ordinary course of business a bank follows instructions given it with reference to collection of draft. Guignor v. First National Bank of Helena, 22 Mont. 140, 144, 55 P. 1051 (1898); California Packing Corp. v. McClintock, 75 Mont. 72, 76, 241 P. 522 (1925).

Where a promissory note was left with a bank for collection prior to its insolvency and the collection was made it will be presumed in an action by the owner to establish preference claim that it constituted a trust fund so long as the balance at least equal to the trust fund remains in the bank. The specific money collected was retained by it and constituted an integral part of the bank's money which passed into the hands of the receiver. McDonald v. American Bank and Trust, 79 Mont. 233, 241, 255 P. 733 (1927). (Citing Hawaiian Pineapple Co. v. Brown, supra, under Fiduciary.)

Where a check upon a foreign bank is deposited by the payee in a local bank without special agreement, the presumption is that it was deposited for collection only and that title remained in the depositor. A person tendering payment by check through the mail is deemed to have knowledge of the usual and customary method of making presentment through a bank at the place to which it is sent. Blackwelder v. Fergus Motor Co., 80 Mont. 374, 389, 260 P. 734 (1927).

A foreign company employing local bank to act as collecting agent is presumed to have done so with the knowledge of the well-known custom of banks to mingle their collections with the bank's other funds, resulting in a general and not special deposit, thus creating the relation of a debtor and creditor and depriving the creditor of the right to claim a preference in the bank's insolvency. Montana-Dakota Power Co. v. Johnson, 95 Mont. 16, 21, 23 P.2d 956 (1933).

The presumption of liability for an assessment of shares of stock in insolvent bank arising from the presence of a person's name on its stock is rebutted by evidence that qualified transfer of the stock was made and that the transferor performed every duty imposed by law to secure the transfer. Mitchell v. Banking Corporation, 95 Mont. 9, 15, 23 P.2d 978 (1933).

Mont.*, 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1983 Amendment: In lead-in, after "presumptions" deleted "and no others"; deleted former (1) and (2), which read: "(1) a malicious and guilty intent, from the deliberate commission of an unlawful act for the purpose of injuring another;

(2) the truth of the facts recited, from the recital in a written instrument between the parties thereto or their successors in interest by a subsequent title; but this rule does not apply to the recital of a consideration;"; in (1), substituted "the truth of a declaration, act, or omission of a party, as against that party in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission, whenever he has, by such declaration, act, or omission, intentionally led another to believe a particular thing true and to act upon such belief" for "whenever a party has, by his own declaration, act, or omission, intentionally and deliberately led another to believe a particular thing true and to act upon such belief, he cannot in any litigation arising out of such declaration, act, or omission be permitted to falsify it;"; deleted former (5), which read: "the issue of a wife cohabiting with her husband who is not impotent is indisputably presumed to be legitimate;"; in (3), changed "this code" to "statute", and deleted final clause, which read: "; but such judgment or order must be alleged in the pleadings if there be an opportunity to do so; if there be no such opportunity, the judgment or order may be used as evidence;"; and made minor changes in style.

GENERAL CASES CONCERNING PRESUMPTIONS

No Equitable Estoppel of Defense of Sixty-Month Claim Limit on Workers' Compensation Benefits: Following a work-related injury in 1992, Wiard did not submit a medical claim within 60 months, as required under 39-71-704(1)(d) (now (1)(e)) to avoid termination of benefits. Wiard asserted that the insurer should be equitably estopped from asserting the 60-month claim limit as a defense because if he had been advised of the 60-month limit, he would have sought medical care during that period to extend the benefits. However, Wiard had an affirmative duty to exercise his medical benefits if he reasonably needed medical care within the 60-month period, and if Wiard did not need medical care within that period, then the failure to obtain medical care could not be construed as reliance. Therefore, the insurer's defense was properly allowed. Wiard v. Liberty NW. Ins. Corp., 2003 MT 295, 318 M 132, 79 P3d 281 (2003).

Disputable Presumption Created of Employee Status—List of Presumptions Held Not Exclusive: Berg was sued by the State Fund in a civil action for the recovery of workers' compensation premium payments. Earlier, at the time of an audit, Berg was asked by a State Fund auditor to submit evidence that 23 persons working for him were independent contractors as Berg claimed and was told that if he did not submit any evidence, the State Fund would presume that the 23 people were employees and that premiums must be paid for those people. Berg submitted no evidence. The Supreme Court contrasted the language of this section with the language of 26-1-602 regarding the exclusive or nonexclusive nature of the lists of presumptions in the two sections and, citing Werre v. David, 275 M 376, 913 P2d 625 (1996), stated that the language of 39-71-120 (now repealed) should be interpreted in its usual and ordinary meaning. The Supreme Court held that 39-71-120 (now repealed) creates a disputable presumption that a person is an employee and held that the fact that the presumption created by 39-71-120 (now repealed) is not contained in the list of disputable presumptions in 26-1-602 is not controlling. The Supreme Court noted that the compiler's comment to Title 26, ch. 1, part 6, makes clear that the listing of disputable presumptions is not intended to be exclusive. State ex rel. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund v. Berg, 279 M 161, 927 P2d 975, 53 St. Rep. 1098 (1996).

Constructive Trust by Deed From Aged Mother to Son—Not Conclusive Presumption: Conclusive presumption was not established in situation where court refused to impose constructive trust upon lands deeded to son by aged mother. Bodine v. Bodine, 149 M 29, 422 P2d 650 (1967).

Length of Oral Lease—Not Conclusive Presumption: Since the provision of 70-26-201 that the hiring of real property under an oral lease is presumed to be for 1 year is not listed as a conclusive presumption in this section, it is a rebuttable presumption under section 93-1301-5, R.C.M. 1947 (superseded by Rule 301, M.R.Ev.). Roseneau Foods, Inc. v. Coleman, 140 M 572, 374 P2d 87 (1962).

Knowledge of Law—Not Conclusive Presumption: While a public officer should not make a mistake as to the amount of salary the law allows him, there is no conclusive presumption that he has knowledge thereof, such presumption not being included in the enumeration of conclusive presumptions found in this section. Hicks v. Stillwater County, 84 M 38, 274 P 296 (1929), distinguished in Builders' Supply Co. v. Helena, 116 M 368, 154 P2d 270 (1944).

ESTOPPEL BY OWN ACTS

Promissory Estoppel Does Not Require Showing of Intent to Mislead: The elements of promissory estoppel are distinct from the elements of estoppel by silence. Promissory estoppel does not require a showing of an intent to mislead. S & P Brake Supply, Inc. v. STEMCO LP, 2016 MT 324, 385 Mont. 488, 385 P.3d 567. See also NW. Potato Sales, Inc. v. Beck, 208 Mont. 310, 678 P.2d 1138 (1984), and Turner v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 2012 MT 213, 366 Mont. 285, 291 P.3d 1082.

Scriveners' Error—Statement in Brief Not Considered Judicial Admission—No Abuse of Discretion: The defendant sought dismissal of a negligence claim on the grounds that the plaintiff made an admission in a trial brief indicating that the defendant's actions were "reasonable and necessary". The day after the defendant sought dismissal, the plaintiffs filed a notice of errata to correct the alleged "scriveners' error", and the District Court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss the claim. On appeal, the Supreme Court distinguished Kohne v. Yost, 250 Mont. 109, 818 P.2d 360 (1991), and held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that the statement did not constitute a judicial admission. Weaver v. St., 2013 MT 247, 371 Mont. 476, 310 P.3d 495. However, see Bilesky v. Shopko Stores Operating Co., LLC, 2014 MT 300, 377 Mont. 58, 338 P.3d 76, in which the Supreme Court ruled that statements made in pretrial briefing constituted judicial admissions, warranting a new trial.

Prior Pleadings—Statements Properly Excluded: Novartis alleged the District Court erred when it excluded a statement in the complaint alleging the prescribing physician was aware of the risks associated with Zometa and negligently failed to warn the plaintiff. However, the statements were not statements of fact and were not judicial admissions. Novartis also alleged the District Court should have allowed it to introduce in an answer filed with the Montana Medical Legal Panel a statement from the oral surgeon who performed dental surgery on the plaintiff. Novartis sought to impeach the plaintiff with evidence that tooth extraction was the only treatment option, but it was not clear that the evidence would have affected the outcome of the case. The District Court did not err in excluding the statement. Stevens v. Novartis Pharmaceuticals Corp., 2010 MT 282, 358 Mont. 474, 247 P.3d 244.

Misrepresentation of Value of Estate — Estoppel Applicable to Prevent Advantage From Misrepresentation: A conservator knew, but failed to mention, that an estate included annuities and jointly held property that was not included in the final estate inventory. Other parties, to their detriment, relied on the inventory as an accurate representation of the value of the estate. The District Court properly held that it would not be equitable for the conservator to take advantage of the misrepresentation of the value of the estate by reducing the distribution to the other parties. The Supreme Court held that the elements of equitable estoppel were met, and the District Court was affirmed. In re Estate of Stukey, 2004 MT 279, 323 M 241, 100 P3d 114 (2004). See also Elk Park Ranch, Inc. v. Park County, 282 M 154, 935 P2d 1131 (1997).

Partner Estopped From Claiming Damages From Formation of Corporation Necessitated by Partner's Own Acts: As a result of one partner's refusal to sign documents necessary for a farm partnership to qualify for federal funding benefits, the remaining partners formed a separate business and qualified for the benefits. The abstaining partner then claimed damages because of formation of the new business and its subsequent leasing of partnership property. The District Court held that the partner was estopped from complaining about the new business, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The partner knew the history and significance of the federal benefits to the partnership and yet refused to sign the necessary documentation shortly before the deadline, which amounted to a representation or concealment of material fact, and induced the remaining partners to form the new business. The six elements of equitable estoppel as set out in Selley v. Liberty NW. Ins. Corp., 2000 MT 76, 299 M 127, 998 P2d 156 (2000), were met, and the partner was estopped from complaining that the partnership detrimentally altered its position and then denying the just and legal consequences that were caused by the partner's own conduct, act, or omission. Pankratz Farms, Inc. v. Pankratz, 2004 MT 180, 322 M 133, 95 P3d 671 (2004).

Absence of Evidence of Rescission, Release, Waiver, or Accord and Satisfaction of Contract — Reversal Warranted: Plaintiffs owned shares in defendant's corporation and sought to sell the shares back to the corporation. The corporation sent a letter offering to purchase the shares for $64,933.60, and plaintiffs were instructed that to accept the offer, they were to sign the back of the stock certificate and mail it to the corporation. Plaintiffs did so, but included with the certificate a letter stating that by accepting the offer, plaintiffs reserved their rights under federal and state law. The corporation found the language unacceptable and declined to purchase the shares, instead returning the certificate to plaintiffs. Concerned about possessing a signed stock certificate, plaintiffs ultimately visited the corporation and surrendered the endorsed certificate in exchange for a new one. Plaintiffs then brought a breach of contract suit claiming $64,933.60 in damages, asserting that the corporation had breached its offer to repurchase the stock. The corporation denied that a contract offer existed, arguing that plaintiffs' reply was not an acceptance but rather a counteroffer, and asserted that even if a contract did exist, plaintiffs had waived their rights under it by forfeiting the endorsed certificate in favor of a new one and by failing to immediately assert their rights under the contract. A jury found that the corporation had breached its contract, causing damages in the amount of $64,933.60, but then entered a verdict for the corporation on grounds that the corporation had proved at least one of its affirmative defenses of rescission, release, waiver, or accord and satisfaction. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that only in rare cases should a jury verdict be set aside but reversed the verdict nevertheless on grounds that, even drawing all legitimate inferences in favor of the corporation, there was a complete absence of probative evidence supporting any of the corporation's affirmative defenses. The case was remanded for entry of judgment of $64,933.60 in favor of plaintiffs. Benson v. Diverse Computer Corp., 2004 MT 114, 321 M 140, 89 P3d 981 (2004), followed in Harland v. Anderson Ranch Co., 2004 MT 132, 321 M 338, 92 P3d 1160 (2004).

Parent-Child Relationship Thwarted — Equitable Estoppel Precluding Payment of Child Support: When Stiles and his wife separated, he was given responsibility for the care of his newborn son. Because Stiles was in the military at the time, he asked his sister, Cynthia, if she would care for the child for a short time while he fulfilled his duties in the Navy. Cynthia agreed, but immediately sought legal custody of the child, and physical custody of the child was ultimately granted to her by a California court. She often did not comply with court orders resulting from her custody efforts, including orders to allow Stiles visitation with the child. Stiles initially offered to pay for the child's care, but Cynthia refused any money, saying it was not needed. Nevertheless, Stiles did provide ongoing health insurance for the child. Over a decade later, Cynthia applied for and was granted public assistance, assigning any right to child support to the state. The Child Support Enforcement Division established Stiles's support obligation at $511 a month. Stiles asked Cynthia to sign a waiver of this obligation, but she refused. Stiles petitioned for judicial review, and the District Court remanded to an administrative law judge to make findings regarding Stiles's claim that Cynthia had waived her right to receive child support or that she was equitably estopped from asserting or assigning those rights. The administrative law judge found that the requisite elements of waiver and estoppel were present, and the District Court upheld the findings, holding that because Cynthia had no right to child support, she could not convey to the state rights greater than those to which she was entitled. The state appealed, asserting that the court erred when it held that estoppel and waiver applied to relieve Stiles of the obligation to provide support. The Supreme Court concluded that all six elements of equitable estoppel were met and that Cynthia had no right to receive child support from Stiles either retroactively or prospectively. Cynthia waived her right to support through her language and conduct. Nothing in the record indicated that the child's needs were not being met, and the court declined to order additional support. Although a parent is still responsible for support even in cases of voluntary relinquishment of parental rights, Stiles's relinquishment was involuntary. The court declined to hold Stiles to normal parental responsibilities under these unique circumstances, given that the child's best interests were being served, Stiles provided health insurance for the child at all times, and Stiles was thwarted by Cynthia in his attempts to have a parent-child relationship and was not attempting to exploit narrow legal technicalities to avoid undisputed court-ordered support obligations awarded at the time of dissolution. Stiles v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2000 MT 257, 301 M 482, 10 P3d 819, 57 St. Rep. 1054 (2000), distinguishing Fitzgerald v. Fitzgerald, 190 M 66, 618 P2d 867 (1980), In re Marriage of Neiss, 228 M 479, 743 P2d 1022 (1987), and In re Support of Krug, 231 M 78, 751 P2d 171 (1988).

Truth Regarding Value of Stock Discoverable by Party Claiming Estoppel — Defense Not Available: Following termination from employment with Bitterroot International Systems, Inc. (Bitterroot), Knutson sought to exercise his buyout rights under the shareholders' agreement. Bitterroot refused to pay and sought rescission on grounds of equitable estoppel, arguing that stock had been mistakenly valued during the purchase of another business, that Spencer, majority shareholder and president of both Bitterroot and the company that was acquired, relied on Knutson's valuation to Spencer's detriment, and that Spencer was unaware of factors that Knutson failed to consider. Spencer may have been mistaken about the value of the stock, but he was in a position to discover all the information necessary to value it and participated in its valuation. The truth regarding the stocks' value was as discoverable to Spencer as to anyone else, and the District Court did not err in dismissing Bitterroot's defense of equitable estoppel. Knutson v. Bitterroot Int'l Sys., Inc., 2000 MT 203, 300 M 511, 5 P3d 554, 57 St. Rep. 800 (2000), following Elk Park Ranch, Inc. v. Park County, 282 M 154, 935 P2d 1131 (1997).

Change in Circumstances of Treating Physician in Workers' Compensation Case — Equitable Estoppel Applied to Prevent Inequitable Result: Selley suffered a work-related injury, and Liberty Northwest Insurance Corporation (Liberty) began paying wage loss and medical benefits. Prior to beginning treatment for the injury, Selley's treating physician resigned his admitting privileges because of a move to an area outside that required by area hospitals. Liberty became aware of the situation after paying benefits for 2 years and notified Selley that payments would no longer be made to the same doctor as treating physician. The issue was submitted to the Workers' Compensation Court, which decided that Liberty was not equitably estopped from refusing reimbursement. The Supreme Court noted that estoppel generally arises when a party, through its acts, conduct, or acquiescence, has caused another party in good faith to change its position for the worse. Applying the elements of equitable estoppel outlined in Dagel v. Great Falls, 250 M 224, 819 P2d 186, 48 St. Rep. 919 (1991), the court invoked the doctrine in this case because it would be unconscionable to permit Liberty to maintain a position inconsistent with one in which it had acquiesced. Although Liberty's conduct did not amount to concealment of a material fact, nevertheless, Liberty's silence and acquiescence for 2 full years amounted to a misrepresentation that the treating physician was considered appropriate for Selley's work-related injuries. Further, it would not be fair to require Selley to determine whether the physician qualified as an appropriate treating physician because the burden of determining a physician's qualifications lies with the insurer. Requiring Selley to change physicians in the middle of the course of progressively favorable treatment would result in Selley effectively changing position for the worse and suffering a loss by being forced to forego the well-established physician-patient relationship. Thus, the Workers' Compensation Court committed reversible error in determining that Liberty was not estopped from asserting 39-71-116 as a defense to Selley's claim. Selley v.

Liberty NW. Ins. Corp., 2000 MT 76, 299 M 127, 998 P2d 156, 57 St. Rep. 333 (2000), following Smith v. Krutar, 153 M 325, 457 P2d 459 (1969), and distinguishing Elk Park Ranch, Inc. v. Park County, 282 M 154, 935 P2d 1131, 54 St. Rep. 293 (1997).

Satisfaction of Elements of Estoppel as Question of Proof, Not Pleading: Poeppel asserted in District Court that he was misled by a county representative as to the proper time to file a grievance and that this act estopped the county from arguing that the request for a grievance was untimely. The county argued on appeal that the claim of estoppel was properly dismissed because Poeppel's complaint failed to allege the six elements of estoppel set forth in Dagel v. Great Falls, 250 M 224, 819 P2d 186, 48 St. Rep. 919 (1991). The question then became whether those elements must be alleged in the complaint or are factual issues of proof. Former Rule 9(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), requires particularity in pleading certain specified matters, not including estoppel, which is governed by the requirement in former Rule 8(e), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), which states that pleadings must be simple, concise, and direct. The allegations in Poeppel's complaint, sparse and artless as they were, nevertheless put the county on notice so that a responsive pleading could be prepared. Whether Poeppel could satisfy the elements of estoppel was a question of proof, not pleadings, and the District Court erred in dismissing the grievance for failure to state a claim. The Supreme Court did not reach the question of whether the complaint was timely because resolution of that issue hinged upon whether Poeppel could prove the claim of estoppel at trial. The case was remanded for further proceedings. Poeppel v. Flathead County, 1999 MT 130, 294 M 487, 982 P2d 1007, 56 St. Rep. 525 (1999), following Fraunhofer v. Price, 182 M 7, 594 P2d 324 (1979).

Judicial Admission Prohibiting Introduction of Further Evidence Regarding Admitted Fact: In his second and third motions to dismiss a DUI charge, Koehn conceded in writing that he had four prior convictions of DUI in South Dakota. The writing constituted a judicial admission, an express waiver made in court conceding the truth of the alleged fact, and had a conclusive effect preventing Koehn from introducing further evidence to prove, disprove, or contradict the admitted fact. Having made the judicial admission, Koehn could not argue on appeal that there was no competent evidence of the earlier convictions. St. v. Koehn, 1998 MT 234, 291 M 87, 966 P2d 143, 55 St. Rep. 985 (1998), following Rasmussen v. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund, 270 M 492, 893 P2d 337, 52 St. Rep. 317 (1995). See also Denke v. Shoemaker, 2008 MT 418, 347 M 322, 198 P3d 284 (2008).

Equitable Estoppel Not Applicable Absent Misrepresentation or Concealment of Material Facts: When Sutey Oil Company (Sutey) requested an expansion of its convenience store business that would involve adding a room with gambling machines, Sutey was informed by the county permit official that a special permit would not be required because gambling would be considered an expansion of an existing retail and service use but that Sutey would have to adhere to all county and state requirements before construction could commence. Sutey contended that the official's statement that a special-use permit was not required equitably estopped the county from denying the request for gambling machines. The District Court properly found nothing in the record showing any conduct, act, language, or silence on the part of the county that would lend itself to equitable estoppel because, despite the official's statement, Sutey had failed to demonstrate misrepresentation or concealment of material fact, the first element of equitable estoppel. In re Petition of Sutey Oil Co., Inc. v. Anaconda-Deer Lodge County Planning Bd., 1998 MT 127, 289 M 99, 959 P2d 496, 55 St. Rep. 499 (1998).

Defendant's Statements at Trial Not Binding Judicial Admission — New Trial Not Warranted: The defendant's testimony at trial that the automobile accident was all the defendant's fault was either a legal conclusion based on the defendant's understanding of the facts as the defendant knew them or was the expression of the defendant's personal opinion. Therefore, the statements were not statements of fact and were not judicial admissions. The District Court did not err in denying the plaintiff's alternative motions for judgment notwithstanding the verdict and new trial. DeMars v. Carlstrom, 285 M 334, 948 P2d 246, 54 St. Rep. 1178 (1997), followed in Papich v. Quality Life Concepts, Inc., 2004 MT 116, 321 M 156, 91 P3d 553 (2004), and Sunset Irrigation District v. U.S., 2021 MT 25, 403 Mont. 123, 480 P.3d 214.

Equitable Estoppel of Presumption of Paternity: K.E.V. was told by M.L.V. that he was the father of her child. K.E.V. accepted his responsibilities and obligations as the child's father, purchasing maternity clothes for M.L.V., paying medical expenses related to the birth, being present at the birth, attempting to have his name listed as father on the birth certificate, and living with M.L.V. in a common-law marriage. Upon dissolution of the marriage, M.L.V. sought to deny that K.E.V. was the father of the child in order to secure sole custody, and uncontroverted medical tests in fact proved that K.E.V. was not the father. Nevertheless, the District Court properly applied the doctrine of equitable estoppel in preventing M.L.V. from contesting the presumed father-child relationship. To allow M.L.V. to assert a strict legal right in determining paternity would have allowed her to take unconscionable advantage of her own wrong. M.L.V. was properly estopped from bringing an action to rebut the presumption of paternity. In re Marriage of K.E.V. & M.L.V., 267 M 323, 883 P2d 1246, 51 St. Rep. 1055 (1994), followed in In re Paternity of Vainio, 284 M 229, 943 P2d 1282, 54 St. Rep. 858 (1997), and In re Marriage of Shorten, 1998 MT 267, 291 M 317, 967 P2d 797, 55 St. Rep. 1108 (1998).

Equitable Estoppel — Elements: There are six essential elements necessary to constitute equitable estoppel: (1) there must be conduct, acts, language, or silence amounting to a representation or a concealment of material facts; (2) these facts must be known to the party estopped at the time of his conduct, or at least the circumstances must be such that knowledge of them is necessarily imputed to him; (3) the truth concerning these facts must be unknown to the other party claiming the benefit of the estoppel at the time it was acted upon by him; (4) the conduct must be done with the intention or at least with the expectation that it will be acted upon by the other party or under the circumstances that it is both natural and probable that it will be so acted upon; (5) the conduct must be relied upon by the other party, and thus relying, he must be led to act upon it; and (6) he must in fact act upon it in such a manner as to change his position for the worse. Ducham v. Tuma, 265 M 436, 877 P2d 1002, 51 St. Rep. 595 (1994); Sweet v. Colborn School Supply, 196 M 367, 639 P2d 521, 39 St. Rep. 168 (1982), affirmed in *Dagel v. Tip Income Not Included in Original Calculation of Benefit Rate — Application of Estoppel on Remand: Ten years after his injury, claimant contended that money he received in tips but never reported should have been included in his wage base. The Supreme Court found that the passage of more than 10 years, combined with the inability of claimant or his employer to submit proof of the alleged tips, indicated that the doctrine of equitable estoppel applied. The court remanded to the Workers' Compensation Court for reconsideration of the tip income issue in light of the elements constituting equitable estoppel described in Sweet v. Colborn School Supply, 196 M 367, 639 P2d 521 (1982), Sampson v. Broadway Yellow Cab Co., 226 M 273, 735 P2d 298, 44 St. Rep. 649 (1987), distinguished in Miller v. W. Guar. Fund Serv., 248 M 132, 809 P2d 1257, 48 St. Rep. 348 (1991), in which neither equitable estoppel nor laches applied because: (1) claimant was induced by the employer as to how tips should be reported; (2) the claim for benefits specifically stated that tips were not included in wages listed; and (3) there was only a 2-year delay in asserting the claim for increased wages, during which time the insurer had constant access to claimant's employment records.

Party Precluded From Changing Position at Trial: In pretrial depositions, the claimsman and attorney for the railroad indicated that they were not contesting plaintiff's credibility as to how an accident occurred. The railroad was estopped from making a factual issue out of how the accident occurred and could not raise the issue on appeal. Plouffe v. Burlington N., Inc., 224 M 467, 730 P2d 1148, 43 St. Rep. 2341 (1986), followed in Mont. Rail Link v. Byard, 260 M 331, 860 P2d 121, 50 St. Rep. 1084 (1993), In re Marriage of McNellis, 267 M 492, 885 P2d 412, 51 St. Rep. 1125 (1994), and Rasmussen v. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund, 270 M 492, 893 P2d 337, 52 St. Rep. 317 (1995). Rasmussen was distinguished in DeMars v. Carlstrom, 285 M 334, 948 P2d 246, 54 St. Rep. 1178 (1997).

Promissory Estoppel Requiring Reversal of Summary Judgment — No Will Produced: The Supreme Court reversed summary judgment, finding that genuine issues of material fact existed regarding testimony that an original will had been altered, yet no changed will was ever produced, and that all parties agreed to abide by deceased's wishes, but there was some disagreement as to what those wishes were. Further, appellant's reliance on the promise to abide resulted in potential injury and invoked the doctrine of promissory estoppel, precluding summary judgment. Tope v. Taylor, 224 M 131, 728 P2d 789, 43 St. Rep. 2074 (1986).

Insurance Estoppel Case — General Rule: In affirming a District Court ruling that Safeco Insurance Company was estopped to deny coverage as a matter of law, the Supreme Court adopted the general rule in an insurance estoppel case set forth in 14 Couch, Insurance 2d, 51.85 (2d ed. 1982), as follows: "Where an insurer, without reservation and with actual or presumed knowledge, assumes the exclusive control of the defense of claims against the insured, it cannot thereafter withdraw and deny liability under the policy on the ground of noncoverage, prejudice to the insured by virtue of the insurer's assumption of the defense being, in this situation, conclusively presumed . . . the loss of the right of the insured to control and manage the case is itself prejudicial." The court further noted the requirement in 33-18-201 that the insurer promptly provide a reasonable explanation of the basis in the insurance policy in relation to the facts or applicable law for denial of a claim. Finally, the court cited a similar decision in Transamerica Ins. Group v. Chubb & Son, Inc., 554 P2d 1080 (Wash. 1976), where insureds were defended without reservation of rights for 10 months before the insurance company withdrew from the case, noting that in that case the Washington Court found a presumption of prejudice and granted summary judgment. Safeco Ins. Co. v. Ellinghouse, 223 M 239, 725 P2d 217, 43 St. Rep. 1689 (1986).

Estoppel as to Ownership — Use of Estoppel by Third Party Claiming Conversion by Estopped Person: A dairy operation that respondent and appellants attempted to start was not successful. Respondent had contributed the use of certain equipment to the operation. Respondent was estopped from asserting ownership of equipment as against the bank which made loans to appellants with the equipment as collateral because respondent allowed the bank to believe one of the appellants owned it. However, this did not establish that respondent transferred ownership of the equipment or led appellants, who claimed respondent converted the equipment when he sold it, to act on a belief that he transferred ownership. Farmers St. Bank of Victor v. Imperial Cattle Co., 218 M 89, 708 P2d 223, 42 St. Rep. 1419 (1985).

Siting Act Decision by State Not Estoppel for PSC Ratemaking Decision: In 1973, Montana Power Co. (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Department of Environmental Quality) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. MPC filed an application for original jurisdiction and declaratory judgment or other appropriate relief with the Supreme Court. The PSC later concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. MPC argued that the PSC was collaterally estopped from considering whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". The court held that the need issue determined in the siting process was not identical to the used and useful issue, therefore collateral estoppel was not applicable. MPC also argued that because of the certificate of need, the State was promissory estopped from excluding Unit 3 from the rate base. MPC contended that issuance of a certificate of need under the Siting Act established a contractual relationship between the State and MPC. The court held that issuance of a certificate by a governmental authority to engage in conduct that would be improper without a certificate does not create a contractual relationship between the State and the licensee. Neither the Siting Act nor the certificate of need contemplate a promise that a facility will be included in a utility's rate base. Promissory estoppel was also inapplicable. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

No Reliance on Creation of Joint Savings Account: A son was added as a joint tenant on his mother's savings accounts by signing the savings institution's signature card. The card contained language declaring one-half the deposit a gift to the joint tenant. The mother later brought an action against her son, asserting that she never intended to gift any portion of the accounts to her son but merely to allow him to withdraw money for her expenses if needed. Because the son did not show he relied on a promise or representation of his mother regarding the savings accounts, the doctrine of equitable estoppel was inapplicable. Anderson v. Baker, 196 M 494, 641 P2d 1035, 39 St. Rep. 273 (1982).

Implied Waiver — Knowledge Required: Plaintiff, a custodian at the Yellowstone County courthouse for 18 years, was discharged. His employment was “at will”. After discharge, he was told by the County Commissioners that he would be given a hearing. A letter was sent later, saying he would not be given a hearing. Plaintiff claimed the promise of a hearing operated as a waiver of the county’s right to fire him without a hearing. A waiver is an intentional and voluntary relinquishment of a known right, claim, or privilege. The record indicated that the Commissioners were not aware that plaintiff was not entitled to a hearing at the time they offered one. If they were not aware of the right to fire plaintiff without a hearing, they could not voluntarily and intentionally waive that right. An “implied waiver” can arise by conduct. This doctrine requires a detrimental reliance by the party who is led by the conduct to believe a waiver has occurred and is akin to estoppel. The record showed no evidence of reliance by plaintiff, so the doctrines of equitable estoppel and implied waiver could not apply. Reiter v. Yellowstone County, 192 M 194, 627 P2d 845, 38 St. Rep. 686 (1981), distinguished in Boreen v. Christensen, 267 M 405, 884 P2d 761, 51 St. Rep. 1014 (1994).

Estoppel and Detrimental Reliance — Separate Instructions: In an action involving the conversion of mine tailings, the court did not err in allowing two jury instructions involving the defendant’s relationship with the third-party owner of one-half of the tailings in determining defendant’s acquisition of the other one-half belonging to the plaintiff. An instruction involving representations of the third party as to ownership of all of the tailings and defendant’s reliance thereon does not conflict with an instruction estopping defendant from denying plaintiff’s ownership if he had knowledge of that ownership. Each party based his action on one of the theories, and if the jury found knowledge of ownership, as they did, there could be no good-faith reliance, hence the instructions are not inconsistent. Rock Springs Corp. v. Pierre, 189 M 137, 615 P2d 206, 37 St. Rep. 1378 (1980).

Plaintiff Estopped From Denying Ownership of Account: There was substantial evidence to support the District’s Court’s conclusion that plaintiff was equitably estopped from denying his joint and beneficial ownership of a checking account by virtue of his acknowledgment and use of the account and the defendant banks’ reliance thereon in crediting a check to that account. Plaintiff could not complain that he lacked authority to draw checks on the account when he could have remedied that situation simply by signing the signature card. Beyer v. First Nat’l Bank of Dillon, 188 M 208, 612 P2d 1285, 37 St. Rep. 1035 (1980).

Listing Property as Corporate Property to Secure Loan — Estoppel to Deny Corporate Ownership: In a conversion action by a bank against its corporate president for selling, in his individual capacity and retaining the proceeds, property that he had knowledge of and acquiesced to being listed as corporate property to secure a corporate loan, he could not, under the provisions of this section, allege that the corporation did not own the property. Farmers St. Bank v. Johnson, 188 M 55, 610 P2d 1172, 37 St. Rep. 880 (1980).

Property Listed as Corporate Property — Estoppel From Asserting Personal Ownership: A corporate officer was estopped from defending against a conversion action by a bank involving the sale and retention of proceeds by him of property that he claimed he personally owned but that was listed with his knowledge and acquiescence as company property in company financial statements and as company assets to secure a company loan. The Supreme Court, in applying the principles of equitable estoppel enumerated in Hustad v. Reed, 133 M 211, 321 P2d 1083 (1958), determined that by allowing others to rely on documents that purported to show company ownership of the property, the officer may not now assert he is the true owner. Farmers St. Bank v. Johnson, 188 M 55, 610 P2d 1172, 37 St. Rep. 880 (1980).

Estoppel by Misrepresentation: Estoppel has reference to the conduct of the person estopped. Estoppel has no application where the omissions of the party claiming estoppel brought about the problem. First Security Bank v. Goddard, 181 M 407, 593 P2d 1040, 36 St. Rep. 854 (1979), followed in McGregor v. Cushman/Mommer, 220 M 98, 714 P2d 536, 43 St. Rep. 206 (1986), and Hansen v. 75 Ranch Co., 1998 MT 77, 288 M 310, 957 P2d 32, 55 St. Rep. 322 (1998).

Amended Contract for Deed: When sellers of land argued that the buyers misled them as to the effect of an escrow agreement and warranty deed, estoppel had no application since the court found that sellers possessed a copy of the instruments for a considerable length of time and had ample opportunity to examine them. Furthermore, since sellers failed to plead fraud by amending their pleadings, they were not entitled to present parol evidence to show that these instruments constituted an acceptance of the land under the doctrine of estoppel. Tschache v. Barclay, 172 M 415, 564 P2d 1299 (1977).

Failure to Object to Stock Repurchase: Director of closely held corporation who was obligated to sell his shares back to the corporation pursuant to repurchase agreement was estopped to deny has acquiescence to the terms of the sale by virtue of his response to telephone calls indicating his willingness to sell the shares and requesting the proceeds to be paid to his creditors with the remaining balance to himself, by virtue of the corporate officer's testimony that the director knew of the board of directors' resolution to exercise its option to purchase his stock at 50% of its book value, by virtue of the director's conduct which led the corporation to believe the consent to purchase would be signed, and by virtue of the director's failure to object to the proceedings of the corporation in enacting the resolution calling for the repurchase of his stock, which actions resulted in the failure of the corporation to call a meeting of the board of directors within the period during which the corporation's right to repurchase the stock could have been properly exercised. State ex rel. Howeth v. D. A. Davidson & Co., 163 M 355, 517 P2d 722 (1973), overruled, with regard to elements of collateral estoppel, in Dagel v. Great Falls, 250 M 224, 819 P2d 186, 48 St. Rep. 919 (1991).

Lessor Not Estopped Denial of Lease — Prior Lease Matter of Record: Lessors of mineral rights were not estopped from denying validity of lease by lessee's contention that lessors led him to believe that previous lease had expired by showing him a "notice" of breach sent to previous lessee where lessee actually relied upon county records and was aware of the prior lease of record covering the same land. Christian v. A. A. Oil Corp., 161 M 420, 506 P2d 1369 (1973).

Elements of Estoppel Required: The doctrine of equitable estoppel set forth in this subsection is not available as a defense when the essential elements of estoppel are lacking. Belhumeur v. Dawson, 229 F. Supp. 78, 86 (D.C. Mont. 1964).

Constitutes Principle of Equitable Estoppel:

This subsection is the statutory declaration of the doctrine of equitable estoppel. Hustad v. Reed, 133 M 211, 321 P2d 1083 (1958); Billings v. Pierce Packing Co., 117 M 255, 161 P2d 636 (1945).

This subsection is but a crystallization into statutory form of the rule stated and forms the basic principle of equitable estoppel, citing Waddell v. School District, 74 M 91, 238 P 884 (1925). Lindblom v. Employers' Liab. Assurance Corp., 88 M 488, 295 P 1007 (1930).

Priority From Unrecorded Legacy Advancement: Where executors made an advance payment out of their personal funds to the legatee of a cash bequest, they were not estopped from asserting a debt due from the legatee, as against a judgment creditor of the legatee, even though the petition for distribution and final account showed no legacy advancements had been made. Hustad v. Reed, 133 M 211, 321 P2d 1083 (1958).

Reliance on Contractor's Estimate to Grant Loan — Lien Preference by Contractor Estopped: Equitable estoppel will prevent a contractor from asserting a lien preference for an amount over the contract price against the first mortgagee where the contractor made representation as to the total price of the work to the mortgagee and knew that the loan would not have been granted had it been for a greater amount. McGaffick v. Leigland, 130 M 332, 303 P2d 247 (1956).

Earlier Statement Inconsistent With Present Stand: In action by church members to set aside a deed executed by certain persons purporting to act as trustees, they could not be estopped by statements by one of their number proposing that the church property be sold. Smith v. St. John Baptist Church, 123 M 264, 211 P2d 975 (1949).

Exercise of Option — Earlier Disinterest Expressed: Where lessee of property with option to purchase sued for specific performance, he could not be estopped from exercising his option by testimony of statements made by lessee to lessor and prospective purchaser of property from lessor, prior to time for exercise of option, that he did not intend to purchase the property if he could get certain other property he had in mind. Fiers v. Jacobson, 123 M 242, 211 P2d 968 (1949).

Elements of Proof Required: This subsection has been construed to require all of the necessary elements of estoppel at common law, which doctrine rests largely on the facts and circumstances of the particular case; it includes the indispensable element of ignorance of the facts by the party who invokes the doctrine and that he changed his position in reliance upon the act or conduct of the party sought to be estopped, in the instant case the alleged waiver by plaintiff of any claim to the stock in question. Gerard v. Sanner, 110 M 71, 103 P2d 314 (1940).

Oral Agreement to Sell Land — Equitable Title to Other Party: Under this subsection plaintiff was estopped to deny the validity of an oral agreement for the sale of land and that he held the legal title for the benefit of defendant. Cobban v. Hecklen, 27 M 245, 70 P 805 (1902), overruled on other grounds in In re Dolezilek, 156 M 224, 478 P2d 278 (1970).

LANDLORD'S TITLE

Deed as Security of Loan: Where land was purchased by defendant and leased to plaintiff, plaintiff should not be permitted to claim that the purchase price of the land constituted a loan from defendant to plaintiff and that deed was made to defendant as security for the loan and therefore defendant held the land in trust for plaintiff. Laas v. All Persons, 121 M 43, 189 P2d 670 (1948).

JUDGMENT OR ORDER OF COURT

Decree of Distribution — Effect: A decree of distribution does not concern itself with whether a legacy has been paid, acquired by third parties, or is subject to a lien; and the decree is not the final order of the court on the point of payment in the closing of an estate, but that is the office of the decree of final discharge under section 91-3906, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed). Hustad v. Reed, 133 M 211, 321 P2d 1083 (1958).

Matters Not Involved in Proceeding: A judgment or final order in an action or proceeding is not evidence, conclusive or otherwise, of matters that were not involved in the proceeding and not determined. Hustad v. Reed, 133 M 211, 321 P2d 1083 (1958).

CASES PERTAINING TO THIS SECTION GENERALLY

Presumption That Failure to Disclose Asset Grounds to Award Asset to Other Party Considered Disputable: The husband received a bonus and profit-sharing award and deposited the funds in an investment bank account, but failed to disclose the account in the final declaration of disclosure. The account was finally disclosed 2 business days before trial. The wife contended that the presumption in 40-4-253 required the District Court to penalize the husband by awarding the late-disclosed asset to her. However, nothing in 40-4-253 states that the presumption is conclusive, so under this section, the presumption is disputable. The husband testified about why he was late in disclosing the account, and it was within the discretion of the District Court to determine the husband's credibility and decide whether the presumption was overcome. The District Court accepted the husband's explanation, and the Supreme Court declined to disturb the decision. In re Marriage of Gerhart, 2003 MT 292, 318 M 94, 78 P3d 1219 (2003).

Direct Evidence Rebutting Presumption of Regularity of Prior DUI Convictions — Remand for Evidentiary Hearing for Determination of Validity of Prior Conviction: Kvislen was charged with felony DUI based on three prior convictions. Kvislen moved to dismiss on grounds that one of the prior convictions was entered in derogation of his constitutional rights and thus could not be used to elevate the present charge to a felony. Kvislen filed an affidavit prior to trial averring that he never received notice of the prior trial and was convicted without being informed of the right to counsel. After providing the District Court with arguments to the contrary, the state moved to dismiss. The District Court, without conducting an evidentiary hearing to weigh Kvislen's affidavit against the assertions made by the state, concluded that Kvislen had not sufficiently rebutted the presumption of regularity that attaches to prior convictions and dismissed the motion, and Kvislen appealed. Citing St. v. Okland, 283 M 10, 941 P2d 431 (1997), and St. v. Jenni, 283 M 21, 938 P2d 1318 (1997), the Supreme Court noted that although a rebuttable presumption of regularity attaches to prior convictions, that presumption may be overcome by direct evidence of irregularity, and once defendant offers direct evidence, the burden shifts to the state to prove that the prior conviction was not obtained in violation of defendant's rights. Here, the state conceded that Kvislen's averments met the technical definition of direct evidence and that the state relied on insufficient evidence and failed to meet its burden of proof. Instead of denying the motion to dismiss, the District Court should have shifted the burden to the state and allowed the state to submit evidence showing that Kvislen's rights were not violated. The proper forum for consideration of the issue was through an evidentiary hearing, and the Supreme Court remanded the case for that purpose. St. v. Kvislen, 2003 MT 27, 314 M 176, 64 P3d 1006 (2003).

Sale of Lot Presumptively Including Access: It is a presumption, albeit disputable, that the complete use and enjoyment of a parcel of land includes access to that parcel. To overcome the presumption, the seller must offer evidence or some legal basis that would controvert the buyer's reliance on the presumption. Here, the Kesters sold the Erkers a house in Big Sky for approximately $310,000. The Kesters' attorney later discovered through the title company that a portion of the driveway, which provided sole access to the house, had not been conveyed by the deed to the lot and requested additional money for the deed to the driveway. There was no indication at the time of sale that any parcel was separate and distinct from the lot, nor did the Kesters reveal any intention to reserve the driveway from the purchase of the lot. Although the Erkers were charged with constructive notice of the contents of properly recorded instruments describing prior conveyances of the property, under Montana subdivision laws, the driveway was not an individual parcel of land at the time of purchase, so the Erkers could be charged only with knowledge that the purchase of the lot described in the common metes and bounds description included the driveway. Absent evidence to the contrary, the Erkers were entitled to the presumption that purchase of the lot included access to it and to summary judgment as a matter of law. Erker v. Kester, 1999 MT 231, 296 M 123, 988 P2d 1221, 56 St. Rep. 912 (1999), following Yellowstone Valley Co. v. Assoc. Mtg. Investors, Inc., 88 M 73, 290 P 255, 70 ALR 1002 (1930).

Finding That Three of Four Prior DUI Convictions Constitutionally Valid Affirmed — Use Proper to Support Felony Fifth Offense: In defending against felony DUI fifth offense, Brown raised various issues regarding the constitutionality of the prior four convictions. Allocating the respective burdens of proof as set forth in St. v. Okland, 283 M 10, 941 P2d 431, 54 St. Rep. 467 (1997), the District Court correctly found that the state met its burden of proving the constitutional validity of three of four of Brown's prior convictions. The court balanced Brown's contentions that he did not recall being informed of his right to counsel and did not sign a waiver of his right to counsel when he pleaded guilty to the prior charges with the state's evidence in the form of the Justice's Court Judge who read Brown his rights in three of the four original trials. Declining to narrowly prescribe the type of direct, affirmative evidence necessary for the state to prove the constitutionality of prior convictions, the Supreme Court found that Brown's signature on an advisement of rights form and a waiver of rights form were but factors to be considered in the totality of the circumstances. The District Court is in the best position to weigh each party's evidence and determine which will prevail and did so here. The evidence was properly used to support enhanced felony charges. St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 143, 295 M 5, 982 P2d 1030, 56 St. Rep. 560 (1999).

Allegation of Uncounseled Waiver of Right to Attorney — Burden of Proof — Testimony of Routine of City Judge Held to Create Triable Issue of Fact: Olson moved to dismiss a felony DUI charge based upon his affidavit that in his previous DUI convictions, he was not represented by counsel and was not told that he could have a court-appointed attorney. In response to Olson's affidavit, the state presented the testimony of the city judge who convicted Olson on one of the previous DUI charges. The judge testified that although he had no specific recollection of Olson's case, he always asks defendants whether they understand their rights and always reads their rights from a prepared text that includes an advisement of the right to counsel. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to Rule 406, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), this testimony is substantive evidence that creates a triable issue of fact. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred when it held that this testimony was insufficient as a matter of law to create a triable issue of fact. St. v. Olson, 283 M 27, 938 P2d 1321, 54 St. Rep. 475 (1997), followed in St. v. Couture, 1998 MT 137, 289 M 215, 959 P2d 948, 55 St. Rep. 548 (1998), and St. v. Moga, 1999 MT 283, 297 M 1, 989 P2d 856, 56 St. Rep. 1143 (1999). See also St. v. Ailport, 1998 MT 315, 292 M 172, 970 P2d 1044, 55 St. Rep. 1292 (1998).

Record Failing to Show Specific Advisement of Right to Counsel Held Insufficient Basis for Penalty Enhancement: After three previous DUI convictions, Jenni was charged with felony DUI but moved to dismiss on the grounds that he had not been represented by an attorney and had not been advised of his right to counsel. Jenni submitted an affidavit signed by himself. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to its holding in St. v. Okland, 283 M 10, 941 P2d 431, 54 St. Rep. 467 (1997), the burden shifted to the state to prove Jenni had been advised of his right to counsel and held that a court record showing that Jenni was generally advised of his rights, without specifically showing that he was advised of his right to counsel, fails to meet the state's burden. The Supreme Court therefore affirmed the District Court's dismissal of the felony DUI charge. St. v. Jenni, 283 M 21, 938 P2d 1318, 54 St. Rep. 472 (1997).

Uncounseled Waiver of Rights Held No Basis for Enhanced DUI Penalty — Presumption of Regularity of Conviction — Burden of Proof: Okland was charged with his fourth DUI violation and, by virtue of 61-8-714 and 61-8-722 (both sections now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10), was charged with a felony. Okland filed a motion to dismiss the felony charges, asserting that because he was not represented by counsel at the three previous convictions and had not adequately been advised of his right to counsel, those convictions could not be used to enhance the penalty. With his motion, Okland submitted an affidavit and a record of his 1985 conviction in Lake County. The District Court dismissed the felony charge. The Supreme Court, relying upon United States Supreme Court cases, held that a presumption of regularity attaches to prior convictions during collateral attack and that therefore, even in the absence of a transcript or record, a rebuttable presumption attaches that the prior conviction is valid and a defendant who challenges the validity of the conviction has the burden of producing direct evidence of the conviction's invalidity. In this case, the Supreme Court noted that Okland did produce sufficient evidence to shift the burden to the state and that the copy of the letter produced by the state notifying Okland that he had to complete a financial statement before a court-appointed attorney would be appointed was insufficient to meet the state's burden of proof. For this reason, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not err in granting the motion to dismiss the felony charges against Okland. St. v. Okland, 283 M 10, 941 P2d 431, 54 St. Rep. 467 (1997), followed in St. v. Jenni, 283 M 21, 938 P2d 1318, 54 St. Rep. 472 (1997), St. v. Perry, 283 M 34, 938 P2d 1325, 54 St. Rep. 478 (1997), St. v. Brown, 1999 MT 143, 295 M 5, 982 P2d 1030, 56 St. Rep. 560 (1999), *St. v. Disputable Presumption Created of Employee Status — List of Presumptions Held Not Exclusive: Berg was sued by the State Fund in a civil action for the recovery of workers' compensation premium payments. Earlier, at the time of an audit, Berg was asked by a State Fund auditor to submit evidence that 23 persons working for him were independent contractors as Berg claimed and was told that if he did not submit any evidence, the State Fund would presume that the 23 people were employees and that premiums must be paid for those people. Berg submitted no evidence. The Supreme Court contrasted the language of 26-1-601 with the language of this section regarding the exclusive or nonexclusive nature of the lists of presumptions in the two sections and, citing Werre v. David, 275 M 376, 913 P2d 625 (1996), stated that the language of 39-71-120 (now repealed) should be interpreted in its usual and ordinary meaning. The Supreme Court held that 39-71-120 (now repealed) creates a disputable presumption that a person is an employee and held that the fact that the presumption created by 39-71-120 (now repealed) is not contained in the list of disputable presumptions in this section is not controlling. The Supreme Court noted that the compiler's comment to Title 26, ch. 1, part 6, makes clear that the listing of disputable presumptions is not intended to be exclusive. State ex rel. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund v. Berg, 279 M 161, 927 P2d 975, 53 St. Rep. 1098 (1996).

Jury Instruction on Presumption of Accidental Fire Inappropriate — Evidence of Arson: Defendant's proposed jury instruction that "... ordinarily, it will be presumed that an unexplained fire was caused by an accident or natural causes or, at least, that it was not of criminal origin" was properly refused when suspicious facts strongly indicating arson accompanied the fire. St. v. Atlas, 224 M 92, 728 P2d 421, 43 St. Rep. 2042 (1986).

Siting Act Decision by State Not Estoppel for PSC Ratemaking Decision: In 1973, Montana Power Co. (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Department of Environmental Quality) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. MPC filed an application for original jurisdiction and declaratory judgment or other appropriate relief with the Supreme Court. The PSC later concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. MPC argued that the PSC was collaterally estopped from considering whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". The court held that the need issue determined in the siting process was not identical to the used and useful issue, therefore collateral estoppel was not applicable. MPC also argued that because of the certificate of need, the State was promissory estopped from excluding Unit 3 from the rate base. MPC contended that issuance of a certificate of need under the Siting Act established a contractual relationship between the State and MPC. The court held that issuance of a certificate by a governmental authority to engage in conduct that would be improper without a certificate does not create a contractual relationship between the State and the licensee. Neither the Siting Act nor the certificate of need contemplate a promise that a facility will be included in a utility's rate base. Promissory estoppel was also inapplicable. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

Use of Presumptions and Inferences in Instructions: In response to defendant's allegations that the use of statutory inferences and presumptions used in instructions effectively shifted the burden of proof on the issue of intent to defendant, the Supreme Court concluded that, when read in their entirety, the instructions can only be interpreted to mean that the State had a burden of proving every element of the offense beyond a reasonable doubt, and the use of the presumptions and inferences merely set forth, in terms entirely consistent with Montana law, how the State could meet this burden by proof of objective facts. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 581 P2d 1205 (1978).

Controversion of Presumption — Entitlement of Delayed Imposition of Sentence: Presumption that first offender under Dangerous Drug Act is entitled to delayed imposition of sentence is disputable and may be controverted by other evidence but controls unless so contradicted. St. v. Simtob, 154 M 286, 462 P2d 873 (1969).

Cause of Death — Presumption Against Suicide: In an action on a life insurance policy which bars liability in case of suicide but provided for liability in case of death from external, violent, and accidental means, the rebuttable presumption is in favor of accident, the burden of proving that death was due to accident resting however on plaintiff. Lewis v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 113 M 151, 124 P2d 579 (1942).

Instructions — Presumption as Shifting Burden to Defendant: In an action to recover on a life insurance policy which barred liability in case of suicide but provided for liability in case of death from external, violent, and accidental means, where the rebuttable presumption is in favor of accident, instruction as to presumptions was proper and not open to objection that it shifted the burden of proof from plaintiff to defendant, even though it be conceded that plaintiff's case is aided by the above presumption. Lewis v. N. Y. Life Ins. Co., 113 M 151, 124 P2d 579 (1942).

Presumption as Indirect Evidence: Under Montana statutes, a presumption remains as indirect evidence until rebutted by preponderance of contrary evidence, which must be weighed and determined by trier of facts, and disappears only when party to whom it is opposed produces sufficient evidence to preponderate against it. N. Y. Life Ins. Co. v. Gamer, 106 F2d 375 (9th Cir. 1939).

Controversion of Presumption: A disputable presumption is satisfactorily overcome by a preponderance of the evidence; it then fades away in the face of the contrary facts. Monaghan v. Standard Motor Co., 96 M 165, 29 P2d 378 (1934).

Sufficiency of Overcoming Presumption: Uncontradicted testimony is not sufficient to overcome a disputable presumption, where the inferences to be drawn from the facts and circumstances are open to different conclusions by reasonable men; nor is a mere denial by an interested witness, uncorroborated by other evidence, sufficient to overcome it. Monaghan v. Standard Motor Co., 96 M 165, 29 P2d 378 (1934).

Commercial Paper — Payment: A promissory note in the possession of the payee bearing no endorsement showing payment is presumed to be unpaid; and where the maker pleads payment, he has the burden of proving it and must produce evidence sufficient to overcome such prima facie presumption, as well as any other evidence tending to show that the note was unpaid. Vesel v. Polich Trading Co., 96 M 118, 28 P2d 858 (1934).

Presumption on Presumption: While from one fact found another fact may be presumed if the presumption is a logical result, a fact presumed may not be made the basis for a further presumption. Doran v. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 94 M 73, 20 P2d 835 (1933).

Trust Banking Practices — Allocation of Commingled Funds: A bank that, while acting in the capacity of a trustee in collecting a draft, mingles the money of the beneficiary thus collected with its own, in disregard of instructions to remit to him, and then uses the common fund will be presumed to have used its own money first, and the sum remaining will be considered to belong to the beneficiary as far as necessary to make up, if possible, the full amount due him. Hawaiian Pineapple Co. v. Browne, 69 M 140, 220 P 1114 (1923).

Instructions — Submission of Subsections: Error cannot be predicated upon the action of the court in refusing to include, in an instruction, the provisions of subsections (8), (11), and (12) of this section. It is not commendable practice to submit to jurors abstract rules of law, though they are correct. Cuerth v. Arbogast, 48 M 209, 136 P 383 (1913).

Railroad Practices — Ejection of Trespasser: It is a prima facie presumption that a railway brakeman on a freight train has authority, by virtue of his employment, to eject trespassers therefrom. In some states, however, the presumption is conclusive. Golden v. N. Pac. Ry., 39 M 435, 104 P 549 (1909).

SUBSECTION (1)

Any Evidence Consistent With Theory of Innocence — Jury Not Bound to Acquit: Because of the presumption of innocence, the defendant contended that the jury must accept his interpretation of facts in a criminal trial when testimony at trial could reasonably be interpreted to support either the State's or defendant's view. A jury is not bound to accept defendant's view and reject State's view simply because the defendant would be found not guilty under the former and guilty under the latter. It is the duty of the jury to resolve conflicts of evidence. St. v. Greenwell, 206 M 233, 670 P2d 79, 40 St. Rep. 1616 (1983).

Parking Ordinance — Presumption That Owner Parked Vehicle — Unconstitutional Shifting of Burden: In striking down a parking ordinance, the Supreme Court held that to make the owner of a vehicle prima facie liable upon proof that his vehicle has been parked illegally is equivalent to a presumption that the owner parked the vehicle. The effect of the presumption is to violate constitutional due process requirements by shifting the burden of persuasion to defendant and contradicting the presumption of innocence. Missoula v. Shea, 202 M 286, 661 P2d 410, 40 St. Rep. 91 (1983).

Effect of Possession of Stolen Property: Instruction taken from 45-6-304 (now repealed) that "you are instructed that possession of stolen property shall not constitute proof of the commission of the offense of theft. Such fact shall place a burden on the possessor to remove the effect of such fact as a circumstance to be considered with all the other evidence pointing to his guilt" was reversible error as it took away defendant's presumption of innocence and forced him to testify, by placing a burden on him to either disprove unlawful possession or prove lawful possession. That section was declared unconstitutional in St. v. Kramp, 200 M 383, 651 P2d 614, 39 St. Rep. 1819 (1982). St. v. Morigeau, 202 M 36, 656 P2d 185, 39 St. Rep. 2311 (1982).

Sandstrom Instruction With Statement Instruction Disputable: Reversal of mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was required where the court gave the following Sandstrom instruction: "The law also presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of any voluntary act committed by him. This presumption, however, is termed a disputable presumption and may be controverted by other evidence." The error was not harmless. The instruction obviously permitted the jury to presume intent without proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Intent was hotly contested and an important element of the crime charged, and because of the instruction the jury could disregard the defendant's claim that he intended only to fire a warning shot. Then, with the presumption of intent, the jury could have concluded that defendant used deadly force to intentionally kill the victim. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Jury Instructions — Intention of Consequences of Acts — Sandstrom Distinguished: Distinguishing Sandstrom, the court noted that the jury was not given a mandatory presumption, but it was told it could reasonably infer the defendant's intent for all the consequences which one acting in a like position would reasonably have expected. Nothing in the instruction lessened the duty of the State to prove every element of the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt, nor did it affect the presumption of defendant's innocence. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113, 37 St. Rep. 45 (1980), distinguishing Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Jury Instructions — Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution for theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on the presumption of innocence, an instruction on the State's burden of proof could not supplant an instruction on the presumption of innocence. The standard for prejudicial effect of the lack of the instruction was established in St. v. Harrison, 23 M 79, 57 P 647 (1899), and is more strict than that used by the U.S. Supreme Court. It is per se reversible error to deny the instruction. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224, 36 St. Rep. 1959 (1979).

Presumption in Civil Cause — Fraud: In an action involving fraud, the presumptions declared by subsections (1) and (19) of this section, that a person is innocent of wrong and that private transactions have been fair and regular, prevail until overcome by evidence satisfactory to the court. Hansen v. Johnson, 90 M 597, 4 P2d 1088 (1931).

Criminal Action — Presumption Converted: When the presumption of innocence in murder cases is overcome by evidence, its office is ended and it ceases to aid the defendant further. St. v. Colbert, 58 M 584, 194 P 145 (1920).

Presumption in Civil Cause — Wrongful Death: When a railroad engine runs into a boy on the track and the engineer, in an action brought for personal injuries, is practically charged with manslaughter, the presumption is that he is innocent of that crime. Haddox v. N. Pac. Ry., 43 M 8, 113 P 1119 (1911).

SUBSECTION (2)

Homicide — Repeated Shooting: The repeated shooting into the vital parts of the body of a live human being with a deadly weapon is evidence that the gun was used intentionally and deliberately and demonstrates the intent to kill. With this fact established, the law presumes that defendant committed the unlawful act with an unlawful intent. St. v. McLeod, 131 M 478, 311 P2d 400 (1957).

SUBSECTION (3)

Sandstrom Instruction With Statement Instruction Disputable: Reversal of mitigated deliberate homicide conviction was required where the court gave the following Sandstrom instruction: "The law also presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of any voluntary act committed by him. This presumption, however, is termed a disputable presumption and may be controverted by other evidence." The error was not harmless. The instruction obviously permitted the jury to presume intent without proof beyond a reasonable doubt. Intent was hotly contested and an important element of the crime charged, and because of the instruction the jury could disregard the defendant's claim that he intended only to fire a warning shot. Then, with the presumption of intent, the jury could have concluded that defendant used deadly force to intentionally kill the victim. St. v. Musgrove, 202 M 59, 655 P2d 982, 39 St. Rep. 2327 (1982).

Sandstrom Instruction — Harmless Error Doctrine Correct Test — Plain Error Rule Not Applicable — Federal Habeas Corpus: In rejecting the State's contention that the giving of the Sandstrom instruction (Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979)) constituted harmless error, the court stated that in applying the "harmless constitutional error" doctrine, as set out in Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), it must be shown that the constitutional right affected is not a right basic to a fair trial and it must be found harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. For conviction the Due Process Clause requires that each element of a crime be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, this being basic to a fair trial. Sandstrom instruction by shifting the burden of proof of intent, an element of the crime of homicide, to the defendant denies him due process, and thus the court cannot consider the instruction as harmless error. The "plain error" doctrine is not applicable because it only sets a standard of "highly probable" that the instruction error "materially affected the verdict", the wrong standard by which to measure the effect of constitutional error. McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478, 37 St. Rep. 1159 (D.C. Mont. 1980), reversed in 657 F2d 1107 (1981).

Sandstrom Instructions — Harmless Constitutional Error — "Overwhelming Weight of the Evidence" Test Adopted: In the Sandstrom case, the jury was instructed, "The law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts." This instruction was held unconstitutional because the jury might have interpreted it in one of two ways: (1) as a conclusive presumption; or (2) as shifting the burden of persuasion to the defendant to disprove an element of the crime, viz., that defendant "knowingly or purposely" killed the victim. Either interpretation would have rendered the instruction unconstitutional. Here, the instructions included various clarification statements, including one that, unless otherwise instructed, all presumptions are rebuttable. The first Sandstrom objection was thus met. The second objection raises the question of whether the federal constitutional error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The Montana Supreme Court adopted the test that measures the evidence as a whole and excludes the constitutional infirmity where overwhelming evidence supports the conviction. Here the evidence was undisputed, overwhelming, and uncontradicted and permitted only one rational conclusion, that the defendant had the requisite intent when he kidnapped and killed the victim. A reasonable juror could not have found otherwise. Therefore, the unconstitutional jury instructions were harmless beyond a reasonable doubt in the context of the undisputed evidence in the case, and the assigned error could not have contributed to the verdict. St. v. McKenzie, 177 M 280, 608 P2d 428, 37 St. Rep. 325 (1980).

Jury Instructions — Intention of Consequences of Acts — Sandstrom Distinguished: Distinguishing Sandstrom, the court noted that the jury was not given a mandatory presumption, but it was told it could reasonably infer the defendant's intent for all the consequences which one acting in a like position would reasonably have expected. Nothing in the instruction lessened the duty of the State to prove every element of the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt, nor did it affect the presumption of defendant's innocence. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113, 37 St. Rep. 45 (1980), distinguishing Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Unconstitutional Presumption of Intent — Sandstrom Decision: Upon finding proof of one element of the crime of deliberate homicide and of facts insufficient to establish the second, the voluntariness and ordinary consequences of defendant's action, the jurors could reasonably have concluded, in light of the instruction that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts, that they were directed to find against defendant on element of intent; the State was thus not forced to prove beyond a reasonable doubt every fact necessary to constitute the crime charged, and defendant was deprived of his constitutional rights. Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Instruction as to Intent: The instruction to the jury that "the law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts" did not violate due process standards as defined by the United States or Montana Constitution and as interpreted by relevant case authority and thus did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Sandstrom, 176 M 492, 580 P2d 106, 35 St. Rep. 744 (1978), reversed and remanded, Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Homicide — Repeated Shooting: The repeated shooting into the vital parts of the body of a live human being with a deadly weapon is evidence that the gun was used intentionally and deliberately and demonstrates the intent to kill. With this fact established, the law presumes that defendant intended the ordinary consequences of his voluntary act. This is a rebuttable presumption. St. v. McLeod, 131 M 478, 311 P2d 400 (1957).

Instituting Criminal Proceedings: A person instituting a criminal proceeding for passing a fraudulent check intends to vex, annoy, and injure such person within the meaning of the word malice in 1-1-204. Rickman v. Safeway Stores, 124 M 451, 227 P2d 607 (1951).

Fraudulent Conveyance — Voluntary Act: Where one makes a voluntary conveyance of his property without retaining sufficient property to satisfy the legal demands of his creditors, plaintiff in his action to set it aside as fraudulent is not required to show the existence of an actual fraudulent intent, the law presuming that by her voluntary act she intended the natural and inevitable consequences to flow therefrom, namely, to hinder, delay, or defraud the plaintiff in the collection of his judgment secured after the conveyance, the result being fraud in fact. Nat'l Bank of Anaconda v. Yegen, 83 M 265, 271 P 612 (1928).

Tort — Failure to Exercise Ordinary Care for Own Safety: Damages were properly denied where the uncontroverted evidence showed that the plaintiff, while working near overhead power lines, had failed to exercise ordinary care for his own safety, which failure proximately caused his injuries. Sprankle v. DeCock, 165 M 274, 530 P2d 457 (1974).

Negligence by Deceased — Wrongful Death: Deceased was presumed to have taken ordinary care of his own concerns; however, plaintiff's evidence in wrongful death action showing deceased's failure to properly test empty gasoline tank before welding it, which could very well have been cause of accident, contradicted presumption. Knowlton v. Sandaker, 150 M 438, 436 P2d 98 (1968).

Auto and Train Accident — Good Visibility: Truck driver could not recover damages from railroad where passenger train plainly visible from the truck crossed the highway and collided with the truck when it started to cross the railroad track. Monforton v. N. Pac. Ry., 138 M 191, 355 P2d 501 (1960).

Presumption Disputable — Surrounding Facts and Circumstances: The presumption that a person takes ordinary care of his own concerns is a disputable one and does not apply where the surrounding facts and circumstances show the contrary. Roberts v. Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Ry., 67 M 472, 216 P 332 (1923).

Instruction — Improper When Contributory Negligence Involved: An instruction that the law presumed that plaintiff's decedent at the time of the accident was exercising ordinary care for his safety was properly refused where the question of negligence on the part of defendant and that of contributory negligence on his part were issues of fact to be determined by the jury. Osterholm v. Butte Elec. Ry., 60 M 193, 199 P 252 (1921).

Contributory Negligence — Plaintiff Established: Although, under subsection (4) of this section, the law presumes that a person exercises ordinary care for his own safety, yet where plaintiff's own case presents evidence which, if unexplained, establishes prima facie contributory negligence, there must be evidence exculpating him or he cannot recover. Meehan v. Great N. Ry., 43 M 72, 114 P 781 (1911).

Contributory Negligence — Burden on Defendant: In an action to recover for personal injuries to a child, the burden of alleging and proving contributory negligence is upon the defendant, in the first instance, since there is a presumption of law that the plaintiff exercised ordinary care. Harrington v. Butte, Anaconda & Pac. Ry., 37 M 169, 95 P 8 (1908).

Accidental Contact With Live Wire — Tort: Where a workman, while working on a wet scaffold, slipped and in throwing out his hands came in contact with an electric company's live wire and was injured, the accidental slipping cannot be said to be negligence per se on his part, since the law presumes that plaintiff exercised ordinary care in the premises. Birsch v. Citizens' Elec. Co., 36 M 574, 93 P 940 (1908).

SUBSECTION (6)

Jury Instruction That Evidence of DUI Be Viewed With Distrust Properly Denied When Video Evidence of Driving Not Extant: The officer who stopped Morris for careless driving and subsequent DUI did not videotape Morris's driving prior to the actual stop. Morris sought to offer a jury instruction that the evidence that was offered at trial should be viewed with distrust because the state failed to offer stronger, videotape evidence that Morris was DUI. The proposed instruction was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Subsection (6) of this section presumes the existence of actual and identifiable stronger evidence, which did not exist in this case. Morris failed to provide any legal authority for the argument, and the proposed instruction on distrusting weaker evidence was properly refused. Great Falls v. Morris, 2006 MT 93, 332 M 85, 134 P3d 692 (2006).

Use of Presumption Not Shifting Burden — Relates to Type or Lack of Evidence: Although incompetence or undue influence is never presumed and it is clearly the burden of the plaintiff to prove such matters, when the defendant failed to engage in the usual practice of calling upon doctors and nurses from the confining hospital to clearly show mental capacity at the time the instrument was signed, it was not error for the District Court to rely on the presumption of this subsection because it relates only to the type and lack of evidence of the defendant, not on the plaintiff's burden of proof. Adams v. Allen, 209 M 149, 679 P2d 1232, 41 St. Rep. 610 (1984).

SUBSECTION (8)

Land and Water — Abandonment to Possessing Partner: Where the record owner of land and appurtenant water rights abandoned the land, left in possession the person with whom he had farmed the land in partnership, and never returned to claim possession, the presumption is that the person in possession had become the owner. Cook v. Hudson, 110 M 263, 103 P2d 137 (1940), overruled in Grimsley v. Spencer's Estate, 206 M 184, 670 P2d 85 (1983).

Rebuttal of Presumption: The presumption that a thing delivered by one to another belongs to the latter is rebuttable and must give way to proved facts. Hoppin v. Lang, 81 M 330, 263 P 421 (1928).

Mortgage on Record: Evidence consisting of a note given by the apparent owner of cattle and a chattel mortgage to secure the debt evidenced by it, the mortgage remaining of record uncanceled for more than a month at the time defendant claimed to have bought the livestock, was competent for the purpose of reenforcing the presumptions relative to the possession and ownership of property contained in subsections (8), (11), and (12) of this section. Cuerth v. Arbogast, 48 M 209, 136 P 383 (1913).

SUBSECTION (9)

Pledge of Automobile Title: In action by administratrix to recover amount of automobile purchase loan made by decedent to defendant, it was a question for the jury whether title certificate was first surrendered as evidence of a pledge and then returned as evidence of payment. Olson v. McLean, 132 M 111, 313 P2d 1039 (1957).

SUBSECTION (11)

Possession of Personal Property: Possession of personal property creates a rebuttable presumption that the possessor owns the property. Farmers St. Bank of Victor v. Imperial Cattle Co., 218 M 89, 708 P2d 223, 42 St. Rep. 1419 (1985), citing Park v. Grady, 62 M 246, 204 P 382 (1922).

Rebuttal of Presumption: The statutory presumption that things which a person possesses are owned by him is not allowable against ascertained and established facts to the contrary. Smith v. Armstrong, 118 M 290, 166 P2d 793 (1946).

Possession of Land: Where a person remained in possession of land and appurtenant water rights for several years after delivery to him by the owner and without any other claim being asserted, the presumption created by this subsection reinforced the presumption arising out of subsection (8) of this section that he had become the owner. Cook v. Hudson, 110 M 263, 103 P2d 137 (1940), overruled in Grimsley v. Spencer's Estate, 206 M 184, 670 P2d 85 (1983).

Fence on Land of Another — Landowner Presumed to Own: Where one places a fence on the land of another without an agreement permitting him to do so, it belongs to the owner of the land unless he chooses to require him to remove it, the presumption, disputable in nature, being that one in possession of land is also the owner of the fixtures thereon. Schmuck v. Beck, 72 M 606, 234 P 477 (1925), distinguished in Thibault v. Flynn, 133 M 461, 325 P2d 914 (1958).

Present Not Past Possession: The presumption declared by this subsection has reference to the present and not to the past; therefore an offered instruction in an action in conversion that if plaintiff's husband was in possession of the property in question prior to the time it was attached, the law presumes that he and not plaintiff was its owner, was properly refused. Wray v. Great Falls Paper Co., 72 M 461, 234 P 486 (1925).

Possession of Real Property by Mortgagee: Where the mortgagee is in possession of real property by consent of the mortgagor, he can maintain such possession against the mortgagor or any other person who cannot show title paramount to that of the mortgagor and may by ejectment recover possession as against an intruder, his possession being a sufficient prima facie showing to support a recovery, the burden being then cast upon defendant to show a superior title or right. Stack v. Coyle, 59 M 444, 197 P 747 (1921).

Possession of Cattle: A person's possession of cattle is prima facie evidence that he owns them. Kerr v. Blaine, 49 M 602, 144 P 566 (1914).

Mortgage of Cattle on Record: Evidence consisting of a note given by the apparent owner of cattle and a chattel mortgage to secure the debt evidenced by it, the mortgage remaining of record uncanceled for more than a month at the time defendant claimed to have bought certain livestock, was competent for the purpose of reenforcing the presumptions relative to the possession and ownership of property contained in subsections (8), (11), and (12) of this section. Cuerth v. Arbogast, 48 M 209, 136 P 383 (1913).

SUBSECTION (12)

Horses — Rebuttal by Agreement Over Possession: Presumption of ownership of horses by rancher from possession thereof and exercising acts of ownership was not allowable in face of established fact that owner left the horses with rancher for sale with understanding that owner was to pay for pasture and if they could not be sold to be used by rancher for breeding purposes. Smith v. Armstrong, 118 M 290, 166 P2d 793 (1946).

Rebuttal of Presumption: The statutory presumption that a person is the owner of property from exercising acts of ownership over it is not allowable against ascertained and established facts to the contrary. Smith v. Armstrong, 118 M 290, 166 P2d 793 (1946).

Possession of Land and Water: Where a person remained in possession of land and appurtenant water rights for several years after delivery to him by the owner and without any other claim being asserted, the presumption created by this subsection reinforced the presumption arising out of subsection (8) of this section that he had become the owner, and further strength is derived from the common reputation clause of this subsection. Cook v. Hudson, 110 M 263, 103 P2d 137 (1940), overruled in Grimsley v. Spencer's Estate, 206 M 184, 670 P2d 85 (1983).

Mortgage of Cattle on Record: Evidence consisting of a note given the apparent owner of cattle and a chattel mortgage to secure the debt evidenced by it, the mortgage remaining of record uncanceled for more than a month at the time defendant claimed to have bought livestock, was competent for the purpose of reenforcing the presumptions relative to the possession and ownership of property contained in subsections (8), (11), and (12) of this section. Cuerth v. Arbogast, 48 M 209, 136 P 383 (1913).

SUBSECTION (14)

Action on Official Bond — Sureties Estopped: In an action on the official bond of a Justice of the Peace, the sureties are estopped to deny the legal presumptions of regularity of the election or appointment of their principal, created by this section, or to deny his title to the office. Murphy v. Johns, 56 M 134, 182 P 115 (1919).

SUBSECTION (15)

No Abuse of Discretion in Admitting Breath Test: When the defendant failed to present contrary evidence regarding the certification of Intoxilyzer 8000 senior operators, unchallenged certification credentials may provide foundation. State v. Poitras, 2015 MT 287, 381 Mont. 211, 358 P.3d 200.

Official Duty: The recommendation of a county officer regarding establishment of a public road cannot be viewed as giving rise to an official duty that would invoke the 26-1-602(15) presumption. Even if the presumption was applicable, a lack of any record that such "duty" was performed would rebut the presumption. Oates v. Knutson, 182 M 195, 595 P2d 1181, 36 St. Rep. 1011 (1979).

Official Certificate — Rebutted by Own Contents: Statutory presumption of correctness of Secretary of State's certification as to total number of electors voting at election on the 1972 Montana Constitution was overcome by demonstrable fact, apparent from other figures in his certificate, that not that many electors cast valid votes on either side of the question. State ex rel. Cashmore v. Anderson, 160 M 175, 500 P2d 921 (1972), certiorari denied in Burger v. Anderson, 410 US 931, 35 L Ed 2d 593, 93 S Ct 1372 (1973).

Official Act by State Officer — Summary Judgment: Statutory presumption in this subsection imposed a heavy burden upon party attacking Bank Superintendent's (now State Banking Board) order permitting establishment of another bank in a community, and where Superintendent made a thorough investigation, secured opposing views, and considered all evidence, including some confidential evidence as to economic prospects within the community, the evidence that he acted within his discretionary powers was so great as to support a summary judgment denying injunction or prohibition against the Superintendent's action. Miners & Merchants Bank v. Dowdall, 158 M 142, 489 P2d 1274 (1971).

Findings of District Court: Findings and conclusions of District Court are presumed correct and will not be reversed on appeal unless evidence, even though conflicting, preponderates against them. Breen v. Indus. Accident Bd., 150 M 463, 436 P2d 701 (1968).

Maintenance of Official's Road — Established Public Highway: On basis of statutory presumption and on basis of testimony of county employee that he had been ordered to maintain road by County Commissioner who was also owner of the land, court concluded that then owner of land regarded road as public highway, in determining that public highway had been established by prescriptive use. Kostbade v. Metier, 150 M 139, 432 P2d 382 (1967).

Excusing Jurors — Presumption Upheld: Statutory presumption that "official duty has been regularly performed" was not overcome where defendant offered no evidence to show that any prospective juror was improperly excused from service and where judge testified that no prospective juror was excused from service without valid statutory excuse. St. v. Corliss, 150 M 40, 430 P2d 632 (1967).

Challenge to Conviction: Where petitioner claimed, 14 years after his conviction, that his confession had been coerced and records of the proceedings against him were incomplete but he had counsel to represent him on a second charge brought against him a few days later, presumption that petitioner had voluntarily waived right to counsel on the first charge, besides the fact that he had pleaded guilty to it so that confession was not used against him, reinforced presumption that the proceedings had not violated his constitutional rights. Frost v. St., 249 F. Supp. 349 (D.C. Mont. 1966).

Form of State Agency — Used as Required: The law presumes that the Commissioner of Agriculture [now Director, Department of Agriculture] performed his official duty as required by 80-4-224 (now repealed) and that the form of warehouse receipt used and issued by plaintiff is in the form prescribed by law and the rules and regulations of the Commissioner of Agriculture, of which the Supreme Court may take judicial notice. N. Mont. Mustard Growers Co-op v. Britton, 128 M 553, 280 P2d 1078 (1955).

Sheriff — Conversion of Personal Property — Writ of Execution: In an action for the conversion of household goods and similar items against one who had been placed in possession of plaintiff's property under Writ of Execution, it will be presumed in the absence of a showing that defendant was wrongfully in possession, that the Sheriff regularly performed his official duty, and that the goods and chattels in question were removed to the highway at his direction, where they were stolen or destroyed. Beyerlein v. Whitcomb, 95 M 293, 26 P2d 349 (1933).

Sheriff — Search in Levy of Execution: In the absence of evidence showing that a Sheriff, in attempting to make a levy of execution, made no search for personal property, it may be presumed from the recital in his return that he was unable to find any and that he had made a search. Stone-Ordean-Wells Co. v. Strong, 94 M 20, 20 P2d 639 (1933).

Conflicts of Presumptions on Officials — District Judge Prevails Over Clerk of Court: The presumption attaching to the official act of a District Judge in appointing a receiver, that he did so in consideration of a proper motion for his appointment and that notice thereof had been given, is of greater dignity than the presumption that if the motion and notice of hearing had been given, the Clerk of the District Court would have made proper entry thereof in his register of actions. Burgess v. Lasby, 91 M 482, 9 P2d 164 (1932).

School District Trustees — Election Duties: In the absence of proof in support of the contention that the trustees of a joint school district had not established polling places or defined the boundaries of election precincts for the holding of the election and that therefore the election was invalid, it will be presumed that official duty had been regularly performed. Buckhouse v. School District, 85 M 141, 277 P 961 (1929).

Act by Police Magistrate — False Imprisonment: The presumption is that a Police Magistrate [now City Court Judge] regularly performed his official duties, and to make out a cause of action against him for false imprisonment, it was necessary for plaintiff to overcome that presumption and to disclose wherein that officer was without jurisdiction, failing in which a demurrer to the complaint was properly sustained. Shampagne v. Keplinger, 78 M 114, 252 P 803 (1927).

Search Presumed Legal: The presumption that official duty has been regularly performed has the effect of evidence and is satisfactory if not controverted, and under that rule it will be presumed, in the absence of countervailing proof, that an officer in making a search and seizure did not act illegally, the burden of showing that he did being upon him who makes the assertion. State ex rel. Brown v. District Court, 72 M 213, 232 P 201 (1925).

District Judge — Approval of County Attorney in Issuing Search Warrant: Conceding (without deciding) that a District Judge may not issue a search warrant without the approval of the County Attorney, in the absence of a showing that such approval had not been given, it will be presumed that official duty was regularly performed and approval had in the manner required by law. St. v. Tesla, 69 M 503, 223 P 107 (1924).

Clerk of School Board — Acting Within Authority: Evidence that the clerk of defendant school board notified plaintiff prior to the end of his term of employment that he was discharged was sufficient without a showing that the board had acted and authorized the clerk to give the notice, the presumption being that the clerk as an officer of the board in sending the notice regularly performed his official duties, the burden of showing that he acted in excess of his authority having been upon defendant. O'Brien v. School District, 68 M 432, 219 P 1113 (1923).

Parole of Prisoner: In the absence of countervailing evidence, the presumption obtains that the State Prison Board (now Board of Pardons and Parole), in paroling a prisoner sentenced to life imprisonment for murder, regularly performed its duty and before granting the parole commuted his sentence, since without commutation in such case parole is not authorized by law. Anderson v. Wirkman, 67 M 176, 215 P 224 (1923).

Election Judges — Change of Polling Place: Where a Board of County Canvassers refused to canvass election returns from a precinct on the ground that the election had not been held at the place designated by the Board of County Commissioners, and on application for Writ of Mandate to compel them to act, it was not shown that the judges of election at the precinct had not pursued the statute giving them authority to change the place of election, it will be presumed that official duty was regularly performed by them and that they did change it, and the Writ will issue commanding action. State ex rel. Moore v. Patch, 65 M 218, 211 P 202 (1922).

Action of District Court: Upon appeals to the Supreme Court, the presumption must always be indulged that the action of the District Court proceeded, not only according to law, but that it was done in the regular mode. Marcellus v. Wright, 61 M 274, 202 P 381 (1921).

Act of Regulatory Agency — Establishing Rates: Since the presumption obtains that the Railroad Commission (now Public Service Commission) fixed and established reasonable rates in obedience to 69-14-301 (now repealed) and that the rate as established is in accordance with the approved and published tariff, a complaint which fails to allege that freight charges were not in accordance with such tariff is defective. Doney v. N. Pac. Ry., 60 M 209, 199 P 432 (1921), explained in Mont. Horse Prod. Co. v. Great N. Ry., 91 M 194, 7 P2d 919 (1932), and Great N. Ry. v. Sunburst Oil & Ref. Co., 287 US 358, 77 L Ed 60, 53 S Ct 145 (1932); overruled because of statutory misinterpretation in Sunburst Oil & Ref. Co., 91 M 216, 7 P2d 927 (1932).

Service of Summons: Before the District Court could set aside a default judgment on the ground of nonservice of summons, the defendant was obliged not only to overcome the presumption accorded to official acts but the testimony of the officer making service as well, failing in which the motion was properly denied. Gilliland v. Palatine Ins. Co., 59 M 267, 196 P 151 (1921).

Action on Official Bond — Sufficiency of Allegations: In an action on an official bond, an allegation that the official in question was by the Board of County Commissioners duly appointed and thereafter qualified and ever since has been and is now a duly appointed, qualified, and acting Justice of the Peace of a designated township is sufficient, aided by the statutory presumptions of subsections (15) and (33) of this section. Murphy v. Johns, 56 M 134, 182 P 115 (1919).

Arrest as Official Duty: In an action for false imprisonment against a Town Marshal for unlawfully and wrongfully arresting the plaintiff, the latter has the burden of proving facts sufficient to overcome the presumption that the officer who made the arrest performed an official duty in a regular manner. Grant v. Williams, 54 M 426, 171 P 276 (1918).

Record of State Agency: When the record required by law to be kept by the Montana State Board of Medical Examiners has been properly identified by an officer of the Board, the presumption attaches that it has been correctly kept. St. v. Hopkins, 54 M 52, 166 P 304 (1917).

Jury List — All Named Competent to Serve: The presumption is, when the Sheriff receives a venire for service, that every man whose name appears upon it is competent for jury service. The defendant in a criminal case who interposes a challenge to the panel on the ground that the Sheriff failed to summon all of the jurors may, therefore, rely on such presumption to establish a prima facie case to that extent. St. v. Groom, 49 M 354, 141 P 858 (1914).

Prison Warden: The presumption that official duty was regularly performed attaches to the acts of the Warden of the penitentiary. Stephens v. Conley, 48 M 352, 138 P 189 (1914).

Jurisdiction of Justice's Court: The presumptions found in this subsection and subsection (16) of this section do not relieve a party who alleges in his pleading that a judgment of a Justice of the Peace was "duly given or made" from establishing on the trial the facts concerning jurisdiction, where such allegation is controverted. Miller v. Miller, 47 M 150, 131 P 23 (1913).

Stay of Proceedings by Supreme Court — Requirement of Security: Assuming that the Supreme Court should, in a proper case where a stay of proceeding has been ordered by the trial court, use the Writ of Mandamus to compel the requirement of security pending the motion for a new trial, the presumption must be indulged that the defendant regularly pursued his duty and that the order complained of was the result of the exercise of a wise discretion. State ex rel. Robinson v. Clements, 37 M 96, 94 P 837, 95 P 845 (1908).

Official Sale of City Lots: It must be presumed that an officer complied with the statute in the sale of a city lot, though it was composed of two parcels and was sold in gross, since the parcels may not have been known or may have been offered separately and sold in gross only after it was found that there were no bidders for the parcels. Burton v. Kipp, 30 M 275, 76 P 563 (1904). See also Thomas v. Thomas, 44 M 102, 119 P 283 (1911).

City Officials — Performed Duty Regularly: It is presumed, in the absence of any showing to the contrary, that city officials did not certify an assessment prematurely to the county officials but performed their duty regularly. Beck v. Holland, 29 M 234, 74 P 410 (1903).

Correctness of Jury Instructions in Appeal Record: Under this subsection, it will be presumed, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that instructions found in the proper place in a record on appeal, with proper endorsements thereon, were put there by the trial court and its officers. Wastl v. Mont. Union Ry., 24 M 159, 61 P 9 (1900).

SUBSECTION (16)

Favors District Judge Over Clerk of Court: The presumption attaching to the official act of a District Judge in appointing a receiver, that he did so in consideration of a proper motion for his appointment and that notice thereof had been given, is of greater dignity than the presumption that if the motion and notice of hearing had been given, the Clerk of the District Court would have made proper entry thereof in his register of actions. Burgess v. Lasby, 91 M 482, 9 P2d 164 (1932).

Bill of Exceptions — Not Within Presumption: That a bill of exceptions was presented, settled, and signed within the time provided by statute must be made to appear affirmatively in the record and may not be supplied by the presumption that the trial court in settling and signing it was acting in the lawful exercise of its jurisdiction. O'Donnell v. Butte, 72 M 449, 235 P 707 (1925), distinguished in Atlantic-Pacific Oil Co. of Mont. v. Gas Dev. Co., 105 M 1, 69 P2d 750 (1937); Ingman v. Hewitt, 107 M 267, 86 P2d 653 (1938); Pierce v. Pierce, 108 M 42, 89 P2d 269 (1939); and Erdmann v. Erdmann, 127 M 252, 261 P2d 367 (1953).

Jurisdiction Presumption — Habeas Corpus: On application for Writ of Habeas Corpus, which presents the inquiry whether the trial court had jurisdiction of the subject matter of the prosecution of the defendant to render such a judgment as the law authorizes in the particular case, the presumption of jurisdiction is conclusive unless want of it appears on the face of the record, and express recitals of jurisdictional facts cannot be rebutted by evidence dehors [not within] the record. In re Shaffer, 70 M 609, 227 P 37 (1924).

Burden to Assert Lack of Jurisdiction: The presumption obtains that in rendering a judgment the court was acting in the lawful exercise of jurisdiction, and the burden of showing the contrary is upon him who makes the assertion of lack of jurisdiction. Bury v. Bury, 69 M 570, 223 P 502 (1924).

District Court Proceedings: Upon appeal to the Supreme Court, the presumption must always be indulged that the action of the District Court proceeded, not only according to law, but that it was done in the regular mode. Marcellus v. Wright, 61 M 274, 202 P 381 (1921).

Jurisdiction of Justice's Court: The presumptions found in this subsection and subsection (15) of this section do not relieve a party who alleges in his pleading that a judgment of a Justice of the Peace was "duly given or made" from establishing on the trial the facts concerning jurisdiction, where such allegation is controverted. Miller v. Miller, 47 M 150, 131 P 23 (1913).

SUBSECTION (17)

Client Bound by Attorney's Waiver of Right to Speedy Trial — Purpose of Statute: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that he, the defendant, was not bound by his attorney's waiver. Defendant asserted that 37-61-401 makes the waiver binding only if it was entered with the defendant's knowledge or upon the record in open court. Citing Bush v. Baker, 46 M 535, 129 P 550 (1913), the Supreme Court ruled that 37-61-401 has been applied only as to agreements between attorneys and that the purpose of that section is to relieve the presiding judge of the burden of determining disputes between attorneys concerning their unexecuted agreements. The Supreme Court stated that it would not apply 37-61-401 literally as to agreements between an attorney and the court; to do so would lead to absurd consequences and greatly retard the business of the courts. The Supreme Court held that the defendant was thus bound by his counsel's waiver. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Speedy Trial Clock to Start With Date of De Novo Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that his right to a speedy trial was violated because the clock should have started with the date of his arrest, not the date of appeal to District Court. Citing St. v. Sanders, 163 M 209, 516 P2d 372 (1973), the Supreme Court noted that it had adopted Standard 12-2.2(c) of the American Bar Association Standards for Criminal Justice. The standard provides that in cases of appeal or an order for a new trial, the time for trial should begin running with the order granting the new trial or, in this case, the date of appeal to District Court. The Supreme Court determined not to abandon that standard and therefore held that defendant's trial was within the 6-month limitation of 46-13-401. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Speedy Trial Not Denied by Application of Six-Month Speedy Trial Limitation to De Novo Appeal From Justice's Court to District Court: After defendant's attorney orally waived defendant's rights to a speedy trial in Justice's Court, defendant argued in his trial de novo appeal to District Court that his right to a speedy trial was violated because it is prejudicial to apply the speedy trial standards of 46-13-401 to an appeal from Justice's Court to District Court. The Supreme Court held that the argument was without merit because the 6-month limit was met in this case, both in the time for trial in Justice's Court and in the time for trial de novo in District Court. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Uncertain Testimony of Defense Counsel Insufficient to Disprove Oral Waiver of Right to Speedy Trial: At the time scheduled for defendant's trial in Justice's Court on a DUI charge, the Justice of the Peace called defense counsel into his chambers and informed him that a different date for trial was necessary because of another trial then in progress. The Justice of the Peace then issued a written order reciting the fact that an oral motion for a continuance was made by defense counsel, along with an oral waiver of defendant's right to a speedy trial. Trial was then set for a date beyond the 6-month limitation provided for in 46-13-401. In a de novo appeal to District Court, defendant raised the issue of his right to a speedy trial, and defense counsel testified he could not remember whether he made an oral motion for continuance and a waiver. The Supreme Court found that the Justice's Court's order was presumed correct under subsection (17) of this section and that the testimony of defense counsel did not demonstrate that the order was in error in reciting the waiver. St. v. Nelson, 251 M 139, 822 P2d 1086, 48 St. Rep. 1129 (1991).

Determination of Probable Cause to File Criminal Charges — No Preclusion of Later Malicious Prosecution Suit: A judicial determination of probable cause to hold a party answerable to criminal charges does not preclude the party from subsequently bringing suit for malicious prosecution. The fact that the party was held to answer the criminal charge is considered presumptive but not conclusive evidence of the existence of probable cause to initiate the criminal action. The party in a malicious prosecution action can overcome the presumption by showing by a preponderance of the evidence that there was no probable cause for filing the original criminal action. Watkins v. Spring Creek Colony, 188 M 467, 614 P2d 508, 37 St. Rep. 1176 (1980).

Default Judgment — Presumed Correct: Absent proof that evidence at hearing on entry of default judgment was insufficient or that an erroneous standard of damages was used, presumption that judgment was correct controlled on appeal, and aggrieved party could not attack evidence on which default judgment was based by introducing evidence in support of his proposed defense at hearing on his motion to vacate default judgment. Uffleman v. Labbit, 152 M 238, 448 P2d 690 (1968).

Attack on Conviction Record: Where petitioner claimed, 14 years after his conviction, that his confession had been coerced and records of the proceedings against him were incomplete, the facts that defendant had pleaded guilty to the crime charged so that confession was not used and that the record stated he had waived right to counsel reinforced presumption under this subsection that defendant's constitutional rights to counsel and against self-incrimination had not been violated. Frost v. St., 249 F. Supp. 349 (D.C. Mont. 1966).

Res Judicata — Judgment of Former Suit Relied Upon: Where, in a suit for damage to crops resulting from wrongful diversion of water, the judgment in a former suit between the same parties was relied on in aid of the plea of res judicata, the disputable presumption is that the proceedings had in such suit were regular. Cocanougher v. Mont. Life Ins. Co., 103 M 536, 64 P2d 845 (1936).

SUBSECTION (18)

Jury Finding Only on Defendant's Counterclaim: Presumption was not overcome where jury found in favor of defendant on his counterclaim filed in response to plaintiff's action for negligence from which may be inferred fact that issue of defendant's negligence was before the jury and that in not finding for plaintiff jury concluded that defendant was not negligent. Ratchiff v. Murphy, 150 M 31, 430 P2d 627 (1967).

SUBSECTION (19)

Rebuttal of Presumption: In an action involving fraud, the presumptions declared by subsection (1) of this section and this subsection, that a person is innocent of wrong and that private transactions have been fair and regular, prevail until overcome by evidence satisfactory to the court. Hansen v. Johnson, 90 M 597, 4 P2d 1088 (1931).

Fraud Not Presumed:

The law presumes that private transactions have been fair and regular. Where the record does not contain any evidence of fraud on plaintiff's part, the Supreme Court will not assume that she acted with any fraudulent intent. Citing Floyd-Jones v. Anderson, 30 M 351, 76 P 751 (1904). Mayger v. St. Louis Min. & Mill. Co., 68 M 492, 219 P 1102 (1923), distinguished in Holmes v. Potts, 132 M 477, 319 P2d 232 (1957).

Where the record contains no evidence of fraud, it will not be presumed that a party acted with fraudulent intent. Floyd-Jones v. Anderson, 30 M 351, 76 P 751 (1904).

SUBSECTION (20)

Replevin — Possession of Article: Admissions by defendants, who were engaged in the pawnbroking business, that they had a ring which was the subject matter of a suit in replevin, on the day before suit and on the day action was begun, are aided by the presumption that the ordinary course of business had been followed and were sufficient to make out a prima facie case of the present actual possession by defendants at the time the action was commenced. Sullivan v. Girson, 39 M 274, 102 P 320 (1909).

SUBSECTION (21)

Existence of Promissory Notes Creating Rebuttable Presumption of Sufficient Consideration — Speculative Statements Insufficient to Demonstrate Genuine Issue of Material Fact: Defendant Moon contended that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment to plaintiff on promissory notes because there was a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the notes were unenforceable for lack of consideration. However, this section creates a rebuttable presumption arising from the fact of the promissory note itself that the note was given for sufficient consideration. Under Rule 301(b)(2), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), Moon was required to show a preponderance of evidence contrary to the presumption in order to overcome it, otherwise the court was bound to find the assumed fact in accordance with the presumption. Moon's conclusory and speculative statements in the pleadings, briefs, and affidavits did not constitute sufficient factual evidence to demonstrate that a genuine issue of material fact existed contrary to the presumption of valid consideration, so the grant of summary judgment was proper. Envtl. Contractors, LLC v. Moon, 1999 MT 178, 295 M 268, 983 P2d 390, 56 St. Rep. 696 (1999).

SUBSECTION (23)

Rebut Presumption — Parol Evidence Acceptable: The presumption that an instrument was executed on the date set forth therein may be rebutted by evidence outside the instrument, including parol testimony. Harrison St. Bank v. USF & G Co., 94 M 100, 22 P2d 1061 (1933).

SUBSECTION (24)

Wage Claim Default — Request to Reconsider Properly Denied — Statutory Presumption of Delivery Properly Applied: The plaintiff's former employee filed a wage claim. After the plaintiff neither responded to the wage claim nor filed an appeal by the deadline, the Department of Labor and Industry issued an order for default against the plaintiff. The plaintiff then requested a redetermination of the wage claim, which the Department denied. The plaintiff appealed to the District Court and requested judicial review. The District Court found that the calculation of the wage and attorney fees award was proper. On appeal to the Supreme Court, the plaintiff argued that it had not been properly notified of the wage claim because no evidence existed that a notice letter had been sent to it. The Supreme Court nevertheless affirmed, ruling that the District Court had properly applied the statutory presumption of delivery. Griz One Firefighting v. St., 2020 MT 285, 402 Mont. 115, 475 P.3d 739.

Failure to Rebut Presumption: In a case in which the court was satisfied that a letter was correctly addressed, affixed with the proper postage, sent in the custom and habit of the business, and not returned to the sender, a presumption of receipt of letter applied. Absent additional evidence, the addressee's testimony of nonreceipt was not enough to overcome the statutory presumption. Kenyon-Noble Lumber Co. v. Dependant Foundations, Inc., 2018 MT 308, 393 Mont. 518, 432 P.3d 133.

Failure of Licensing Board to Overcome Presumption That License Renewal Timely Mailed and Received: Dr. Baldwin's chiropractor license renewal was due September 1, and the renewal packet was mailed to the Board of Chiropractors on August 17, but the Board never received it. After seeing two patients on September 2, the doctor called the Board to inquire whether the license had been reissued. The doctor was instructed to stop seeing patients because the license had not been renewed. The doctor was subsequently found to have engaged in unprofessional conduct for practicing without a license and placed on probation for 1 year, and a private letter of reprimand was placed in the doctor's license file. The doctor appealed the decision, but the District Court denied the request to reverse the decision. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. The Board did not dispute that the packet was mailed on August 17, but simply asserted that the packet was not received without offering any additional evidence of nonreceipt. Absent additional evidence, the Board failed to overcome the rebuttable presumption in subsection (24) of this section that a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of the mail. The District Court erred in affirming the Board's decision that the doctor failed to renew the license on time and practiced without a license. Baldwin v. Bd. of Chiropractors, 2003 MT 306, 318 M 188, 79 P3d 810 (2003).

Regular Mail — When Received and Who Received: Fact that letter addressed to County Department of Public Welfare was mailed does not establish when it was received or that it was received by a responsible official. Application of Hendrickson, 159 M 217, 496 P2d 1115 (1972).

Certified Mail — Required Notice: Testimony that notice was signed, placed in properly addressed envelope with sufficient postage thereon, and mailed by certified mail was sufficient foundation for District Court to admit original document into evidence and make finding that required notice was given. Treasure St. Indus., Inc. v. Leigland, 151 M 288, 443 P2d 22 (1968).

Factual Matters Strengthening Presumption: Presumption under this subsection that condemnee had received revised contract from state was strengthened by facts that condemnee received other documents enclosed in the same envelope, the envelope was not returned to the state office and the condemnee was well-known in the vicinity. Crissey v. St. Highway Comm'n., 147 M 374, 413 P2d 308 (1966), followed in Gen. Mills, Inc. v. Zerbe Bros., Inc., 207 M 19, 672 P2d 1109, 40 St. Rep. 1830 (1983).

Evidence to Give Rise to Presumption: Where the original of a business letter containing an order for merchandise could not be produced at the trial and particularly where it was conceded that the accompanying order was received, a copy thereof properly admitted, after showing payment of postage, return address on envelope, and sender's agent placing it in United States mail box, was sufficient to show that the letter was duly directed or mailed so as to give rise to the presumption of receipt thereof in the regular course of the mail. W. J. Lake & Co. v. Mont. Horse Prod. Co., 109 M 434, 97 P2d 590 (1939).

Rebuttal by Addressee — Jury Question: Positive testimony by the addressee of nonreceipt of a letter properly mailed does not overcome the presumption, rebuttable in character, that a letter duly directed and mailed was received in the regular course of mail, but the question is one of fact for the jury's determination from all of the evidence. Renland v. First Nat'l Bank, 90 M 424, 4 P2d 488 (1931), followed in Gen. Mills, Inc. v. Zerbe Bros., Inc., 207 M 19, 672 P2d 1109, 40 St. Rep. 1830 (1983). See also Billings v. Lindell, 236 M 519, 771 P2d 134, 46 St. Rep. 557 (1989).

Mail to Known Places of Residence — Summons and Complaint: Defendants, to each of whom copies of the summons and complaint were mailed at their known places of residence, are presumed to have had actual notice of the pendency of the action. Smith v. Collis, 42 M 350, 112 P 1070 (1910).

SUBSECTION (25)

Identity of Person Previously Convicted — No Identity Presumption:

Where a defendant was charged with a prior conviction of a felony, there must be some evidence aside from the judgment itself that the person who stood convicted by the prior judgment of conviction was the defendant in the instant case. St. v. Nelson, 130 M 466, 304 P2d 1110 (1956).

When defendant was charged with the crime of grand larceny and with the prior conviction of a like offense and the only evidence introduced for the purpose of identifying defendant as the person formerly convicted was the judgment roll in the prior action, an instruction to the jury that the name of the defendant being the same in both cases, the presumption followed that he was the same person and that unless such presumption was controverted, they were bound to find accordingly, was prejudicial error in that the instruction took from the jury the question whether defendant was in fact the same person who had suffered prior conviction. St. v. Livermore, 59 M 362, 196 P 977 (1921).

SUBSECTION (26)

Presumed Not to Have Left Issue: While there is a presumption that a person not heard from for 7 years is dead, there is none that he did not leave issue. In re Baxter's Estate, 98 M 291, 39 P2d 186 (1934).

Presumption Available for All Legal Purposes: The disputable presumption declared by this subsection is available for all legal purposes and presents a prima facie case sufficient to warrant a grant of letters of administration on the estate of the absentee, the proceedings being void only when knowledge that he is alive is obtained, this being true whether the proceedings rest upon a misapprehension of the fact of death or upon the presumption. Williams v. Hefner, 89 M 361, 297 P 492 (1931).

Diligent Search — Death Presumed: The law presumes the death of a person who is shown to have departed from her home more than 14 years prior to application for letters of administration and has never returned and who has never been heard of by her mother and sisters for more than 14 years, although they have made diligent search in the attempt to find her. In re Liter's Estate, 19 M 474, 48 P 753 (1897).

SUBSECTION (27)

Possession of Land and Water: Where a person remained in possession of land and appurtenant water rights for several years after delivery to him by the owner and without any other claim being asserted, the presumption arising out of this subsection reinforced the presumption of ownership arising out of subsections (8), (11), and (12) of this section. Cook v. Hudson, 110 M 263, 103 P2d 137 (1940), overruled on other grounds in Grimsley v. Spencer's Estate, 206 M 184, 670 P2d 85 (1983).

SUBSECTION (30)

Presumption of Matrimony — Requirement of Immediacy of Common-Law Marriage Overruled: The parties declared their intent to be married in an informal ceremony in Washington in 1994. They moved to Montana in 1995 and bought a ranch together. The District Court held a hearing in 2006 on the issue of whether the parties were married under common-law. Although the husband disclaimed any intent to have entered a marriage, the court decided that the parties' consent to marry in Washington ripened into a common-law marriage under Montana law after the parties moved to Montana, so the court dissolved the marriage and distributed the marital assets. Because the state of Washington does not recognize common-law marriage, the husband contended that the Washington vows of consent could not have ripened into a Montana common-law marriage. The Supreme Court first noted the rebuttable presumption that a man and woman deporting themselves as husband and wife have entered into a lawful contract of marriage and that because the presumption of marriage is one of the strongest known to law, a finding of matrimony is favored. Citing In re Estate of Murnion, 212 M 107, 686 P2d 893 (1984), the court concluded that once the impediment of Washington law was removed by the parties' relocation to Montana, the relationship ripened into a valid marriage under Montana law. The court further addressed the statements in prior cases that a common-law marriage must take place immediately or instantly, or not at all. A party seeking to establish a common-law marriage must prove that the parties were competent to enter marriage, that there was assumption of a marital relationship by mutual consent and agreement, that the parties cohabited, and that the parties acquired the reputation, character, and status of marriage in public. However, the party is not held to the impossible burden of proving that all these elements happened immediately or instantly. In re Marriage of Swanner-Renner, 2009 MT 186, 351 M 62, 209 P3d 238 (2009), overruling Miller v. Townsend Lumber Co., 152 M 210, 448 P2d 148 (1968), In re Estate of McClelland, 168 M 160, 541 P2d 780 (1975), and other prior cases stating that a common-law marriage must take place immediately or instantly, or not at all.

Sufficient Showing of Common-Law Marriage: After Ober died, Selma came forward and asserted that she was Ober's common-law wife and should be appointed personal representative of Ober's estate. Two of Ober's brothers contested Selma's claims, noting that: (1) Selma did not assume Ober's last name; (2) the parties maintained separate property and bank accounts; (3) the parties filed tax returns and documents with the farm service agency as single persons; (4) Ober did not designate Selma as a beneficiary on a life insurance policy; (5) Ober did not report Selma as his spouse to his employer; (6) Ober granted one brother power of attorney in three separate documents; (7) Ober continued to pay rent on an apartment in Conrad even after he moved into Selma's apartment near Power; and (8) Selma continued to receive her widow's survivor benefit from the Social Security Administration under the name of her deceased husband. Contrarily, Selma testified that: (1) Ober had proposed to her and she had accepted; (2) the couple had exchanged rings shortly after the proposal; (3) Ober had used address labels that read "John or Selma Ober"; and (4) Ober carried a photograph of Selma in his wallet on which he had written "my wife". The District Court properly assessed the credibility of the witnesses and concluded that a common-law marital relationship existed by mutual consent. The court further evaluated the testimony of more than 30 witnesses as to their opinions about the relationship in concluding that Ober and Selma had established a common-law marriage by public repute. The Supreme Court held that based on the evidence in the record and testimony given by Selma as surviving spouse, the burden of proving mutual consent and confirmation of common-law marriage by public repute was satisfied. The District Court was affirmed. In re Estate of Ober, 2003 MT 7, 314 M 20, 62 P3d 1114 (2003). See also In re Estate of Alcorn, 263 M 353, 868 P2d 629 (1994), and In re Estate of Hunsaker, 1998 MT 279, 291 M 412, 968 P2d 281 (1998).

Common-Law Marriage — Not Necessary to Prove Exact Date Mutual Consent and Agreement to Enter Into Marriage Takes Place — District Court Overturned: Anne and Maurice lived together 9 years. After Maurice's death, his family challenged Anne's status as the deceased's spouse and sole heir of the estate. The District Court ruled that the evidence did not establish common-law marriage. Although mutual consent and agreement to enter into a marriage must take place at a set time, the party asserting that a common-law marriage exists does not need to prove the exact date that it occurred. However, the party must prove that the three elements for a common-law marriage all existed at one time. The Supreme Court held that a sign in front of the couple's home indicating that it was the Hunsakers' and a grandfather clock engraved with their initials, among other things, indicated that the couple held themselves out as a married couple. Although there was substantial evidence to support the District Court's findings of fact, the Supreme Court stated that its review of the record led it to believe that the court misapprehended the effect of the evidence and erred in ruling that the evidence presented did not establish that Anne was the common-law wife of Maurice. In re Estate of Hunsaker, 1998 MT 279, 291 M 412, 968 P2d 281, 55 St. Rep. 1144 (1998).

Necessary Proof: Parties seeking to establish a common-law marriage must prove: (1) that the parties were competent to enter into a marriage; (2) that they assumed a marriage relationship by mutual consent and agreement; and (3) cohabitation and repute. In re Estate of Alcorn, 263 M 353, 868 P2d 629, 51 St. Rep. 87 (1994).

Substantial Evidence of Common-Law Marriage:

Kathee's ring, which she claimed was a wedding ring Fred gave her, had intertwining horseshoes, and the sidewalk of the ranch house in which they cohabited had intertwining horseshoes with the couple's names written beneath the horseshoes. The two owned racehorses and were racing enthusiasts. They had joint checking accounts and entertained together, and she cared for him when he was ill, which was often. Others testified that they acted as a married couple and were so thought of. Kathee testified that she and Fred had agreed to a common-law marriage. They cohabited for about 9 years, from the day they met until Fred died. The law did not require her to assume Fred's last name or to list him as her beneficiary on insurance, retirement, or health insurance forms, and she testified that she filed a separate income tax return because her accountants told her to and because she thought she had to since the marriage was not recorded. There was much evidence that they held themselves out as married. The lower court properly found that a common-law marriage existed, even though other evidence was to the contrary, such as Fred's wills in which he stated that he was single. In re Estate of Alcorn, 263 M 353, 868 P2d 629, 51 St. Rep. 87 (1994).

The District Court correctly deduced that Boyd and Peggy were married by mutual agreement and established the marriage by cohabitation and repute upon a showing of substantial evidence that the parties: (1) were competent to consent to marriage; (2) exchanged wedding rings, intending to be husband and wife and go through the actual ceremony at a later time; (3) lived together and held themselves out to be a married couple; (4) were presumed to be married by friends, family, coworkers, and the contractor who designed their home; and (5) issued invitations for the wedding of Peggy's daughter in the name "Mr. and Mrs. Boyd Mahaffey". It was further noted that Boyd introduced Peggy as "my wife" and insured her on his automobile liability policy as Peggy Mahaffey. In re Marriage of Mahaffey, 245 M 424, 801 P2d 1335, 47 St. Rep. 1172 (1990).

Burden of Proof in Assertion of Common-Law Marriage: Although the public policy generally favors a finding of a valid marriage, the burden of proof remains upon the person asserting a common-law marriage. In re Marriage of Geertz, 232 M 141, 755 P2d 34, 45 St. Rep. 942 (1988).

Evidence Considered — Marriage Found: Evidence that man and woman exchanged wedding rings, mutually declared their marriage, and thereafter openly lived together supported finding that they were married. Estate of Swanson, 160 M 271, 502 P2d 33 (1972), distinguished in Estate of Slavens, 509 P2d 293 (1973).

Formal Marriage to Another: Presumption of valid common-law marriage may be overcome if divorce records from the residences of alleged common-law husband reveal that he was not divorced from former wife or had not had former marriage annulled. Spradlin v. U.S., 284 F. Supp. 763 (D.C. Mont. 1968).

Common-Law Marriage Considered: In view of statute recognizing common-law marriage, presumption that man and woman deporting themselves as husband and wife have entered into lawful contract of marriage is itself proof of marriage and is overcome as matter of law only when in light of proved facts reasonable men could no longer find in accordance with presumed fact. Spradlin v. U.S., 262 F. Supp. 502 (D.C. Mont. 1967).

Rebutted by Contrary Facts:

The disputable presumption declared by this subsection must be repelled by the party disputing it, and this may be done only by satisfactory evidence. Elliott v. Indus. Accident Bd., 101 M 246, 53 P2d 451 (1936).

Marriage cannot arise from the mere cohabitation of two persons reputed to be husband and wife, such cohabitation and reputation being merely evidence of the existence and reality of their consent; the fact that children have been born to them is not enough, and while the law will imply consent from the conduct of the parties when the facts will permit and will presume that a man and woman deporting themselves as husband and wife have entered into a lawful contract of marriage, such presumption disappears in the face of contrary facts. Welch v. All Persons, 85 M 114, 278 P 110 (1929).

Strength of Presumption — Morality Presumed: Among the disputable presumptions specified by statute is that "a man and a woman deporting themselves as husband and wife have entered into a lawful contract of marriage". Every intendment of the law is in favor of matrimony. The presumption of matrimony is one of the strongest known to the law. The law presumes morality and not immorality, marriage and not concubinage, legitimacy and not bastardy. Citing In re Rash's Estate, 21 M 170, 53 P 312 (1898). St. v. Newman, 66 M 180, 213 P 805 (1923).

SUBSECTION (31)

Controverted by Preponderance of Evidence: The disputable presumption that a child born in lawful wedlock is legitimate is successfully controverted by other evidence when the preponderance of the evidence is contrary thereto. In re Wray's Estate, 93 M 525, 19 P2d 1051 (1933).

SUBSECTION (32)

Injury Presumed to Continue: The Supreme Court reversed a Workers' Compensation Court decision that denied claimant recovery for work-related injuries. The court rejected employer's argument that claimant's present symptoms were unrelated to the prior work-related injuries, finding substantial evidence in the record in support of the presumption that injuries are presumed to continue until proved otherwise. Shupert v. Anaconda Aluminum Co., 215 M 182, 696 P2d 436, 42 St. Rep. 277 (1985).

Frequent Mortgage Transfer — Presumption Not Found: In view of the ease with which a note and mortgage may be transferred without the necessity of making a public record thereof, the fact that a previous mortgage was at one time not owned by the plaintiff did not support a conclusion that plaintiff never owned the mortgage; and with respect to a subsequent mortgage given in exchange, there was no prima facie case of want or absence of consideration, particularly after a lapse of 15 years. Sommer v. Wigen, 103 M 327, 62 P2d 333 (1936).

Presumption Diminishes With Lapse of Time: The force of the presumption set forth in this subsection diminishes with lapse of time. Sommer v. Wigen, 103 M 327, 62 P2d 333 (1936).

Existence in Past: From the fact that a condition exists at a particular time, it may not be presumed that it existed in the past. Doran v. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 94 M 73, 20 P2d 835 (1933).

Situation to Be Considered in Application of Presumption: In determining whether, in a given case, the presumption declared by this subsection applies, the elements of intervening time and the permanent or temporary nature of the particular condition must be considered. Doran v. U.S. Bldg. & Loan Ass'n, 94 M 73, 20 P2d 835 (1933).

Acquisition to Title of Land — Title Continues: Proof by plaintiff that in a given year he acquired title to the land, possession of which he seeks to recover in an action in ejectment, supplemented by the legal presumption that a thing once proved to exist continues so long as is usual with things of that nature, is sufficient, in the absence of proof to the contrary, to make out a prima facie case in his behalf. Miner v. Cook, 87 M 500, 288 P 1016 (1930).

Robbery — Defendant Knew Location of Property: In a prosecution for robbery, evidence that defendant knew that the witness 9 days before had placed his wallet containing the money in his inside vest pocket where he kept his money, which pocket had been cut out after the witness had been knocked down, was sufficient to establish the taking. St. v. Olson, 87 M 389, 287 P 938 (1930).

Continuing Corporate Ownership: In the absence of a showing by plaintiff corporation that it was no longer the owner of practically all of the capital stock of the company which distributed the natural gas conveyed into the state by the former, the presumption declared by this subsection that the proven conditions continue obtains. Gallatin Natural Gas Co. v. P.S.C., 79 M 269, 256 P 373 (1927).

Banking Procedure in Crediting Drafts and Checks: Where a bank had for some 2 years refused to credit checks and drafts to a remitting bank until after collection thereof, the presumption obtains, in the absence of a showing to the contrary, that the method adopted continued at the time it transmitted certain paper to it which was not received until the receiving bank had closed its doors, and therefore the relationship of debtor and creditor did not then exist between them, and title to the funds collected remained in the remitting bank. State ex rel. Rankin v. Banking Corp. of Mont., 74 M 491, 241 P 626 (1925).

Continuance of Agency Relationship: Under this subsection, in view of the plaintiff's agents' transactions had with the defendants and their continued visitations to the vicinity of the property sold to the defendants and repair work done, a disputable presumption existed as to the continuance of the agency relationship. Healy v. Ginoff, 69 M 116, 220 P 539 (1923).

Judge Admitted as Unbiased — Continues Lack of Bias: Where a litigant, at the time he asked for a transfer of his cause to another district, indicated that the Judge of that district was free from the bias and prejudice imputed to the former, the condition thus set forth will be presumed to continue until the contrary is shown. Stair v. Lunke, 56 M 130, 180 P 569 (1919).

Application Based Upon Nature of Thing:

The law presumes that a thing once proved to exist continues as long as is usual with things of that nature. Collins v. Thode, 54 M 405, 170 P 940 (1918).

The presumption mentioned in this subsection does not apply regardless of the nature of the thing or condition in question. It applies only to those conditions which, from their nature, must continue for some appreciable length of time. In re Murphy's Estate, 43 M 353, 116 P 1004 (1911).

Lunacy or Insanity: When lunacy or insanity of a general, habitual, or permanent nature is once shown to exist, it is presumed to continue until the presumption is overturned by countervailing evidence because it is known from experience that the condition usually continues; but such presumption does not apply to cases of intermittent or occasional insanity, as in the very nature of things the idea of continuity is excluded. In re Murphy's Estate, 43 M 353, 116 P 1004 (1911).

Increase in Water Flow — Conjectural Not Presumption: If lateral ditches are run from a canal toward the head of a swamp, the question whether the increase of flow in the canal is permanent is conjectural and the presumption embodied in this subsection cannot be indulged. Smith v. Duff, 39 M 382, 102 P 984 (1909).

Collectible Accounts Receivable: Accounts which are shown to have once been good and collectible are presumed to continue so under this subsection. Thornton-Thomas Mercantile Co. v. Bretherton, 32 M 80, 80 P 10 (1905).

SUBSECTION (33)

Findings and Conclusions of District Court: Findings and conclusions of District Court are presumed correct and will not be reversed on appeal unless the evidence, even though conflicting, preponderates against them. Breen v. Indus. Accident Bd., 150 M 463, 436 P2d 701 (1968).

Overcoming Presumption — Question for Trier of Facts: A statutory disputable presumption, such as that the law has been obeyed, is satisfactory if uncontradicted; the sufficiency of sworn testimony to overcome such a presumption is a question for the trier of facts, except where the facts proved are overwhelmingly against the presumed facts and permit but one rational and reasonable conclusion. McMahon v. Cooney, 95 M 138, 25 P2d 131 (1933).

Recitals Within Judgment Roll: Where, in the record on appeal from an order confirming a resolution of the Board of Commissioners of an irrigation district that a proposed contract be executed and an assessment levied on all irrigable lands in the district, it was stipulated that the judgment roll of the formation of the district was admitted in evidence but was not incorporated in the record, it will be presumed on appeal that it contained and recited all the law required. In re Fort Shaw Irrigation District, 81 M 170, 261 P 962 (1927).

Setting of Railway Rates: Since the presumption obtains that the Railroad Commission (now Public Service Commission) fixed and established reasonable rates in obedience to 69-14-301 (now repealed) and that the rate as established is in accordance with the approved and published tariff, a complaint which fails to allege that freight charges were not in accordance with such tariff is defective. Doney v. N. Pac. Ry., 60 M 209, 199 P 432 (1921), explained in Mont. Horse Prod. Co. v. Great N. Ry., 91 M 194, 7 P2d 919 (1932), and Great N. Ry. v. Sunburst Oil & Ref. Co., 287 US 358, 77 L Ed 60, 53 S Ct 145 (1932); overruled on basis of misinterpretation of statute in Sunburst Oil & Ref. Co. v. Great N. Ry., 91 M 216, 7 P2d 927 (1932).

Allegation Relating to Qualification of Officer: In an action on an official bond, an allegation that the official in question was by the Board of County Commissioners duly appointed and thereafter qualified and ever since has been and is now a duly appointed, qualified, and acting Justice of the Peace of a designated township is sufficient, aided by the statutory presumptions of subsections (15) and (33) of this section. Murphy v. Johns, 56 M 134, 182 P 115 (1919).

Chattel Mortgages — Endorsement or Filing: The presumption that the law has been obeyed applies to the endorsement of a satisfaction of a chattel mortgage or the filing thereof. Kerr v. Blaine, 49 M 602, 144 P 566 (1914).

SUBSECTION (38)

Warranty Deed — Donative Intent — No Fraud or Lack of Consideration: Plaintiff filed an action to set aside a warranty deed to defendant transferring land that plaintiff had received originally as a tenant in common with defendant's father under the condition that they deed the land to defendant "when they were done with it". The District Court found that defendant was not guilty of deceit or false representation and that there was fair and adequate consideration for the transfer and refused to void the deed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that there was sufficient evidence to support the District Court's findings. Although the land was valued at $300,000 to $600,000 and the consideration for the transfer was $1, plaintiff's performance of the condition requiring transfer of the land to defendant, coupled with the payment of $1, constituted fair and adequate consideration in this case. Wright v. Blevins, 217 M 439, 705 P2d 113, 42 St. Rep. 1311 (1985).

Promissory Note: The presumption is that promissory notes were supported by a sufficient consideration, and the burden of proving want of consideration is upon the party alleging it. Bielenberg v. Higgins, 85 M 69, 277 P 636 (1929); Dilts v. Brooks, 66 M 346, 213 P 600 (1923).

Allegation of Consideration: Where, in an action by the vendor to compel the purchaser to specifically perform a land contract by payment of a balance due on the purchase price, the contract was attached to and made a part of the complaint, it was error to sustain an objection to the introduction of testimony on the ground that the complaint failed to allege an adequate consideration, the burden of showing a want of it having been upon defendant. Saint v. Beal, 66 M 292, 213 P 248 (1923).

Deed — Burden on Him Who Seeks to Invalidate It: Under this subsection, a deed to land furnishes presumptive evidence of a consideration, and the burden of showing want of consideration sufficient to support it is upon him who seeks to invalidate it or avoid its effect. Lee v. Laughery, 55 M 238, 175 P 873 (1918).

Legislative Findings Rejected: The Supreme Court found 2-9-107 unconstitutional, stating that the liability limits contained therein violated Art. II, sec. 4 and 16, Mont. Const. In reaching this result, the court rejected legislative findings contained in 2-9-106, stating ". . . we find little more in the quoted legislative findings supporting § 2-9-107 than a legislative plea not to require the legislature and other political entities to provide the funds necessary to pay the just obligations of those entities". Pfost v. St., 219 M 206, 713 P2d 495, 42 St. Rep. 1957 (1985).

Highway Map: Where official highway map shows that the town of Greycliff is 10 miles east of Big Timber on the Yellowstone River, the courts will take judicial notice of such facts. St. v. Widdicombe, 130 M 325, 301 P2d 1116 (1956).

Examiner's Report: A report of a Deputy State Examiner (now in Department of Administration) as to the result of his investigation of a county office is not a public or official book or record within the meaning of this section and is inadmissible in a prosecution of the officer for larceny of public funds, especially where it is based not only upon books and records but upon affidavits. St. v. Ray, 88 M 436, 294 P 368 (1930).

School Census — Age of Statutory Rape Victim: In a prosecution for statutory rape, the school census of the county in which the prosecutrix attended school, required by law to be kept, was a public record and as such admissible as prima facie evidence of the age of the prosecutrix. St. v. Vinn, 50 M 27, 144 P 773 (1914).

Suicide Note: A suicide note written by decedent's stockbroker which stated that the stockbroker had, over a course of years, misappropriated large amounts of stock certificates entrusted to him was admissible to show that securities had been stolen prior to decedent's death and that such securities were not an "asset" for which the executor could be held responsible in an action instituted by beneficiary of decedent's estate alleging that executor had negligently failed to collect assets of decedent. In re Estate of Schueren, 162 M 417, 512 P2d 1283 (1973).

2019 Amendment: Chapter 213 in (2) at beginning substituted "The designated person shall write a report in connection with photographing the items. The report must include" for "The photographs must bear"; in (3) deleted former first sentence that read: "The writing required under subsection (2) must be made under oath by the arresting officer, and the photographs must be identified by the signature of the photographer" and in second sentence near beginning substituted "the report written pursuant to subsection (2)" for "the writing". Preamble: The preamble attached to Ch. 472, L. 2009, provided: "WHEREAS, the Department of Natural Resources and Conservation has asserted regulatory jurisdiction over the beds of various rivers and streams based on the premise that the streams are navigable and that the state therefore owns the riverbeds and streambeds; and

WHEREAS, very few Montana rivers or streams have been adjudicated as navigable, either in whole or in part; and

WHEREAS, it is not economically feasible for either the Department of Revenue or the Department of Natural Resources and Conservation to obtain judicial determinations of riverbed or streambed ownership by statewide quiet title actions, yet that ownership determination may not be made legally by unilateral administrative decisions; and

WHEREAS, if the Department of Natural Resources and Conservation wishes to assert regulatory control over the bed of a river or stream that has not been adjudicated to be navigable and was not determined navigable at the time of the original federal government surveys of the public land as evidenced by the recorded and monumented surveys of the meander lines of the river, it is required to provide written notice of the claim of state ownership to the affected property owners; and

WHEREAS, because the present claims of state ownership of riverbeds and streambeds is contrary to longstanding administrative practice and because the test for navigability depends upon evidence concerning the log floating capability of a stream at the time of statehood, there is no presumption of correctness attached to a navigability claim made by any state agency."

Legislative Findings: Section 1, Ch. 472, L. 2009, provided: "The legislature finds that:

(1) for 120 years since the admission of Montana as a state in 1889, the department of revenue and its predecessor agencies have taxed some landowners whose property abuts a river or stream on the assumption that those riparian landowners owned the property to the middle of the river or stream;

(2) in Montana v. United States, 450 U.S. 544 (1981), the United States supreme court recognized that if a river or stream is not navigable, the abutting riparian landowners own the land in the bed of the stream to the middle of the stream, but if a river or stream is navigable, the state owns the bed of the river or stream, having acquired ownership from the United States when the state was admitted to the union, and therefore Montana owns the bed of the Bighorn River where it flows through the Crow reservation;

(3) for the purpose of determining the ownership of a riverbed or streambed, the test of navigability is whether logs could be floated in the stream at the time of statehood as stated in Montana Coalition for Stream Access v. Curran, 38, 682 P.2d 163 (1984), based upon The Montello, 87 U.S. 430 (1874), Sierra Pacific Power Co. v. Federal Energy Regulatory Commission, 681 F.2d 1134 (9th Cir. 1982), and State of Oregon v. Riverfront Protection Association, 672 F.2d 792 (9th Cir. 1982);

(4) beginning with tax assessments that were effective January 1, 2008, the lien date for real property taxes, the department of revenue reassessed the property of riparian landowners whose land abuts various rivers and streams by reducing the amount of land assessed based upon the premise that the landowners did not own to the middle of the river or stream because the river or stream was navigable and these reassessments, if correct, have enormous impact upon the riparian landowners because they affect land titles, acreage owned, qualification for various conservation and price support programs, and ownership of water diversion facilities and other structures that the riparian landowners have constructed for water usage;

(5) the 2008 reassessments were made by simply sending out tax bills without any notice that they were based upon a claim of state ownership of the riverbeds or streambeds and some riparian landowners have paid the first installment of 2008 real property taxes based upon the reassessments without realizing that a claim of state ownership of the riverbeds and streambeds was the basis for the reassessments;

(6) procedural due process requires that if a claim of change in ownership is involved, the state agency involved shall afford the affected property owners both notice of the claim and the opportunity to be heard;

(7) the 2008 real property tax assessments based upon claims of state ownership did not comply with the constitutional requirement for procedural due process and under that circumstance payment by the property owners of taxes based on the reassessment does not constitute acquiescence in the underlying state ownership claim;

(8) The department of revenue is required to provide written notice to the affected property owners of the state's claim of ownership so that the affected property owners have a fair opportunity to be heard and to dispute the government's claim."

Effective Date: Section 18, Ch. 472, L. 2009, provided: "[This act] is effective on passage and approval." Approved May 6, 2009.

Voluntary Payment Not Qualified as Credit Against Judgment: Shilhaneks were injured in a vehicle accident, and defendants were ordered to pay more than $3 million in damages. Defendants deposited money with the federal District Court for payment of Shilhaneks' accrued medical expenses, which subsequently became the subject of an interpleader action between Shilhaneks and their health insurance provider, and then sought to reduce the damage award commensurate with the amount deposited with the federal court, contending that the funds were deposited in accordance with Ridley v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 286 M 325, 951 P2d 987, 54 St. Rep. 1430 (1997), and constituted a voluntary payment for which defendants were entitled to a corresponding offset against the judgment. Without prejudice, the state District Court denied the request for an offset pending the eventual decision of the federal court. The Supreme Court concurred, noting that although the payments were made on behalf of defendants, the payments were not made to Shilhaneks or anyone on their behalf; thus, the voluntary payment in this case did not currently qualify for a credit against the judgment in favor of Shilhaneks under 26-1-706. Shilhanek v. D-2 Trucking, Inc., 2000 MT 16, 298 M 101, 994 P2d 1105, 57 St. Rep. 89 (2000).

Case Notes

Separate Suits Against Copartner and Bank — Settlement With One — No Release of Other: Bank depositor sued his bank and his partner in separate actions after the partner induced the bank to change a signature card requiring both partners' signatures so that defendant partner could make withdrawals on his signature alone. Depositor did not release his claim against the bank when he settled with his partner because: (1) the claims against the two were not based entirely on the same conduct; (2) assuming the two were joint tortfeasors, any release of one might specifically exclude the other; and (3) nothing in the record indicated either a release or nonrelease of the bank. Tribby v. NW. Bank of Great Falls, 217 M 196, 704 P2d 409, 42 St. Rep. 1133 (1985).

Plaintiff's Refusal of Settlement — Not Relevant to Mitigation of Damages or to Defendant's Intent: The District Court properly excluded evidence of defendant's offer to compromise and settle plaintiff's claim. The court was not persuaded by defendant's argument that refusing a settlement offer is a failure to mitigate damages and that the offer showed defendant did not seek to act towards plaintiff in an oppressive or retaliatory fashion. Tribby v. NW. Bank of Great Falls, 217 M 196, 704 P2d 409, 42 St. Rep. 1133 (1985).

Case Notes

Insurance Proceeds Distributed Pursuant to Jury Verdict — Remand and Retrial Possible — Appeal Not Moot: The defendants, Stuiwenga and Evans, were injured in a single-car accident. Each defendant said the other was driving at the time of the accident. The owner's insurer filed an interpleader action to determine to whom it should pay insurance proceeds. Ultimately, a jury concluded that Evans was the driver. After denying Evans' motion for a new trial, the District Court ordered that the insurance company release the entire amount of available insurance, $25,000, to Stuiwenga. Evans appealed, and the Supreme Court considered whether the appeal was moot since the $25,000 had been remitted to Stuiwenga. Following a thorough review of Montana case law on mootness, the Supreme Court determined that when the underlying judgment has been satisfied, the question is whether the Supreme Court can grant effective relief, which depends on the unique facts and procedural posture of the case. Here, the appeal was not moot because the Supreme Court could remand the case and Evans could prevail at the retrial, in which case Evans could have a restitution claim against Stuvenga. Progressive Direct Ins. Co. v. Stuvenga, 2012 MT 75, 364 Mont. 390, 276 P.3d 867.

Appeal Moot for Inability of Supreme Court to Grant Relief: Plaintiffs owned a ranch, but being in default and facing foreclosure, they made a deal with defendant Bell whereby Bell would borrow money to pay off plaintiffs' debt and plaintiffs would receive an ownership interest in Bell's company formed to manage the ranch. However, the mortgage was never transferred into the company, and plaintiffs sued Bell for fraud and breach of contract. A jury granted plaintiffs $500,000 in damages for Bell's breach of contract, and Bell appealed. Bell ultimately declared bankruptcy and sold the ranch to pay off the loan and to pay off the money judgment owed to plaintiffs, whereby plaintiffs' mortgage on the ranch was released. Plaintiffs moved that Bell's appeal be dismissed for mootness, and the Supreme Court agreed. The $500,000 judgment could not simply be reversed with plaintiffs retaining ownership because the ranch had been sold, and Bell would be considerably richer than he was at the beginning of the deal, having invested little of his own money, and plaintiffs would have nothing. Therefore, applying Turner v. Mtn. Eng'r & Constr., Inc., 276 M 55, 915 P2d 799 (1996), the Supreme Court held that Bell's claim was moot based on the court's inability to grant effective relief. Graveyard Creek Ranch, Inc. v. Bell, 2005 MT 172, 327 M 491, 116 P3d 779 (2005). Turner was also applied on the same grounds in Mills v. Alta Vista Ranch, LLC, 2008 MT 214, 344 M 212, 187 P3d 627 (2008).

Negligence Judgment for Plaintiff Not Reducible by Medical Payments Made by Defendants' Insurer Under No-Fault Coverage: Medical payments coverage amounts that defendants' insurer paid plaintiff injured when she fell on defendants' property were made under a no-fault coverage provision and thus were not voluntary payments under this section. Because the insurer was contractually required to make the payments on demand, the judgment for plaintiff should not have been reduced by the amount of the payments. The payments were less than the statutorily required amount of $50,000 at which the collateral source reduction rule in 27-1-308 applies. O'Hern v. Pankratz, 2001 MT 35, 304 M 194, 19 P3d 807 (2001).

Voluntary Payment Not Qualified as Credit Against Judgment: Shilhaneks were injured in a vehicle accident, and defendants were ordered to pay more than $3 million in damages. Defendants deposited money with the federal District Court for payment of Shilhaneks' accrued medical expenses, which subsequently became the subject of an interpleader action between Shilhaneks and their health insurance provider, and then sought to reduce the damage award commensurate with the amount deposited with the federal court, contending that the funds were deposited in accordance with Ridley v. Guar. Nat'l Ins. Co., 286 M 325, 951 P2d 987, 54 St. Rep. 1430 (1997), and constituted a voluntary payment for which defendants were entitled to a corresponding offset against the judgment. Without prejudice, the state District Court denied the request for an offset pending the eventual decision of the federal court. The Supreme Court concurred, noting that although the payments were made on behalf of defendants, the payments were not made to Shilhaneks or anyone on their behalf; thus, the voluntary payment in this case did not currently qualify for a credit against the judgment in favor of Shilhaneks under this section. Shilhanek v. D-2 Trucking, Inc., 2000 MT 16, 298 M 101, 994 P2d 1105, 57 St. Rep. 89 (2000).

Involuntary Satisfaction of Judgment — Request for Stay of Execution Not Required: Following entry and satisfaction of judgment in District Court, the parties were aware of a contemplated appeal, but no stay of execution was requested or supersedeas bond posted. After plaintiff acquired title to the disputed property pursuant to the judgment, defendant filed a notice of appeal and lis pendens, effectively preserving the status quo pending appeal. Plaintiff moved to dismiss, contending that by voluntarily satisfying the judgment, defendants waived their right to appeal. Applying Turner v. Mtn. Eng'r & Constr., Inc., 276 M 55, 915 P2d 799, 53 St. Rep. 23 (1996), the Supreme Court held that the parties' course of conduct illustrated the involuntary, rather than voluntary nature of the satisfaction of judgment. Because satisfaction was involuntary, the right to appeal was not waived. Further, under former Rule 7, M.R.App.P. (now superseded), a party may request a stay of execution, but the request is not mandatory, even though a party choosing not to seek a stay runs the risk of having the appeal become moot. Plaintiff's motion to dismiss was denied. Kennedy v. Dawson, 1999 MT 265, 296 M 430, 989 P2d 390, 56 St. Rep. 1078 (1999).

Mootness as Separate From Question of Waiver of Appeal Rights — Voluntary Versus Involuntary Performance: The question of whether compliance with a judgment was voluntary or not has bearing on whether a party has waived the right to appeal, but it has no bearing on the question of mootness, which arises when an appellate court cannot grant effective relief. The issue of mootness is separate and distinct from the question of waiver of appeal rights. Complying with the judgment does not necessarily render the appeal moot. However, if compliance is voluntary, the party may be said to have waived any objection to the judgment. In deciding whether a case is moot, it must be determined whether effective relief is available. The fact that a party has not voluntarily waived the right to appeal does not necessarily mean that effective relief can still be provided on appeal, nor may a party claim an exception to the mootness doctrine when the case became moot through that party's own failure to seek a stay of judgment. Turner v. Mtn. Eng'r & Constr., Inc., 276 M 55, 915 P2d 799, 53 St. Rep. 23 (1996), following and clarifying State ex rel. Hagerty v. Rafn, 130 M 554, 304 P2d 918 (1956), and Martin Dev. Co. v. Keeney Co., 216 M 212, 703 P2d 143 (1985), and overruling any contrary holding in Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup v. Dept. of Revenue, 167 M 429, 539 P2d 722 (1975), First Nat'l Bank in Eureka v. Giles, 225 M 467, 733 P2d 357 (1986), Moore v. Hardy, 230 M 158, 748 P2d 477 (1988), LeClair v. Reiter, 233 M 332, 760 P2d 740 (1988), and Traders St. Bank of Poplar v. Mann, 258 M 226, 852 P2d 604 (1993). Turner was followed in Kennedy v. Dawson, 1999 MT 265, 296 M 430, 989 P2d 390, 56 St. Rep. 1078 (1999). See also Gates v. Deukmejian, 987 F2d 1392 (9th Cir. 1993).

Cause Not Moot Upon Voluntary Payment: Voluntary payment of a money judgment does not automatically render a cause moot. The standard is that a defeated party's compliance with the judgment renders his appeal moot only where the compliance makes the granting of effective relief by the appellate court impossible. Moore v. Hardy, 230 M 158, 748 P2d 477, 45 St. Rep. 108 (1988), citing Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup v. Dept. of Revenue, 167 M 429, 539 P2d 722 (1975). Moore and Mont. Nat'l Bank of Roundup were overruled, with regard to voluntary versus involuntary payment or performance as affecting waiver of right to appeal without having bearing on mootness, in Turner v. Mtn. Eng'r & Constr., Inc., 276 M 55, 915 P2d 799, 53 St. Rep. 23 (1996).

Part 8 Privileges

Part Case Notes

Alcohol Abuse Program — Confidential Information — Use in Drunk Driving Prosecution or Arrest: Concerned that Magnuson was intoxicated, Kee attempted to keep him from driving away from the Kee ranch and, when the attempt failed, called the local Alcoholics Anonymous and talked of her fears to House, not knowing that Magnuson was in counseling with House under a federally funded program. Federal law provides that patients' records are confidential and that information received while performing any alcohol abuse prevention function cannot be used to initiate or substantiate any criminal prosecution. House called an undersheriff and told him Magnuson was intoxicated, was driving a Ford Bronco, that Tracy's Bar was his usual hangout, and that the undersheriff should watch out for Magnuson. While driving around, the undersheriff saw Magnuson driving erratically. When stopped, Magnuson smelled of alcohol, appeared drunk, and failed onsite sobriety tests. The information House gave the undersheriff was not tainted with the federal prohibition, and dismissal of a DUI charge on the grounds of taint would be reversed. House was not performing an alcohol abuse prevention function when he received the information from Kee, and thus the information he gave the undersheriff was not federally prohibited confidential records information. In addition, the information the undersheriff received from House was not used to initiate or substantiate any charge; the undersheriff's own observations were. St. v. Magnuson, 210 M 401, 682 P2d 1365, 41 St. Rep. 1121 (1984).

Management Consultant/Client Relationship: The relationship between a management consultant and his clients is not considered privileged under Montana law. Therefore, husband with such a position, who sought modification of child support payments granted wife pursuant to divorce, could not avoid wife's interrogatories seeking information as to his clients and income received from them on the ground it was privileged confidential information. Hughes v. Hughes, 205 M 69, 666 P2d 739, 40 St. Rep. 1102 (1983).

Right of Privacy Not Dependent on Statutory Privilege: The Human Rights Commission (HRC) issued a subpoena to the city of Billings to produce personnel files. The city refused to deliver the subpoenaed material, arguing that to do so would violate Montana's right of privacy. HRC argued that no privacy exists where there is no statutory privilege and where an employee or applicant voluntarily submits the information to the city. The court found that the information sought by the HRC is protected by Montana's constitutional right of privacy. Mont. Human Rights Div. v. Billings, 199 M 434, 649 P2d 1283, 39 St. Rep. 1504 (1982).

26-1-801. Policy to protect confidentiality in certain relations.Case Notes

Constitutional Right to Know — Does Not Include Documents Protected by Attorney-Client or Attorney-Work-Product Privilege: A citizen filed a petition for release of documents with the District Court requesting “everything related to” a civil judgment paid on behalf of the city of Billings and its insurer. The city released all nonprivileged documents and provided privilege logs describing those documents withheld on the ground of attorney-client or attorney-work-product privilege. The District Court granted summary judgment to the city on the ground that the citizen had received all of the documents that he was entitled to examine. The citizen appealed, arguing that Montana’s constitutional right to know foreclosed the city’s privilege claims. The Supreme Court determined that, given this history of the 1972 Constitutional Convention proceedings and the Montana Constitution’s own Transition Schedule, the framers’ intent is manifest that the preexisting attorney-client and attorney-work-product privileges would carry forward inviolate as essential components of the preexisting legal system regardless of the broad, clear, and unambiguous language of Art. II, sec. 9, Mont. Const. The Supreme Court thus held that documents protected by the attorney-client or attorney-work-product privilege are not subject to disclosure under Art. II, sec. 9, Mont. Const., but the attorney-client and attorney-work-product privileges must be narrowly construed to effect their limited purposes. As applied, the District Court appropriately recognized that the citizen’s position that the government cannot withhold privileged documents would be antithetical to the public interests the privileges serve and would render the attorney-client privilege and attorney-work-product privilege meaningless. Nelson v. Billings, 2018 MT 36, 390 Mont. 290, 412 P.3d 1058.

Subpoena Duces Tecum — Subject Matter — Court’s Inspection: Motion to quash was properly denied since newspaper reporter had not produced item for court’s inspection and determination as to relevancy, materiality, necessity, or applicability of statutes as to possible applicable privileges. State ex rel. Adams v. District Court, 169 M 336, 546 P2d 988 (1976).

2023 Amendment: See 2023 Session Law for amendment made by sec. 1, Ch. 446, L. 2023. Amendment effective October 1, 2023.

2005 Amendment: Chapter 158 substituted first two sentences providing that spousal privilege applies only to communications made between spouses during their marriage for former language that read: “A husband cannot be examined for or against his wife without her consent or a wife for or against her husband without his consent; nor can either, during the marriage or afterward, be, without the consent of the other, examined as to any communication made by one to the other during the marriage; but this exception” and at end of third sentence after “other” inserted “or against a child of either spouse”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective April 8, 2005.

Case Notes

Letters to Intimidate Spouse and Convince Her to Lie Under Oath — Not Subject to Spousal Immunity: The defendant was charged with partner or family member assault. While in jail and under a “no contact” order, he wrote his wife five letters directing her to not testify against him and to lie about how she had been injured. The defendant was then charged with felony tampering with evidence. The defendant filed a motion to suppress the introduction of the letters. The District Court concluded that spousal immunity precluded the wife from testifying about the letters; however, it allowed the letters to be introduced. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing that written letters could be subject to protection under spousal immunity but not if the letters were threatening, which they clearly were. Therefore, as the letters were not privileged, the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court had erred in not letting the wife testify about the letters. St. v. Forsythe, 2017 MT 61, 387 Mont. 52, 390 P.3d 945.

Spousal Privilege Immunity — Threats to Spouse and Observations by Spouse Not Privileged: At the defendant’s trial for deliberate homicide, his wife testified about the defendant’s conduct at the time of the murder and about his threats to kill her if she talked to the police. Prior to her testifying, the defendant had filed a motion in limine to prevent his wife from taking the stand, arguing that her testimony was subject to spousal privilege. The District Court disagreed, stating that only communications made in reliance on the marital relationship are entitled to the privilege. The court reasoned that the husband’s conduct at the time of the murder was not a communication, and even though his threats to his wife were a communication, they were not made in reliance on the marital relationship. Accordingly, the District Court denied the motion in limine and allowed the wife to testify. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed and the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the motion in limine. St. v. Edwards, 2011 MT 210, 361 Mont. 478, 260 P.3d 396.

Spousal Privilege Statutes — Procedural in Nature — Version in Effect at Time of Trial to Be Used: A defendant who was on trial in 2010 for a 2002 homicide sought to exclude his wife's testimony based on the spousal privilege statutes. With the parties' agreement, the District Court applied the 2001 versions of the statutes because they were in effect at the time of the homicide. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that the spousal privilege statutes are procedural in nature. Therefore, it concluded that the 2009 versions of the statutes should have been applied because they were in effect at the time of the trial. St. v. Edwards, 2011 MT 210, 361 Mont. 478, 260 P.3d 396. See also St. v. Moore, 254 Mont. 241, 836 P.2d 604 (1992).

Testimony Allowed Despite Marriage Between Defendant and Witness After Crime Charged but Before Trial — Applicability of Spousal Privilege — Harmless Error: After Baldwin was charged for several drug crimes, he married one of the witnesses who was to testify against him. The District Court cited 46-16-212 and allowed the witness to testify. Baldwin asserted error, and the Supreme Court agreed. The language of 46-16-212 applies to the competency of a spouse to testify, not to spousal privilege. Because Baldwin and the witness were married at the time of trial, under this section, the testimony should have been excluded based on spousal privilege. However, admission of the testimony in this case was harmless error because the testimony of several other witnesses was sufficient to support Baldwin's conviction. St. v. Baldwin, 2003 MT 346, 318 M 489, 81 P3d 488 (2003).

Preindictment Delay — No Violation of Due Process: Defendant forged and cashed a check of his wife's and kept the proceeds for himself. The County Attorney's office investigated in March 1988 but declined to prosecute because the wife was barred from testifying against defendant by 46-16-212 (competency of spouses) and this section. The couple was divorced in May 1989. On December 12, 1989, defendant was charged with theft and forgery and was eventually convicted of theft. The Supreme Court affirmed and found that defendant had not shown actual, substantial prejudice as a result of the delay in prosecution. Prosecution was commenced within the applicable 5-year statute of limitations. The fact that defendant could no longer rely on the spousal privilege and competency of spouses statutes to prevent a witness from coming into court and testifying about the theft does not constitute "prejudice" to defendant. St. v. Krinitt, 251 M 28, 823 P2d 848, 48 St. Rep. 1088 (1991).

Presence of Third Party — Waiver of Privileged Communication: A spouse can waive spousal privilege by making an alleged privileged communication in the presence of a third party. St. v. Nettleton, 233 M 308, 760 P2d 733, 45 St. Rep. 1512 (1988).

Threshold for Privileged Spousal Communications: A full and workable definition of the threshold for communications between spouses considered privileged requires two elements: (1) the communications must be utterances or other expressions intended to convey a message from one spouse to the other, rather than acts; and (2) the message must be intended by the communicating spouse to be confidential in that it was conveyed in reliance on the confidence of the marital relationship. Therefore, statements made as threats or to assert control through fear were not considered privileged. St. v. Nettleton, 233 M 308, 760 P2d 733, 45 St. Rep. 1512 (1988).

Child Molestation Revealed in Previous Case — Testimony Thereto Not Privileged: Where the former wife of a child molester, while a witness for other parties in an unrelated custody action, testified to her former husband's acts of child molestation, the District Court did not err in admitting the wife's testimony over objection that the testimony was privileged. The testimony was properly admitted, under the rationale of In re J.H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982), and because the subject of the supposedly privileged communication (the husband's child molestation) had already been revealed to several other persons. The basis for the privilege, to protect the secrets of the husband, had thereby already disappeared. Sarsfield v. Sarsfield, 206 M 397, 671 P2d 595, 40 St. Rep. 1736 (1983). (See 2005 amendment.)

Youth in Need of Care Proceeding — Spouse May Testify — Section Constitutional: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition in District Court alleging that J. H. was a youth in need of care. The boy, his mother, and a social worker all testified that the father sexually abused the boy. The father contended that the wife's testimony was a violation of the spousal privilege. The Supreme Court held the wife could testify. The purpose of the spousal privilege is to protect the sanctity of the marriage and home. However, once a family member has been sexually abused, the sanctity of the home and the reason for the rule have been destroyed. Sexual abuse of the son by the father is also a special wrong to the wife and has particularly and directly affected her in a manner other than that suffered by the public in general. Thus, the wrong against the child is nothing more or less than a wrong against the other spouse. As such it falls into one of the exceptions to the spousal privilege. The father claimed that it was unclear whether 41-3-404 (renumbered 41-3-437) allows parents to testify in youth in need of care proceedings and therefore the section was unconstitutionally vague. The court, having found that the wife could testify against the husband, determined that the statute was not void due to vagueness. In re J. H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982). (See 2005 amendment.)

Admission of Adverse Testimony of Wife — Harmless Error: The trial court erroneously allowed defendant's wife to testify over his objection under 46-16-212, which indicates that a wife is not a competent witness against her husband without his consent in a criminal proceeding against him regardless of whether the testimony pertains to observations of the spouse's actions or whether the testimony consists of communications made between spouses. That must be distinguished from this section, which indicates that if a defendant is not married at the time of trial, his former spouse is competent to testify but cannot be examined without his consent as to any communication made between the spouses during the marriage. In the present case, the trial court's error was harmless since the wife's testimony was essentially identical to the defendant's and thus did not affect any substantial right of the defendant and there was no reasonable possibility that the wife's testimony could have contributed to defendant's conviction. St. v. Roberts, 194 M 189, 633 P2d 1214, 38 St. Rep. 1551 (1981).

Homicide Prosecution: Section 46-16-212, rather than this section, was applicable in determining existence of marital privilege in homicide prosecution. St. v. Taylor, 163 M 106, 515 P2d 695 (1973).

Statements Made to Others Besides Wife — Not Confidential: Testimony by widow as to statements made by deceased spouse was properly admitted where it was shown that deceased did not regard the communications as confidential, in that he had made the communications to others beside his wife. Thompson v. Steinkamp, 120 M 475, 187 P2d 1018 (1947), distinguished in Platts v. Platts, 134 M 474, 334 P2d 722 (1959).

Objection Required:

To take advantage of this section prohibiting wife from being examined for or against her husband without his consent, objection to competency of evidence or of the witness must be made. St. v. Palen, 119 M 600, 178 P2d 862 (1947).

Where, in a suit by a divorced husband against the representative of the estate of his deceased wife to establish a resulting trust in their former home the consideration for which was paid by plaintiff and title thereto placed in wife's name, there was no objection to plaintiff's testimony relating to direct transactions and oral communications between them affecting the property, the point will be considered waived on appeal. Lewis v. Bowman, 113 M 68, 121 P2d 162 (1942).

Christmas Card Accompanying Gift of Stolen Jewelry: Receipt by defendant's former wife of some of the articles of stolen jewelry as a Christmas gift, with an enclosed card bearing the words "May from Bernard" was not a communication within the meaning of the statute; as to the card, considering it as a communication, its admission was nonprejudicial under the facts in the case. St. v. Dixon, 80 M 181, 260 P 138 (1927).

26-1-803. Attorney-client privilege.

Compiler's Comments

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

1989 Amendment: Near end of (1), after "given", substituted "to the client" for "thereon"; and inserted (2) relating to examination of client. Amendment effective March 23, 1989.

Preamble: The preamble to Ch. 276, L. 1989, provided: "WHEREAS, a majority of courts in the United States have broadly construed the attorney-client privilege as protecting the client as well as his attorney from being compelled to disclose their confidential communications; and

WHEREAS, the United States District Court for the District of Montana, in the recent case of Lane v. All Nation Insurance Company, CV-86-054-GF (June 17, 1987), strictly construed Montana's statute regarding attorney-client privilege to allow the client to be examined concerning his confidential communications with his attorney; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature intends to amend and clarify the Montana statute to make it clear that, contrary to the Lane decision, the attorney-client privilege extends to protect the client from being required to disclose confidential communications between him and his attorney; and

WHEREAS, the courts through the common law have developed several exceptions to the attorney-client privilege; and

WHEREAS, the Legislature does not intend by this act to abolish, amend, or otherwise affect any other exceptions to the attorney-client privilege.

THEREFORE, the Legislature of the State of Montana finds it appropriate to amend the statute regarding attorney-client privilege.”

Case Notes

Breach of Rules of Professional Conduct Alone Insufficient to Require Disqualification of Counsel — Party Must Show Sufficient Proof of Prejudice — Without Evidence That Party Was Actually Prejudiced, No Abuse of Discretion to Deny Motion to Disqualify Opposing Party’s Attorney. Rysewyk v. Mont. Opticom, LLC, 2023 MT 111, 412 Mont. 420, 530 P.3d 839.

Compulsion of Attorney to Testify as to Advice Given to Client Improper — Duty of Undivided Loyalty: In the context of a criminal case advising a client of a hearing date, the disregard of which could result in additional criminal liability, the compelled testimony of an attorney would violate the duty of undivided loyalty to the attorney’s client. Furthermore, 26-1-803 prohibits the District Court from compelling the defendant’s attorney to testify about communications made without the defendant’s consent when the attorney’s testimony would prove the elements of a new charge against the defendant. Thus, the District Court erred when it denied a motion to quash a subpoena compelling an attorney to testify regarding whether the attorney had informed the client of a final pretrial conference date, an element central to a new bail-jumping charge. Sweeney v. 3rd Judicial District Court, 2018 MT 95, 391 Mont. 224, 416 P.3d 187.

Error in Granting Protective Order: Following a failed tax-deferred property exchange that subjected the plaintiffs to significant tax liability, the plaintiffs filed suit against the defendant accountant who structured the property exchange and his accounting firm. During discovery, the plaintiffs sought records including communications between the accountant and the firm and its attorneys and insurance adjusters, internal insurance company communications, and minutes from the firm’s shareholder and director meetings at which the failed property exchange was discussed. The District Court granted the defendants’ protective order, concluding that there was no relevant or discoverable evidence in the documents. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the matter to the District Court for further analysis of the work product privilege to determine whether the records were created or obtained due to the prospect of litigation or in the ordinary course of business and the attorney-client privilege to determine whether the communications not involving an attorney were made for the ultimate purpose of seeking legal advice. Draggin’ Y Cattle Co., Inc. v. Addink, 2013 MT 319, 372 Mont. 334, 312 P.3d 451.

Motion to Disqualify Properly Denied — No Violation of Rules of Professional Conduct: The wife in a dissolution proceeding moved to disqualify and enjoin the husband’s attorney on the basis that the wife had consulted the same attorney years before the dissolution was filed about representing the wife in a dissolution proceeding against the husband. The District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that disqualification was improper under Rule 1.20 of the Rules of Professional Conduct because the wife did not establish that any of the information she divulged to the attorney could have any impact on the current dissolution proceeding and that it was permissible for the attorney to testify at the disqualification hearing pursuant to Rule 3.7 of the Rules of Professional Conduct and, pursuant to Rules 1.6 and 1.9 of the Rules of Professional Conduct, to use information about her previous contact with the wife to respond to the wife’s allegations. In re Marriage of Perry, 2013 MT 6, 368 Mont. 211, 293 P.3d 170.

Letter Written by Insurer’s Counsel and Disclosed to Employer in Workers’ Compensation Claim — No Application of Attorney-Client Privilege — Protection of Work-Product Doctrine Waived by Disclosure — Supervisory Control Granted: An employee was injured at Roscoe Steel and filed a workers’ compensation claim. Zurich, which insured Roscoe Steel, accepted liability for the claim and contracted with a third party to adjust the claim. Over time, the employee and Zurich disagreed about the employee’s level of impairment. Eventually, Zurich had an attorney prepare an opinion and evaluation letter regarding the employee’s case. The letter was given to Zurich as well as to the claims adjuster, who, without the knowledge of Zurich or the attorney, gave a copy of it to Roscoe Steel. Ultimately, the employee filed an action for unfair claims settlement practices against Zurich and the claims adjuster. As a part of discovery, the employee served a subpoena duces tecum on Roscoe Steel requesting all correspondence with Zurich, the adjuster, and the attorney’s law firm. Counsel for Roscoe Steel filed an action to quash the subpoena, citing the attorney-client privilege and the attorney work-product doctrine. After the District Court denied the motion, Zurich petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted. The Supreme Court agreed that the attorney-client privilege did not apply because Roscoe Steel and Zurich did not share a common legal interest in the adjustment of the employee's claim and that Roscoe Steel was not protected by Zurich's privilege with its counsel. Similarly, because Roscoe Steel and Zurich did not share common litigation interests, there was no reasonable expectation that Roscoe Steel would keep Zurich's work product confidential, and the privilege had been waived by the letter's disclosure to Roscoe Steel. American Zurich Ins. Co. v. 13th Judicial District Court, 2012 MT 61, 364 Mont. 299, 280 P.3d 240.

No Breach of Privilege Found in Voluntary Testimony — Cautionary Instruction and Not Mistrial Affirmed as Remedy: During the trial, the defendant voluntarily made a reference to a conversation with defense counsel, to which that attorney did not object. Defense counsel then moved for a mistrial based on a violation of the attorney-client privilege. The court denied the motion but gave the jury a cautionary instruction to disregard any statements made by the defendant to defense counsel. The Supreme Court held that since there was no testimony containing the actual content of that conversation, merely a reference to the conversation, there was no breach of the privilege, and because the defendant's counsel did not object to the referenced conversation, a cautionary instruction to the jury rather than the granting of a mistrial was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion. St. v. Tadewaldt, 2010 MT 177, 357 Mont. 208, 237 P.3d 1273.

Petition for Postconviction Relief Alleging Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Filed in District Court — Immunity of Attorney Assisting in Proceedings — Gillham Clarified: At the time of the decision in In re Gillham, 218 M 187, 707 P2d 1100 (1985), petitions for postconviction relief were addressed to the Supreme Court. Because the postconviction procedure has changed, pursuant to 46-21-105, petitions for postconviction relief are now initially filed in District Court. Thus, the Supreme Court clarified that petitions for postconviction relief alleging ineffective assistance of counsel may now be filed in the District Court where the postconviction proceeding is pending. The court affirmed that an attorney ordered to respond to a Gillham order issued by a District Court is not subject to a disciplinary proceeding before the Commission on Practice or subject to charges of malpractice. The immunity extends to all information, testimony, or documents necessarily provided in response to the allegations of ineffective assistance of counsel. Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007).

Failure to Show Voluntary Disclosure of Privileged Information Precluding Motion to Compel Discovery of Attorney-Client Communications: In a case involving a law firm's attempt to enforce an attorney's lien, plaintiff law firm moved to compel discovery of defendant's attorney-client communications based on disclosure to the firm of a letter from defendant bank to defendant trust account trustees regarding the bank's willingness to release funds in the trust account pursuant to a dissolution decree and dismissal of the collection claims. The District Court denied the motion, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. An implied waiver of attorney-client privilege must be supported by evidence showing that the client, by words or conduct, has impliedly forsaken the privilege of confidentiality. Here, there was no evidence that the letter was voluntarily disclosed or was there any demonstration whether the disclosure was inadvertent or intentional. Denial of the motion to compel discovery of other privileged attorney-client communications was therefore proper. St. Peter & Warren, P.C. v. Purdom, 2006 MT 172, 333 M 9, 140 P3d 478 (2006), following St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606 (1987), and followed in St. v. Tadewaldt, 2010 MT 177, 357 Mont. 208, 237 P.3d 1273.

Discovery of Corporate Communications Conducted During Former Director's Tenure — No Violation of Attorney-Client Privilege: Plaintiff corporation sought a writ of supervisory control on grounds that the District Court was proceeding under a mistake of law by controlling a discovery attempt by the former director of a corporation to discover communications between the corporation's current directors and corporate counsel that occurred while the former director was a director. Plaintiff contended that allowing discovery violated the attorney-client privilege. The Supreme Court concluded that although the corporation was the client, the directors were jointly responsible for the management of the corporation and that, consistent with this responsibility, the directors must be treated as joint clients with the corporation when legal advice is rendered to the corporation through its officers or directors. When the former director was a corporate officer, he was entitled to access attorney-client communications, and the fact that he was no longer a director was not sufficient cause to render those communications privileged against him. The confidentiality of the attorney-client privilege is not violated when a former director of a closely held corporation who brings claims against the corporation is allowed to discover communication between corporate counsel and other directors that occurred during the former director's tenure as a director. Thus, the Supreme Court declined to accept supervisory control. Inter-Fluve v. District Court, 2005 MT 103, 327 M 14, 112 P3d 258 (2005).

Use of Police Informant to Obtain Taped Conversation Not Violative of Right to Counsel or Attorney-Client Privilege — When Right to Counsel Attaches: Police used Reavley's girlfriend to obtain a taped conversation that included statements that could be viewed as incriminating. The District Court granted Reavley's motion to suppress the statements, based on Escobedo v. Ill., 378 US 478 (1964), on grounds that the right to counsel extends to all stages preceding trial, beginning when an accused first becomes the focus of a police investigation. The District Court also concluded that Reavley's attorney-client privilege was violated when the girlfriend probed into conversations that Reavley had with his counsel. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Under Moran v. Burbine, 475 US 412 (1986), the right to counsel does not attach until after the initiation of formal charges. Reavley was not formally charged, and adversarial proceedings had not begun, so the right to counsel had not attached. Further, the record did not reflect that law enforcement directed the girlfriend to deliberately seek privileged information, nor did she purposely intrude into the attorney-client relationship or ask questions aimed at eliciting privileged information regarding Reavley's conversations with counsel. Rather, Reavley voluntarily disclosed the privileged communications without prompting from the girlfriend, which was sufficient to waive the right to their privileged nature. St. v. Reavley, 2003 MT 298, 318 M 150, 79 P3d 270 (2003).

Implied Attorney-Client Relationship — Motion for Disqualification of Attorney — Client's Burden of Showing Reasonable Belief That Attorney-Client Relationship Exists: Defendant telephoned attorney Penwell's office and spoke to the legal secretary regarding possible representation in this action, but never spoke personally to Penwell. Defendant was informed that Penwell was accepting no new cases and was referred to another attorney. Penwell ultimately appeared as counsel for plaintiff, and defendant moved to disqualify Penwell, asserting that confidential information was disclosed during the telephone conversation with the secretary and that the information was imputed to Penwell, creating an attorney-client relationship. At the hearing on the motion, defendant did not disclose what type of information was allegedly disclosed, relying on the conclusory statement that what was disclosed was confidential. The District Court denied the motion, holding that defendant had failed to meet the burden of conclusively establishing the existence of an attorney-client relationship. Defendant appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Although an alleged client should not be required to reveal actual confidences at a disqualification hearing, the alleged client must at least inform the court of the nature of the information disclosed so that the court can make a reasoned judgment. Under the circumstances, defendant could not have reasonably believed that an attorney-client relationship was formed with Penwell, based upon two telephone conversations with the secretary, when defendant never spoke or met with Penwell, and was advised that Penwell would not take the case. Pro-Hand Serv. Trust v. Monthei, 2002 MT 134, 310 M 165, 49 P3d 56 (2002). See also Krutzfeldt Ranch, LLC v. Pinnacle Bank, 2012 MT 15, 363 Mont. 366, 272 P.3d 635.

Application of Privilege to Attorneys and Witnesses Regarding Conversations Before Third Parties: Hayworth was charged with attempted deliberate homicide. During Hayworth's trial, he attempted to call as witnesses Marra who was the attorney for codefendant Maier and Albers who was the former attorney for Mogensen, another participant in the events leading to the attempted homicide. After conferring with their clients, Marra and Albers indicated that their clients would waive the attorney-client privilege and that they (the attorneys) would testify if the District Court would limit Hayworth's questioning. The District Court refused to make that ruling limiting Hayworth's questioning, so Maier and Mogensen refused to waive the privilege, and their attorneys didn't testify. Hayworth argued during his appeal of his conviction that the District Court erred in refusing to grant the protective order, thereby keeping the attorneys from testifying, and also argued that Maier and Mogensen were not protected by the privilege because the conversations about which he wanted Marra and Albers to testify took place "in the presence of third parties". The Supreme Court held that because the privilege applied to what the attorneys would say as witnesses and not to what they heard or said in front of their clients and third parties, the District Court did not to abuse its discretion in refusing to call the attorneys as witnesses once their clients refused to waive the privilege. St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Afterhours Conversation With Own Paralegal Not Entitled to Privilege: A purely personal conversation between the defendant and a paralegal employed by the defendant is not entitled to attorney-client privilege. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998).

Admissibility of Deputy Sheriff's Testimony of Phone Conversation With Defendant's Attorney: Deputy Sheriff's testimony of phone conversations with defendant's attorney, who was inquiring about and attempting to resolve charges against defendant, was not impermissible hearsay. It was admissible as statements of a party made through an agent. The testimony was not a violation of the attorney-client privilege, which protects communications between an attorney and a client, not those between an attorney and a third party. St. v. Ahmed, 278 M 200, 924 P2d 679, 53 St. Rep. 804 (1996).

Abrogation of Attorney-Client Privilege by Compelled Discovery — Remand: Palmer brought a bad faith suit against Farmers Insurance Exchange (Farmers) after receiving privileged material from a Farmers' attorney. The District Court, apparently confusing the attorney-client privilege with the work-product doctrine, ordered production of the Farmers' files and all confidential attorney-client communications between Farmers and its attorneys. At no time did Farmers voluntarily relinquish the attorney-client privilege. In abrogating Farmers' attorney-client privilege by ordering production of privileged material and admitting it into evidence, the District Court misconstrued the law and materially affected Farmers' substantial rights, preventing Farmers from having a fair trial. The District Court decision was vacated and remanded for a new trial, allowing Farmers to reassert its attorney-client privilege. Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 261 M 91, 861 P2d 895, 50 St. Rep. 1210 (1993).

Waiver:

The subject matter and author of each exhibit is critical in determining whether the attorney-client privilege prevents its discovery. Absent a voluntary waiver or an exception, the privilege applies to all communications from the client to the attorney and to all advice given to the client by the attorney in the course of the professional relationship. The privilege of nondisclosure is not lost merely because the communications contain relevant nonlegal considerations. The protection applies unless the communications fall within some exception to the privilege or are voluntarily waived. Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 261 M 91, 861 P2d 895, 50 St. Rep. 1210 (1993).

Case was remanded with direction to hold a hearing with respect to evidence bearing upon whether the documents were involuntarily produced pursuant to court order (thus no waiver) or disseminated widely enough without legal objection by Goodyear as to constitute a waiver of the attorney-client privilege or work product rule. Kuiper v. District Court, 193 M 452, 632 P2d 694, 38 St. Rep. 1288 (1981).

Applicability of Attorney-Client Privilege to Inadvertently Released Documents: Pacificorp inadvertently produced eight documents during discovery that it claimed were subject to the attorney-client privilege. The Supreme Court held that Pacificorp took immediate steps to protect its privilege upon learning of the inadvertent disclosure and that therefore it had not relinquished its rights. Because the privileged documents might have contributed to the decision, the lower court erred in allowing the State Tax Appeal Board (now Montana Tax Appeal Board) to consider the documents. Pacificorp v. Dept. of Revenue, 254 M 387, 838 P2d 914, 49 St. Rep. 774 (1992).

Correspondence Between Insurer and Attorneys Privileged: Correspondence between an insurer and its attorneys relating to litigation that occurred after litigation was begun is privileged from disclosure in a bad faith claim filed by the insured against the insurer after resolution of the underlying insurance claim. Unless there is a conflict of interest, the attorneys hired by the insurer to defend its insured also represent the insurer, and therefore communications between the attorneys and insurer are protected by the common-law attorney-client privilege that has been codified in this section. Adopting the reasoning of a recent federal case, Admiral Ins. v. U.S. District Court, 881 F2d 1486 (9th Cir. 1989), which enumerated the essential elements of the privilege, the Supreme Court held that although a showing of need may overcome the immunity given to an attorney work product, a similar showing cannot be invoked to overcome the attorney-client privilege. State ex rel. USF&G Co. v. District Court, 240 M 5, 783 P2d 911, 46 St. Rep. 1896 (1989), followed in Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 261 M 91, 861 P2d 895, 50 St. Rep. 1210 (1993).

Bad Faith Litigation — Attorney-Client Privilege: In interpreting Montana state law to determine the scope of protection afforded by the attorney-client privilege in an action for bad faith by an insured against an insurer, the District Court found that letters written to the insurer by the insurer's attorney concerning the underlying insurance claim are protected by the attorney-client privilege and work product doctrine codified in this state under this section. The court rejected plaintiff's contention that the documents were not protected by the privilege because the attorney represented only the insured, not the insurer, in the underlying claim and therefore his communications with the insurer were not communications between an attorney and his client. The attorney was acting in a dual capacity as attorney for both the insurer and insured, which is recognized as proper as long as a conflict of interest does not arise. The court further determined that documents clearly prepared in the ordinary course of the insurer's business, and not for the purpose of this litigation, are discoverable because they are not protected by the work product doctrine. Baker v. CNA Ins. Co., 45 St. Rep. 2400 (D.C. Mont. 1988) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Attorney's Voluntary Disclosure of Confidential Statements — No Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege: Defendant's court-appointed attorney called himself to the stand to testify about defendant's inconsistent statements. Based on the District Court's acceptance of the testimony, the Supreme Court found the following factors prejudiced defendant's right to a fair trial: (1) the attorney's testimony of defendant's statements was extremely prejudicial and had limited probative value; (2) the state presented no evidence that defendant intended to waive his right not to divulge this privileged information; and (3) given defendant's unfamiliarity with courtroom procedure, defendant's right against self-incrimination need not be surrendered in order to assert a statutory right. Conviction was reversed. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987).

Driver's Statement to Defendant's Insurer Not Within Work Product Exception: The driver of a vehicle involved in an accident gave a statement to his employer's insurance company before a complaint was filed. There was no indication that an attorney had been hired or that the statement was made at the request of an attorney. Thus, the Supreme Court held that Kuiper v. District Court, 193 M 452, 632 P2d 694, 38 St. Rep. 1288 (1981), did not apply. An insurance claim file is not the same as an attorney's claim file for purposes of the work product rule. The driver's statement was not made "in anticipation of litigation" under former Rule 26(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). The District Court's order denying plaintiffs' motion to compel discovery was reversed. Cantrell v. Henderson, 221 M 201, 718 P2d 318, 43 St. Rep. 745 (1986).

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Claim — Effect on Attorney-Client Privilege: When a convicted person files a petition for relief based on grounds of ineffective assistance of counsel, the petitioner's comprehension of waiver of privilege or his knowledge and consent to waiver are irrelevant. The attorney in question has a duty to respond by affidavit or other sworn testimony to admit, deny, or qualify the allegations of fact made in the petition. In future cases, if a response from a defense attorney so charged is necessary, the Attorney General shall first apply to the Supreme Court for an order preserving the responding attorney from charges of discipline or malpractice for revealing necessary confidential information from such convicted person. Petition of Gillham, 216 M 279, 704 P2d 1019, 42 St. Rep. 806 (1985). See also Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997), wherein it was held that failure to secure an order from the Supreme Court pursuant to Petition of Gillham did not constitute prejudice to defendant because the District Court that ruled on the petition did not rely on preliminary findings on the issue. Gillham was clarified in Marble v. St., 2007 MT 98, 337 M 99, 169 P3d 1148 (2007).

Privilege Unavailable to Parties to Lawsuit Claiming Under a Deceased Client: The plaintiffs brought an action against their stepmother to collect the proceeds of their deceased father's life insurance policy, which had been paid to the defendant in accordance with the terms of the policy but contrary to the provisions of a divorce decree. The District Court did not err in relying upon attorney Sternhagen's deposition and file in the prior divorce proceedings between the deceased and his first wife in order to determine the true intentions of the deceased. Where both parties to a lawsuit claim under a deceased client, neither can assert the attorney-client privilege against the other. Herrig v. Herrig, 199 M 174, 648 P2d 758, 39 St. Rep. 1274 (1982).

House Counsel to Liability Carriers and Corporate Employer: Under this section the attorney-client privilege: (1) relates to legal advice given by house counsel to the corporate employer, but analysis of results of closed product liability files given by house counsel is not legal advice; (2) does not relate to communications between house counsel and personnel employed by Goodyear's liability carriers because house counsel is not a lawyer for those liability carriers; (3) applies to communication between retained counsel and Goodyear; and (4) does not, as raised by Goodyear, apply to documents prepared by an employee of the liability insurance company and circulated within the same insurance company. Kuiper v. District Court, 193 M 452, 632 P2d 694, 38 St. Rep. 1288 (1981).

Former Counsel — Matters Testified to Discussed Before Third Party: In a dissolution of marriage case, there was offered testimony of the respondent's first attorney in the action (who later withdrew). The trial court refused to allow his examination, citing the attorney-client privilege. On review, the Supreme Court found error in the trial court, holding that in this case the testimony of the attorney was not privileged because it related to conversations that occurred in the presence of a third person. In re Jones v. Jones, 190 M 221, 620 P2d 850, 37 St. Rep. 1973 (1980), followed in Noonan v. First Bank Butte, 227 M 329, 740 P2d 631, 44 St. Rep. 1124 (1987).

House Counsel: Opinions of house counsel rendered to an employer were entitled to the attorney-client privilege, and where portions of them had been disclosed in camera, the client was entitled to a protective order preventing their further disclosure or use in pleadings by the opponent. State ex rel. Union Oil Co. of Calif. v. District Court, 160 M 229, 503 P2d 1008 (1972).

Loss of Confidential Character: When a party ceases to treat a matter as confidential, it loses its confidential character; and where statements made were made in the presence of others or within their hearing, they cannot be said to have been of a confidential nature. Ludwig v. Mont. Bank & Trust Co., 109 M 477, 98 P2d 377 (1939).

Clients in Different Actions: Where the attorney for plaintiff in an action to set aside an alleged fraudulent deed had theretofore represented defendant in a matter relating to a right-of-way over the land in question, one in no way connected with the suit in equity, and the attorney advised defendant that he was plaintiff's attorney, statements made to him by defendant as to plaintiff's demand were not privileged. Piersky v. Hocking, 88 M 358, 292 P 725 (1930).

What Communications Qualify: For a communication from a client to his attorney to be privileged, it must be of a confidential nature (at least regarded so by the client), and must relate to a matter which in its nature is private and properly the subject of confidential disclosure, as well as to the subject matter of the employment, and be made to the attorney for the purpose of enabling him properly to understand the matter in which he is employed. Piersky v. Hocking, 88 M 358, 292 P 725 (1930).

Attorney for Both Parties:

Where in an action by father against son to establish a resulting trust in real property, the parties after transfer of the property by the former to the latter had occasion to consult an attorney whose services were paid for by plaintiff, relative to securing payment of rentals from the tenant, admission of testimony by the attorney that the trend of the conversation in his office was that the father was the owner and the son his agent was not error as violative of this section. McQuay v. McQuay, 81 M 311, 263 P 683 (1928).

Communications to an attorney for both parties, made to him while acting as such, do not come within the prohibition of this section when a controversy arises as to a matter about which he was the common adviser. McQuay v. McQuay, 81 M 311, 263 P 683 (1928).

Communications made to an attorney while acting for both parties do not fall within the prohibition of this section, and when a controversy arises as to the matter about which he has thus been the common adviser, a statement by an attorney as to what transpired between plaintiff and defendant touching a settlement of their partnership affairs while he was acting as attorney for the firm was properly admitted. Lenahan v. Casey, 46 M 367, 128 P 601 (1912).

Former Client: An attorney may not testify to matters of which he could have gained knowledge only through conferences with his client, in a proceeding between that client and another arising out of such matters, even though he is no longer his former client's attorney. August v. Burns, 79 M 198, 255 P 737 (1927).

Statement Intended to Be Communicated: An attorney is not prohibited by this section from disclosing a statement made by his client with the express intention that it be communicated to another; hence the former attorney of defendant in a proceeding looking to the annulment of letters of guardianship was properly permitted to produce in court his office copy of a letter to plaintiff to show the purpose for which plaintiff's consent to the appointment of the guardian was desired. August v. Burns, 79 M 198, 255 P 737 (1927).

Timely Objection Required: Objections to evidence of admissions made to an attorney are waived where timely objection is not made either to the competency of the evidence or of the witness. Wilson v. Wilson, 64 M 533, 210 P 896 (1922).

Casual Legal Advice: Information obtained by an attorney from the defendant, in an action brought by a trustee in bankruptcy to recover the amount of an alleged preference, who, while introducing to the attorney the person who made the preference and who was then in search of legal advice, made certain statements in relation to the business affairs of the person so introduced, is not privileged, and the Supreme Court, upon review, is not bound to accept the assertion of the attorney that "they called upon me for the purpose of obtaining my services as an attorney at law" as conclusive. Mackel v. Bartlett, 33 M 123, 82 P 795 (1905).

Attorney Not Acting as Such: Information incidentally obtained by one while acting merely as a scrivener in drawing up a deed, though he is also an attorney, is not privileged where advice had not been asked of him and he gave none. Smith v. Caldwell, 22 M 331, 56 P 590 (1899).

Nature of Advice — Evading Creditors: The rule declared by this section applies where one seeks advice upon communications made to an attorney, as such, even though the advice sought is for the purpose of aiding the client to evade his creditors. Smith v. Caldwell, 22 M 331, 56 P 590 (1899); Davis v. Morgan, 19 M 141, 47 P 793 (1897).

Case Notes

Testimonial Privilege Not Extended to Nonclerical Church Member — No Prejudice in Admission of Member's Testimony: Testimonial privileges must be strictly construed because they contravene the fundamental principle that the public has the right to everyone's evidence; however, the clergy-penitent privilege in this section will not be so strictly construed as to violate the right to freedom of religion in Art. II, sec. 5, Mont. Const. Here, Gooding claimed that testimony regarding his confessions of sexual molestation of his stepdaughter in the presence of the wife of a nonordained junior minister was privileged. However, nothing in the record indicated that the wife was a clergy member acting in a professional character, a counselor, or anything more than an ordinary confidant. The Supreme Court declined to extend the clergy-penitent privilege to nonclerical church members and, in light of overwhelming uncontradicted evidence of Gooding's guilt, affirmed his conviction regardless of the wife's testimony. St. v. Gooding, 1999 MT 249, 296 M 234, 989 P2d 304, 56 St. Rep. 977 (1999). See also St. v. MacKinnon, 1998 MT 78, 288 M 329, 957 P2d 23, 55 St. Rep. 331 (1998).

Clergy-Penitent Privilege Applicable to Confidential Nonpenitential Communications Between Laity and Clergy: Adopting the interpretation in Scott v. Hammock, 870 P2d 947 (Utah 1994), the Supreme Court held that the clergy-penitent privilege applies to nonpenitential communications between laypersons and clergy if the communications are made in confidence and for the purpose of seeking or receiving religious guidance, admonishment, or advice and if the cleric is acting in a religious role pursuant to the practice and discipline of the church. In the present case, public statements made in the presence of church leaders who were not acting as ministers or counselors; with no reasonable expectation of confidentiality; and without the purpose of receiving forgiveness or spiritual or religious counseling, guidance, admonishment, or advice did not constitute privileged communications under this section. St. v. MacKinnon, 1998 MT 78, 288 M 329, 957 P2d 23, 55 St. Rep. 331 (1998).

Discovery of Medical Records Upon Commencement of Action for Damages Placing Mental and Physical Condition at Issue — Waiver of Physician-Patient Privilege as to Condition in Controversy: Plaintiff's child fell through the second story railing at the Montana State University-Bozeman library and suffered brain injuries. Plaintiff brought damage claims related to the child's injuries and claims related to plaintiff's own emotional distress, loss of consortium, and posttraumatic stress disorder. The state moved to compel production of all of plaintiff's health care records from before and after the fall. The District Court denied the motion, holding that the records were constitutionally protected and irrelevant to the case and therefore not discoverable. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted plaintiff's constitutional right to confidentiality of medical records, but cited State ex rel. Mapes v. District Court, 250 M 524, 822 P2d 91 (1991), for the holding that that right must be balanced against a defendant's right to defend itself in an informed manner and that records of prior physical or mental conditions are discoverable only if they relate to currently claimed damages. Here, plaintiff commenced an action for damages that placed in issue the mental and physical condition arising from the accident, thus waiving any physician-patient privilege as to the condition in controversy, and the state had the right to discover evidence related to prior medical conditions that was possibly connected to plaintiff's current damages. Denial of the discovery motion prejudiced the state's right to defend itself in an informed manner, constituting reversible error. Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004).

Revealing Limited Medical Information During Police Interview Not Considered Waiver of Constitutional Right to Confidentiality in Medical Records — Voluntary Medical Information Outside Scope of Fruit of Poisonous Tree Doctrine — Adequate Probable Cause for Investigative Subpoena of Medical Records: Bilant was involved in a three-car accident and was subsequently arrested for DUI and a seat belt violation. During an interview following the arrest, Bilant revealed to an officer that he had taken pain medication on the day of the accident. The officer called Bilant's health care provider for confirmation, and the provider confirmed that Bilant had a prescription for a drug similar to the pain medication that he mentioned. The officer then procured an investigative subpoena regarding documentation on all prescriptions issued to Bilant, including any advisory warnings, and the provider sent Bilant's entire medical file. Bilant contended that the state violated both his constitutional right to privacy and the statutory protections of 50-16-535. The state maintained that Bilant waived his claim of confidentiality in his medical information when he voluntarily revealed his use of pain medication to the officer. The Supreme Court agreed with Bilant. Medical records are quintessentially private and deserve the utmost constitutional protection. None of the statutory prerequisites for disclosure of the medical records were met. In deciding to reveal limited medical information in a police interview, Bilant did not forfeit his constitutional right to subsequently claim confidentiality in his medical records. The officer conducted an illegal search in seeking the constitutionally protected private medical information without probable cause and the benefit of an investigative subpoena under 46-4-301, and the information gleaned from the telephone call should have been suppressed. Bilant then contended that the use of the illegally obtained information formed an improper basis for the investigative subpoena and that the results of the subpoena should also have been suppressed pursuant to the fruit of the poisonous tree doctrine, which forbids the use of evidence that comes to light as the result of an initially illegal act. However, on this point, the Supreme Court disagreed with Bilant. One exception to the doctrine is that the derivative evidence is admissible if it is obtained from an independent source. Here, Bilant himself provided the source by giving voluntary medical information from other than the illegal telephone inquiry. The Supreme Court recognized that an investigative subpoena seeking constitutionally protected medical information requires greater justification for state access than the administration of justice rationale used to obtain public information under 46-4-301, so in reviewing the probable cause basis for constitutionally protected material, the court excised the illegal evidence from the application and reviewed the remaining information de novo to determine whether probable cause existed for issuing the subpoena. In this case, even when the information subject to suppression was excised, the remaining evidence established probable cause that a DUI was committed and underscored a compelling state interest in medical records related to prescription medicines in order to confirm Bilant's initial admission to the officer. Thus, the subpoena was issued in accordance with the statutory requirements for constitutionally protected medical records, and Bilant's conviction was affirmed. St. v. Bilant, 2001 MT 249, 307 M 113, 36 P3d 883 (2001). See also St. v. New, 276 M 529, 917 P2d 919 (1996), and St. v. Nelson, 283 M 231, 941 P2d 441 (1997).

Doctor-Patient Privilege as Precluding Physician Private Interviews in Workers' Compensation Case: The doctor-patient privilege set out in this section prevents the defendant from conducting private interviews with a claimant's physician. Linton v. St. Comp. Ins. Fund, 230 M 122, 749 P2d 55, 45 St. Rep. 68 (1988), citing Japp v. District Court, 191 M 319, 623 P2d 1389, 38 St. Rep. 280 (1981).

Waiver of Physician-Patient Privilege by Workers' Compensation Claimant — Discovery: Although there is no direct statement in the Workers' Compensation Act or in the Procedural Rules of the Workers' Compensation Court regarding waiver of the physician-patient privilege, 39-71-604 and 39-71-605 imply that an injured employee, to sustain a right to workers' compensation benefits, must waive any privilege or claim of confidentiality as to medical information relating to compensability of his claim. If a claimant exercises his right under this section or 50-16-525 to prevent any medical witness from disclosing confidential health information, and subsequently application is made by the adverse party to the Workers' Compensation Court for an order authorizing discovery, the court should authorize such discovery as is relevant to the subject involved in the pending action. The information obtained must be reasonably necessary to determine compensability. Bowen v. Liberty Mut. Ins. Co., 229 M 84, 745 P2d 330, 44 St. Rep. 1799 (1987).

Defense Communication With Plaintiff's Physician: It was not error to allow defense counsel to communicate with the plaintiff's treating physician during the trial. As the plaintiff stated he did not intend to call the physician as a witness and because the inquiry was made during the course of the trial, normal discovery limitations did not apply. Ostermiller v. Alvord, 222 M 208, 720 P2d 1198, 43 St. Rep. 1180 (1986).

Criminal Action — Privilege Not Available to Defendant: The physician-patient privilege under this section is not available to a defendant in a criminal action since 46-16-201, incorporating the civil rules of evidence into the criminal law "except as otherwise provided", pertains to the language of this section that specifically limits the privilege to civil actions. St. v. Campbell, 146 M 251, 405 P2d 978, 22 ALR 3d 824 (1965).

Patient's Waiver of Privilege: The purpose of this section is not absolutely to disqualify a physician, and the patient is privileged to waive the objection, in which event the court may compel the physician to testify; the physician, however, cannot waive the statutory privilege and testify against the wishes of the patient. Calling the witness is itself a waiver. Hier v. Farmers Mut. Fire Ins. Co., 104 M 471, 67 P2d 831, 110 ALR 1051 (1937).

Factual Statement to Physician — Where Injury Occurred: A statement made to a physician immediately after her fall by plaintiff in an action for personal injuries sustained by a fall on an icy sidewalk, that she fell at a place different from the place alleged in the complaint, was not privileged. Garrett v. Butte, 69 M 214, 221 P 537 (1923).

Qualification of Statement: To render statements made to a physician by his patient privileged under this section, they must have related to the particular injury or disease and been necessary to enable the former to properly prescribe for the latter or act in his professional capacity. Garrett v. Butte, 69 M 214, 221 P 537 (1923).

Examination of Physician — Client First Testifies Regarding Treatment: Where plaintiff on cross-examination admitted that a certain physician had attended and treated her for the injuries complained of, without detailing any conversation with him or telling of the character or extent of his treatment, it was proper to refuse to permit defendant to examine the physician as to plaintiff's condition at the time he attended her. May v. N. Pac. Ry., 32 M 522, 81 P 328 (1905).

Case Notes

Abuse of Discretion to Allow CASA to Subpoena Father's Therapy Notes and to Cross-Examine Him — Harmless Error: In a parental termination proceeding, the District Court allowed the child's court-appointed special advocate (CASA) to subpoena the father's therapy notes and allowed her to cross-examine him. After his parental rights were terminated, the father appealed. The Supreme Court agreed that the District Court had abused its discretion and that the CASA had exceeded the scope of her authority; however, based on other evidence in the record, it concluded the error to be harmless. In re J.D., 2019 MT 63, 395 Mont. 141, 437 P.3d 131.

Testimony at Sentencing Hearing by Counselor Who Evaluated Defendant in Different Case Not Violation of Privileged Communication: At defendant's sentencing hearing, the court allowed testimony from a counselor who had performed a psychosexual evaluation on defendant in connection with an earlier unrelated case. Defendant contended on appeal that the counselor's testimony should not have been allowed under the rules of evidence. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that under St. v. Race, 285 M 177, 946 P2d 641 (1997), the rules of evidence are not applicable or controlling in sentencing hearings and that a statement covered by the psychotherapist-patient privilege that may be inadmissible at trial is admissible at a sentencing hearing. Further, the counselor's statement in question here was a matter of public record and did not constitute violation of a privileged communication. A sentencing court is allowed to have the fullest information possible concerning a defendant's life and characteristics in order to individualize punishment, and the testimony at issue helped the sentencing court frame the punishment in this case. St. v. J.C., 2004 MT 75, 320 M 411, 87 P3d 501 (2004).

Reasonableness of In Camera Review of Exculpatory Evidence in Balancing Defendant's Right to Review With Victim's Right to Confidentiality: Duffy sought access to confidential reports, many of which were handwritten notes from mental health professionals who were involved in the treatment of Duffy's daughters whom Duffy was alleged to have assaulted. The District Court examined the documents in camera and ordered a redacted one-page copy to be disclosed to defense counsel. Duffy asserted that the in camera procedure was unfair because review by a judge is no substitute for review by the defendant's advocate. However, equally important to the defendant's right to discover exculpatory evidence is the victim's right to protect confidential relations. When these competing interests conflict, they must be balanced by the District Court through in camera review, and the court did not err in doing so. To allow defense counsel general access to a victim's confidential records could adversely affect the state's interest in uncovering and treating abuse. St. v. Duffy, 2000 MT 186, 300 M 381, 6 P3d 453, 57 St. Rep. 734 (2000), following St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89 (1990). See also Pa. v. Ritchie, 480 US 39 (1986).

Disclosure of Complete Defense Psychiatric Report at Sentencing Phase When Doctor to Testify: Section 46-14-217 and this section, relating to confidentiality of communications between a psychologist or psychiatrist and client, are codifications of rules of evidence. Rules of evidence are not applicable or controlling at a sentencing hearing. Furthermore, appellant waived any privilege as to his psychiatric report when he decided to present the doctor's testimony at the sentencing hearing. At that point, the complete report was necessary for the court to properly evaluate the doctor's testimony. The court did not err in ordering the defense to provide the court with the complete report for the court to consider in relation to sentencing. St. v. Race, 285 M 177, 946 P2d 641, 54 St. Rep. 1099 (1997).

Denial of Defendant's Access to Rape Victim's Counselor and Counselor's Records Upheld: Muir was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a victim under 16 years of age. Prior to and during trial, Muir requested access to the victim's psychological counselor and to the counselor's records because the counselor was listed as a potential witness. However, after an in camera review of the records by the District Court, Muir was given access only to an investigator's note of an interview with the victim's counselor. The Supreme Court held that Muir was properly denied access to the counselor and the counselor's records because the victim's conversations with the counselor are privileged and the District Court found no exculpatory evidence in the records. Citing St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111 (1990), the Supreme Court also reasoned that a defendant's right to pretrial discovery is not equivalent to a defendant's constitutional right of confrontation and that Muir had shown no correlation between the victim's emotional problems and her consent to sexual intercourse. St. v. Muir, 263 M 211, 867 P2d 1094, 51 St. Rep. 19 (1994).

Defendant's Discovery Needs Balanced by Plaintiff's Right to Privacy: The defendant in a personal injury case sought access to the files of Mapes's psychologist. Mapes resisted the motion on the basis that it violated his right to privacy. The Supreme Court held that granting the supervisory writ was necessary because the defendant's discovery rights and the plaintiff's statutory privacy rights were in conflict. The court further held that the defendant could seek information pertaining only to prior physical or mental conditions that might relate to the damages being claimed in the present action. State ex rel. Mapes v. District Court, 250 M 524, 822 P2d 91, 48 St. Rep. 954 (1991), followed in Park v. District Court, 1998 MT 164, 289 M 367, 961 P2d 1267, 55 St. Rep. 657 (1998), and Winslow v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2001 MT 269, 307 M 269, 38 P3d 148 (2001).

Disclosure of Medical Records by Third Party — Testimonial Privileges Outweigh Defendant's Need for Information: Medical records pertaining to a victim's psychotherapeutic treatment are protected from disclosure by recognized testimonial privileges that outweigh a defendant's purported need for or limited right to that information in the hands of a nonadversary third party. St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111, 47 St. Rep. 1143 (1990), followed in St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990). See also St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St.

Court-Ordered Evaluation — No Psychologist-Client Relationship: The Supreme Court rejected appellant's contention that because she trusted a psychologist and expected their communications to remain confidential her expectation should be honored. There was in fact no psychologist-client relationship. Appellant did not seek out and retain the psychologist for professional help but was ordered by the lower court to undergo an evaluation; nor were the communications between the two directed toward securing professional assistance for appellant. In re A.J.S., 193 M 79, 630 P2d 217, 35 St. Rep. 947 (1981).

Psychologist/Patient Privilege — Exception: The court properly permitted testimony of respondent's institutional psychologist and psychiatrist in spite of the psychologist/patient and physician/patient privileges because mental health professionals on the hospital staff qualify as "neutral factfinders". In re Miller, 175 M 318, 573 P2d 1155 (1977); In re Sonsteng, 175 M 307, 573 P2d 1149 (1977).

Prohibition of Mediation Evidence Without Written Waiver — Harmless Error: During trial, without a written waiver required by the mediation confidentiality statute, the District Court erroneously allowed evidence about the mediation session to determine whether a settlement agreement was enforceable. However, other evidence proving a binding contract rendered the error harmless. Kluver v. PPL Montana, LLC, 2012 MT 321, 368 Mont. 101, 293 P.3d 817.

Admission of Mediator's Prejudicial Hearsay Warranting New Trial: Following mediation, the parties entered a formal agreement to settle a District Court action regarding ownership of an aircraft and the aircraft's logbooks. The parties agreed that defendant would execute a promissory note and security agreement in favor of plaintiff to secure an obligation, and the note was secured by defendant's aircraft. When defendant failed to pay the note, plaintiff filed a foreclosure suit. Defendant counterclaimed, alleging that he was fraudulently induced into signing the agreement and that plaintiff had breached the agreement by failing to allow defendant adequate access to the incomplete logbooks. At trial and over objection, defendant testified that the mediator led him to believe that the logbooks were in order when in fact they were incomplete. The jury found for defendant and awarded compensatory and punitive damages, and plaintiff appealed, arguing that the trial court improperly allowed hearsay testimony regarding what the mediator said during negotiations. An error must affect the substantial rights of the appellant to warrant a new trial. In this case, only the mediator could offer first-hand evidence of what the parties were told during negotiations, but the mediator was precluded from testifying pursuant to this section. The critical evidence tending to prove defendant's counterclaims came from defendant's hearsay recitation of the mediator's statements. The hearsay affected appellant's substantial rights and was therefore prejudicial. The trial court erred in admitting the hearsay portions of defendant's testimony, so the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a new trial. Murray v. Talmage, 2006 MT 340, 335 M 155, 151 P3d 49 (2006).

2009 Amendment: Chapter 56 made section gender neutral; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2009.

Case Notes

Exclusion of Testimony by Newspaper Editor and Reporter — Harmless Error: Defendant subpoenaed a newspaper editor and a reporter who had interviewed defendant's assault victim, but the District Court quashed the subpoenas pursuant to the Media Confidentiality Act, Title 26, ch. 1, part 9. Defendant contended that the District Court's action deprived him of the right to compel the attendance of witnesses and that his constitutional right should prevail over the media shield statutes. However, the state met its burden of showing that defendant was not prejudiced by the trial error because defendant was able to introduce the same evidence during cross-examination of the victim and made no additional offer of proof demonstrating the additional evidence that defendant sought to introduce through the editor and reporter. The media testimony would have added little or nothing to the report in the newspaper and other evidence introduced at trial. Absent a reasonable possibility that excluding the testimony contributed to defendant's conviction, quashing of the subpoenas was affirmed. St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004), followed in St. v. Kolb, 2009 MT 9, 349 M 10, 200 P3d 504 (2009).

Testimony of Reporter Precluding Confidentiality of Notes: While Title 26, ch. 1, part 9, generally protects the confidentiality of a reporter's notes and sources, that privilege is waived under this section when the reporter voluntarily takes the witness stand or testifies by way of deposition, at which time the notes are subject to discovery. Sible v. Lee Enterprises, Inc., 224 M 163, 729 P2d 1271, 43 St. Rep. 2101 (1986).

Subject of Subpoena Duces Tecum — Inspection by Court: In an application by a newspaper reporter for a Writ of Supervisory Control to quash a subpoena duces tecum served upon him in a pending criminal case where District Court denied motion to quash, the court held since reporter had not produced item for inspection to District Court, it could not determine the relevancy, materiality, necessity, or applicability of statutes unless item is first presented to court for examination, it being reporter's duty to bring what the court requires so the court can then to its own satisfaction determine by inspection whether documents produced are irrelevant or privileged. State ex rel. Adams v. District Court, 169 M 336, 546 P2d 988 (1976).

1989 Amendment: In (2), near beginning, substituted "testifies" for "voluntarily offers to testify or to produce the source", near middle substituted "he does not waive" for "he or it waives", and near end inserted "unless the person voluntarily agrees to waive the privilege or voluntarily discloses the source in the course of his testimony"; and made minor changes in phraseology.

Affidavits*Part Case Notes

Unsigned Affidavit Not Basis for Relief From Default Judgment: After a default judgment was entered against defendant property management firm for conversion of plaintiffs' rentals, one of the defendants filed an unsigned affidavit with the District Court, alleging that defendants were Canadian citizens unfamiliar with Montana laws, that they were representing themselves pro se, that they in fact did file an answer, and other factual allegations. The Supreme Court held that the facts alleged were not established by an unsigned affidavit and, citing Gergen v. Pitsch, 194 M 70, 634 P2d 652 (1981), concluded that defendants were both intelligent and literate and could not have so misunderstood the proceedings against them as to warrant setting the judgment aside. The court, citing Schmidt v. Jomac, Inc., 196 M 323, 639 P2d 517 (1982), further held that the default judgment should not be set aside for failure of defendants to receive notice of the entry of the default judgment because notice was not required to be sent by the Clerk of the District Court. Bd. of Directors of Edelweiss Owners' Ass'n v. McIntosh, 251 M 144, 822 P2d 1080, 48 St. Rep. 1131 (1991).

Criminal Defendant's Submission of Affidavit at Evidentiary Hearing — Waiver of Right to Remain Silent: After the defendant was found guilty of DUI per se, fourth offense, which is a felony, the defendant moved to dismiss the felony or, alternatively, to amend the charge to a misdemeanor DUI, arguing that a previous DUI conviction was constitutionally infirm because she was not informed of her right to counsel if she could not afford one. The District Court held an evidentiary hearing on the motion at which the only evidence the defendant presented was her affidavit. The state then called the defendant to testify, which the defendant objected to on the basis that she had a right to remain silent. The District Court overruled the objection, concluding the state had a right to cross-examine the defendant because she had submitted the affidavit in support of her motion, which was effectively testimony. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the defendant's submission of the affidavit waived her right to remain silent. The defendant could not submit an affidavit without being subject to cross-examination as to the contents of the affidavit. St. v. Johnson, 2015 MT 221, 380 Mont. 198, 356 P.3d 438.

Affidavit in Support of Recall Petition — “Best of Knowledge” Insufficient: Allegations in an affidavit seeking recall of a public official must be sworn to from the knowledge of the affiant and not from a lesser basis so that the electors, in voting on the recall petition, may rely on the truth of the grounds set forth. An affidavit based only on the “best” of the affiant’s knowledge is deficient. Sheehy v. Ferda, 235 M 63, 765 P2d 722, 45 St. Rep. 2162 (1988).

The affidavit requirement of 40-4-220 may be satisfied by a verified petition. In re Marriage of Stout, 216 M 342, 701 P2d 729, 42 St. Rep. 856 (1985).

Signature of Affiant: In the absence of a statute requiring an affidavit to be signed by the affiant, the affidavit will be held sufficient though not signed if it appears by the certificate of a competent attesting officer that affiant made oath thereto. *Int’l Harvester Co. v. Venue Properly Based Solely Upon Allegations in Complaint — Affidavits Not Considered — Venue Found Proper for Both Defendants: The Department of Health and Environmental Sciences (now Department of Environmental Quality) brought an action in Lewis and Clark County against Pegasus Gold Corporation (Pegasus) and Zortman Mining, Inc. (ZMI), for numerous violations of the Montana water quality laws at the Zortman and Landusky mines located in Phillips County. The complaint alleged that Pegasus owned or controlled the mines and that both Pegasus and ZMI did business in Lewis and Clark County, making that county a proper place for venue. ZMI moved to change venue to Phillips County, alleging that Pegasus did not own or control ZMI, and attached affidavits of Fletcher and Erickson to support its motion. Citing Petersen v. Tucker, 228 M 393, 742 P2d 483 (1987), the Supreme Court held that the District Court properly relied upon the allegations in the complaint without considering the two affidavits. The Supreme Court held that inasmuch as Pegasus was a named defendant at the time of the complaint and did business in Lewis and Clark County, that county was proper for venue. The Supreme Court noted that because the motion for change of venue did not refer to or rely upon the Fletcher affidavit, it was properly not considered by the District Court. The Supreme Court also noted that because the Erickson affidavit did not contradict the allegations in the complaint that Pegasus owned or controlled ZMI, the District Court was correct in focusing on the allegations in the complaint. The Supreme Court held that venue was properly found in Lewis and Clark County for both defendants because under the provisions of 25-2-117, a county that is proper venue for one defendant is proper for both. State ex rel. Dept. of Health and Environmental Sciences v. Pegasus Gold Corp., 270 M 32, 889 P2d 1197, 52 St. Rep. 64 (1995).

Court’s Use of Affidavits and Discovery Material in Its File to Determine Jurisdiction: Plaintiffs appealed the use of affidavits and discovery material in the court file in the court’s determination of whether an employee was acting within the scope of his employment by a certain defendant. The plaintiffs complained the court’s determination amounted to a decision of the defendant’s ultimate tort liability, rather than a factual determination of the court’s jurisdiction over some defendants. While agreeing that jurisdiction and ultimate liability in tort where disputes of fact exist are not subject to determination by motion, the Supreme Court held that common collateral issues related to the defendant’s connection with the tortious act are jurisdictional issues which may be resolved before trial and the trial court’s use of affidavits for the purpose was correct under former Rules 12(d) and 43(e), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). In so holding, the court noted that the discovery materials and affidavits were extensive and that the plaintiffs were given a sufficient opportunity to examine the nonresident defendants through depositions and interrogatories and thereby to develop their argument regarding jurisdiction. Knoepke v. SW. Ry., 190 M 238, 620 P2d 1185, 37 St. Rep. 1910 (1980), followed in Grizzly Sec. Armored Express, Inc. v. The Armored Group, LLC, 2011 MT 128, 360 Mont. 517, 255 P.3d 143.

Weight of Affidavits: An affidavit filed with a motion to set aside a default judgment is not the sole basis upon which a court should base its decision even if no other counteraffidavits are presented. Affidavits are self-serving documents that are weak evidence to be received with caution, and they are not conclusive of the facts stated therein even though not contradicted by counteraffidavit. Audit Serv. Inc. v. Kraus Constr. Inc., 189 M 94, 615 P2d 183, 37 St. Rep. 1225 (1980).

Answer to Affidavit for Citation: In proceedings to modify child custody orders, defendant divorced father properly filed a verified answer controverting the mother's affidavit on which citation for hearing was issued. Trudgen v. Trudgen, 134 M 174, 329 P2d 225 (1958).

Order to Show Cause: Under this section the affidavit is simply the means of instituting the proceeding and furnishes the basis on which an order to show cause may issue. Stefonick v. Stefonick, 118 M 528, 167 P2d 867 (1946).

Petition for Costs and Fees: The function of an affidavit where wife seeks allowance of attorney's fees and costs in resisting appeal of husband in divorce action is to tender issues much as a complaint in an action. Stefonick v. Stefonick, 118 M 528, 167 P2d 867 (1946).

Proof by Affidavit: Where objection is made to affidavit as evidence and where there is a contest involved and where effect of adverse order is tantamount to a judgment for money, proof of facts may not be made by ex parte affidavit without right of cross-examination. Stefonick v. Stefonick, 118 M 528, 167 P2d 867 (1946).

Counteraffidavits: Under the rule that where an affidavit is used by one party, a counteraffidavit may be used by his adversary, where a motion to suppress evidence was made upon affidavit, the State could properly oppose it by counteraffidavit. State ex rel. Merrell v. District Court, 72 M 77, 231 P 1107 (1924).

Appeal of Ruling on Affidavit — Interlocutory: An affidavit filed in support of a motion to modify a decree of divorce is merely a tender of evidence in support of the motion; hence an order overruling a motion to strike such affidavit is nothing more than an interlocutory ruling upon the admissibility of evidence and is not appealable as a special order made after final judgment. Weed v. Weed, 55 M 599, 179 P 827 (1919), distinguished in State ex rel. Monteath v. District Court, 97 M 530, 37 P2d 567 (1934).

Evidentiary Value of Verification: An affidavit may be used to verify a pleading or paper required to be verified, but it gives no evidentiary value to a paper not required to be verified. State ex rel. Wood v. Bd. of County Comm'rs, 49 M 165, 140 P 728 (1914).

Part 11

Uniform Unsworn Foreign Declarations Act

Part Commission Comments

Declarations of persons abroad are routinely received in state and federal courts and agencies. Many of the declarations are affidavits and other documents sworn to by declarants before authorized officials in United States embassies and consulate offices. Affiants in foreign countries, with information relevant to U.S. proceedings or transactions could visit the U.S. consular office to finalize their affidavit or statement in a manner similar to a person within the U.S. visiting a notary public.

In recent years, though, particularly after the September 11, 2001 terrorist attacks, access to U.S. embassies and consulates has become more difficult because of closings or added security. Thus, obtaining appropriately sworn foreign declarations for court or agency use is much more difficult in the post-9/11 environment.

The Uniform Unsworn Foreign Declarations Act (UUFDA) was promulgated by the Uniform Law Commission at its Annual Meeting in 2008 to address this situation and to harmonize state and federal law.

UUFDA affirms the use in state legal proceedings of unsworn declarations made by declarants who are physically outside the boundaries of the United States when making the declaration. Under the UUFDA, if an unsworn declaration is made subject to penalties for perjury and contains the information in the model form provided in the act, then the statement may be used as an equivalent of a sworn declaration. The UUFDA excludes use of unsworn declarations for depositions, oaths of office, oaths related to self-proved wills, declarations recorded under certain real estate statutes, and oaths required to be given before specified officials other than a notary.

The UUFDA will extend to state proceedings the same flexibility that federal courts have employed for over 30 years. Since 1976, federal law (28 U.S.C. § 1746) has allowed an unsworn declaration executed outside the United States to be recognized and valid as the equivalent of a sworn affidavit if it contained an affirmation substantially in the form set forth in the federal act.

Several states also allow the use of foreign declarations (e.g., Cal. Civ. Proc. Code § 2015.5), but the state procedures are not uniform. Further, courts have ruled that 28 U.S.C. § 1746 is inapplicable to state court proceedings.

Enactment of the UUFDA harmonizes state and federal treatment of unsworn declarations. The act alleviates foreign affiants' burden in providing important information for state proceedings, while at the same time helping to reduce congestion in U.S. consular offices and allowing consular officials to increase focus on core responsibilities. Further, UUFDA will reduce aspects of confusion abroad regarding differences in federal and state litigation practice and help prevent potential negative connotations about cumbersome and inconsistent legal proceedings in the U.S. It should be enacted in every state.

26-1-1102. Definitions.

Commission Comments

1. The District of Columbia is included in the definition of "boundaries of the United States" to eliminate any potential ambiguity.

2. The definition of "law" is drafted in an open-ended manner to give it the widest possible application. The term is not ordinarily defined in uniform acts but in this context it is important that judges applying the act be in no doubt about its breadth. The wording is taken from the definition contained in the Revised Model State Administrative Procedure Act.

3. A "record" includes information that is in intangible form (e.g., electronically stored) as well as tangible form (e.g., written on paper). It is consistent with the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act and the federal Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (15 U.S.C. § 7001 et seq.).

4. The definition of "sign" is broad enough to cover any writing containing a traditional signature and any record containing an electronic signature. It is consistent with the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act and the federal Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act (15 U.S.C. § 7001 et seq.).

26-1-1103. Applicability.

Commission Comments

In keeping with the limited scope of the act, an unsworn declaration made within the geographical boundaries of the United States, even if the location is under the control of another sovereign, such as foreign embassies or consulates or federally recognized Indian lands, should not be deemed "outside the boundaries of the United States" for the purposes of this act. The act, so limited, meets the immediate needs addressed by the act. Moreover, notaries and officials authorized to administer oaths are more readily available in the United States.

26-1-1104. Validity of unsworn declaration.

Commission Comments

The use of unsworn declarations is not limited to litigation. Unsworn declarations would be usable in civil, criminal, and regulatory proceedings and settings. However, there are certain contexts in which unsworn declarations should not be used, and these contexts are listed in this section.

Except as provided in section 4 [26-1-1104] of this act, pursuant to this section, an unsworn declaration meeting the requirements of this act may be used in a state proceeding or transaction whenever other state law authorizes the use of a sworn declaration. Thus, if other state law, permits the use of either sworn testimony or an affidavit, an unsworn declaration meeting the requirements of this act would also suffice. Additionally, if other state law authorizes other substitutes for a sworn declaration, such as an affirmation, then as provided in subsection (a) [(1)] of this section, an unsworn declaration meeting the requirements of this act could serve as a substitute for an affirmation.

26-1-1105. Required medium.

Commission Comments

Courts and agencies often restrict the medium in which pleadings, motions, and other documents may be filed. This section recognizes that such a restriction is binding on a person seeking to introduce a foreign unsworn declaration.

26-1-1106. Form of unsworn declaration.

Commission Comments

Section 3 [26-1-1103] of this act authorizes the use of unsworn declarations made outside the boundaries of the United States as defined in Section 2(1)[26-1-1102(1)]. The formal declaration in this section recites the areas defined as within the boundaries and does not rely on the definition in Section 2(1)[26-1-1102(1)] because the person making the formal declaration might believe, and therefore declare that he or she is outside the boundaries of the United States even though at the time of the declaration the person making the declaration is in the Virgin Islands, Puerto Rico, or one of the other territories or insular possessions of the United States. The form of the declaration lessens the opportunity for mistake or fraud.

26-1-1107. Uniformity of application and construction.

Commission Comments

This section recites the importance of uniformity among the adopting states when applying and construing the act.

26-1-1108. Relation to Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act.

Commission Comments

This section responds to the specific language of the Electronic Signatures in Global and National Commerce Act and is designed to avoid preemption of state law under that federal legislation.

This request was refused, but the refusal was held to be within the court's discretion since the witness fit squarely under the exclusionary ruling, the defense had been supplied with the reports of the rebuttal witnesses, and because there was time to prepare rebuttal testimony after the State's experts testified to answer any additional testimony. *St. v. Degrading Questions:

This section and 26-2-401 are designed to protect a witness from improper and irrelevant questions and questions intended merely to degrade him, but if a particular question is pertinent and otherwise proper, the fact that it may tend to prejudice the witness before the jury furnishes no ground for its exclusion. Lukert v. Eldridge, 49 M 46, 139 P 999 (1914).

A judgment will be reversed where questions asked of a witness in a criminal case were totally foreign to the matter before the court, where they could have no bearing whatever on the guilt or innocence of the defendant, and where they could subserve no purpose whatever, except to degrade and discredit the witness. St. v. Crowe, 39 M 174, 102 P 579 (1909).

Where, in a prosecution for burglary, a witness who was jointly indicted with defendant testified to having taken a fishing trip with defendant about the time of the burglary, questions on cross-examination to show that the trip was for the purpose of committing robbery were improper, as tending to degrade and discredit the witness and defendant, though the witness answered in the negative. St. v. Rogers, 31 M 1, 77 P 293 (1904).

Cross-Examination Attack on Credibility — Prior Conviction of Felony: Where the defendant testifies on his own behalf, it is competent and material to show, on cross-examination, that he had been convicted of a felony, in order to discredit him and to attack his credibility. Case Notes Costs — Expert Witness Fees: A District Court cannot award costs in excess of $10 a day per witness as costs for expert witnesses. The statute specifically limiting expert witness fees to $10 a day controls the general statute authorizing a District Court to award costs in accordance with the course and practice of the court. (See 2005 amendment.) Witty v. Pluid, 220 M 272, 714 P2d 169, 43 St. Rep. 354 (1986), followed in Goodover v. Lindey's Inc., 255 M 430, 843 P2d 765, 49 St. Rep. 1059 (1992).

Former Attorney as Witness: An attorney, nonresident of Montana at the time he was subpoenaed as a witness for plaintiff in a suit to set aside a fraudulent default judgment, who had acted as plaintiff's counsel in the action out of which the equitable suit arose but was not representing him therein was properly entitled to mileage from the state line to the place of trial and return, under this section. Bullard v. Zimmerman, 88 M 271, 292 P 730 (1930).

Per Diem — How Computed: A material witness who resided outside the county in which the case was tried at a distance greater than 30 miles and voluntarily attended the trial at the request of the prevailing party and who, after his arrival on the day set for trial, had to wait for about a week before he was required to testify on account of congestion of court business was entitled to per diem for the whole time he was in attendance and not only for the day on which he gave his testimony, as well as to mileage, the service of a subpoena not being a prerequisite to their allowance. Helena Adjustment Co. v. Clafin, 75 M 317, 243 P 1063 (1926).

"Fees" Defined: The word "fees", as used in this section, refers to the per diem and mileage of witnesses. St. v. Story, 53 M 573, 165 P 748 (1917).

Mileage Limited to Within State: The mileage of witnesses in civil actions allowed litigants under this section is limited to travel within the state. Chilcott v. Rea, 52 M 134, 155 P 1114 (1916), followed in Billings v. Hunt, 257 M 99, 847 P2d 715, 50 St. Rep. 175 (1993).

How Mileage Computed: The mileage of his witnesses, which a successful party to an action may recover under this section and 25-10-201, is not limited to travel from and to their place of residence; whether the mileage shall be computed from the place of residence will depend upon the circumstances of each case. Lynes v. N. Pac. Ry., 43 M 317, 117 P 81 (1911).

Mileage of Witnesses — Subpoena Not Required: A party to whom costs are awarded is entitled to mileage of witnesses who appeared and testified, although the record does not show that they were subpoenaed. McGlauffin v. Wormser, 28 M 177, 72 P 428 (1903). See also Lynes v. N. Pac. Ry., 43 M 317, 117 P 81 (1911).

Applicable Statutory Scheme for Providing Interpreter for Deaf Person in Criminal Proceeding — Payment of Interpreter's Fees: Alkire was arrested and charged in Municipal Court for criminal trespass to vehicles and was assigned representation by the Office of State Public Defender (OSPD). Because Alkire was hearing impaired, he requested and was granted a team of interpreters. A question then arose regarding whether the OSPD or the county was responsible for costs associated with the appointment of the team of interpreters. The court determined that, pursuant to 47-1-201, the OSPD was responsible for the costs. Alkire contended that 49-4-503 provided that the court was required to bear the costs. On a writ of supervisory control, the Supreme Court considered two possible statutory schemes for determining the entity responsible for the costs. Scheme no. 1 provides interpreters for the deaf in official proceedings pursuant to Title 49, ch. 4, part 5, and 49-4-509 requires the court to pay, from the county general fund, reasonable compensation for services plus travel and transportation expenses for an interpreter who is appointed in a criminal proceeding. Scheme no. 2 arises from a combination of Title 26, ch. 2, part 5, 46-15-116, and 47-1-201, and requires payment by the OSPD for witness and interpreter fees, including interpreter fees in a criminal proceeding. The Supreme Court concluded that scheme no. 1 was more specific because it pertained to providing an interpreter for a deaf person in a criminal proceeding, while scheme no. 2 was more general and pertained to the appointment of interpreters and translators generally and who are treated as witnesses. In this case, the more specific statutory scheme no. 1 for an interpreter for Alkire in the criminal proceeding prevailed over the general provisions of scheme no. 2, so the trial court erred in requiring that the OSPD bear the costs of the interpreters. Thus, the writ of supervisory control was granted, and the case was remanded to Municipal Court for further proceedings directing that the costs of the interpreters be paid from the county fund. Alkire v. Missoula Municipal Court, 2008 MT 223, 344 M 260, 186 P3d 1288 (2008).

26-2-505. Expert witnesses.

Case Notes

Fees of Expert Considered Damages Rather Than Witness Fees: Plaintiff employed an engineer to assess problems with a tennis facility constructed by defendant, and the engineer testified as an expert at trial regarding water damage and radon problems discovered as part of the assessment. Defendant moved to exclude evidence of the amount plaintiff paid the engineer for the consulting work, but the District Court allowed evidence of the amount plaintiff paid the expert. On appeal, defendant contended that the engineer should receive only expert witness fees as provided in this section. The Supreme Court disagreed. The record showed that the engineer was employed prior to litigation and reflected that the engineer's time was spent investigating the cause of the construction defects, rather than preparing to testify at trial. As such, the engineer's fees were properly assessed as damages instead of expert witness fees. Glacier Tennis Club at the Summit, LLC v. Treweek Constr. Co., Inc., 2004 MT 70, 320 M 351, 87 P3d 431 (2004).

Travel and Lodging Expenses of Subpoenaed Prosecution Witness Improperly Included in Restitution — Reversed and Remanded to Remove County Responsibility Portion: The defendant was charged with homicide. At trial, the victim's father was subpoenaed and testified. The jury deadlocked, and the District Court declared a mistrial. The defendant ultimately pleaded guilty to an alternative charge of negligent homicide. At sentencing, the District Court ordered the defendant to pay restitution that included the lodging and travel expenses of the victim's father at trial. The defendant objected to the amount of restitution, arguing that the losses were not a direct result of the offense and that the state was responsible to pay some of the expenses because it subpoenaed the father. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the matter for the District Court to determine what amount the county was responsible to pay and to adjust the amount of restitution on that basis. St. v. Lamb, 2021 MT 302, 406 Mont. 368, 498 P.3d 1252.

On a writ of supervisory control, the Supreme Court considered two possible statutory schemes for determining the entity responsible for the costs. Scheme no. 1 provides interpreters for the deaf in official proceedings pursuant to Title 49, ch. 4, part 5, and 49-4-509 requires the court to pay, from the county general fund, reasonable compensation for services plus travel and transportation expenses for an interpreter who is appointed in a criminal proceeding. Scheme no. 2 arises from a combination of Title 26, ch. 2, part 5, 46-15-116, and 47-1-201, and requires payment by the OSPD for witness and interpreter fees, including interpreter fees in a criminal proceeding. The Supreme Court concluded that scheme no. 1 was more specific because it pertained to providing an interpreter for a deaf person in a criminal proceeding, while scheme no. 2 was more general and pertained to the appointment of interpreters and translators generally and who are treated as witnesses. Exclusion of Medical Expert Proper: The plaintiff alleged medical malpractice against the defendant doctor related to surgery on his spine. The defendant challenged the plaintiff's medical expert on the grounds that he had not performed surgery in over a decade and had never performed a spinal fusion using the medical device that was used in the plaintiff's surgery. The District Court granted the defendant's motion to exclude the testimony of the plaintiff's expert. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the expert was not qualified to opine about the standard of care for spinal fusion surgeries. Melton v. Speth, 2018 MT 212, 392 Mont. 409, 425 P.3d 700.

Podiatrist Properly Excluded From Providing Testimony Regarding Doctor's Standard of Care — Consumer Protection Act Claims Properly Dismissed: The plaintiff sued the defendants, a doctor and his related medical business. The plaintiff alleged medical malpractice and Consumer Protection Act (CPA) violations stemming from the defendants' purported refusal to conduct further postoperative visits after his foot surgery. The plaintiff intended to call a podiatrist to testify to the standard of care. However, the District Court excluded the podiatrist because he was not a doctor of medicine or doctor of osteopathy as required in 26-2-601 and 37-3-102. The District Court then granted partial summary judgment on the CPA claim because the legal theories were premised upon allegations of professional negligence. A jury found in favor of the defendant. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the podiatrist did not meet statutory criteria to provide standard of care testimony and that the CPA claims failed because the claim stemmed from the alleged acts of professional negligence. Hastie v. Alpine Orthopedics & Sports Medicine, 2015 MT 346, 382 Mont. 21, 363 P.3d 435.

Admissibility of Infectious Disease Specialist Testimony — Qualified to Testify on Standard of Care and Causation for Radiologist's Procedure: Plaintiffs, as representatives of the estate of a deceased patient, filed a medical malpractice claim against a radiologist and a hospital based on allegations that the defendants departed from the applicable standard of care by failing to adhere to proper infection control measures, which negligently caused the patient's death. On a summary judgment motion, the District Court excluded the testimony of the plaintiffs' proposed expert witness, an infectious disease specialist, on the grounds that he was not qualified to testify as an expert under 26-2-601 because he is not a radiologist and does not perform the procedure at issue. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the infectious disease specialist satisfied the requirements of 26-2-601 based on his qualifications and that the District Court's holding to the contrary was an abuse of discretion. The proposed expert was qualified to give testimony regarding the standard of care for the radiologist and the hospital as well as an opinion regarding causation. Beehler v. E. Radiological Associates, P.C., 2012 MT 260, 367 Mont. 21, 289 P.3d 131, distinguishing Butler v. Domin, 2000 MT 312, 302 Mont. 452, 15 P.3d 1189.

CHAPTER 3

EFFECT OF FORMER JUDGMENTS AND ORDERS

Chapter Case Notes

Ex-Wife Not Named in Foreclosure Action Against Husband: In a prior suit, the defendant had brought a foreclosure action against the plaintiff's ex-husband but did not name the plaintiff as a party. In the first action, the court had allowed the foreclosure on the basis that an equitable mortgage existed. In the second suit, the defendant argued that the plaintiff's rights in the property had been extinguished on the basis that the original sales agreement was a contract for deed rather than an equitable mortgage. The Supreme Court ruled that the defendant was collaterally estopped from arguing that a contract for deed existed when in the first suit, a final judicial decision held that the agreement constituted an equitable mortgage. Smith v. Schweigert, 241 M 54, 785 P2d 195, 47 St. Rep. 77 (1990).

Res Judicata Inapplicable — Issues Not Same: Plaintiff suffered a back injury in October 1980, underwent surgery, and was judged to have reached a stationary state. Plaintiff was given an impairment rating of 25% and in August 1981 entered a final settlement for 125 weeks of permanent and partial disability benefits. In June 1981, while employed by a different employer, plaintiff experienced a sexual incident which she characterized as a sexual assault. In September 1981, while employed by a third employer, plaintiff suffered an industrial accident. In March 1984, the Workers' Compensation Court determined that the sexual incident did not constitute a compensable injury and that plaintiff as of that date was entitled to temporary total disability benefits by reason of the September 1981 injury. The benefits were to continue until the disability ceased. In October 1984, plaintiff sought to have the settlement entered in August 1981 set aside, claiming mutual mistake of fact. The Workers' Compensation Court held that its March 1984 decision barred this issue as res judicata. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the issues were not identical so that res judicata was inapplicable. In the first case, the question was basically one of amount. In the second case, the question went to the validity of the settlement itself. The mistake plaintiff alleged was her total disability by reason of the second industrial accident. No ruling in the first case addressed whether the settlement had to be reopened in light of the Supreme Court's decision in Holton v. F.H. Stoltze Land & Lumber Co., 195 M 263, 637 P2d 10, 38 St. Rep. 1835 (1981). The court also noted that the question of mutual mistake of fact could not have been raised in the first case. The case was reversed and remanded with directions to hear the petition on its merits. Phelan v. St. Paul Mercury Ins. Co. 220 M 296, 716 P2d 601, 43 St. Rep. 381 (1986).

General Provisions

26-3-102. What considered adjudged in a judgment.

Case Notes

Interpretation of 1906 Water Decree — Theory of Claims Preclusion Inapplicable: An individual landowner objected to three water right claims owned by the county. The objector claimed that, under an earlier decree, the county was required to provide a minimum of 1,200 miner's inches (30 cubic feet per second) from Georgetown Lake into Flint Creek. The objector also argued that, under the theory of claims preclusion, the county was barred from challenging the amount of water it had to release downstream under the earlier decree. The Water Court disagreed, holding that the county was not estopped from making arguments contrary to those of the objector. The Water Court noted that both parties were attempting to interpret the decree and were not relitigating the matters in the decree. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the Water Court had properly applied the principle of claims preclusion. Granite County Bd. of Comm'rs v. McDonald, 2016 MT 281, 385 Mont. 262, 383 P.3d 740.

Refusal of Deannexation by City Council — Claims Preclusion Proper: The plaintiffs successfully petitioned the defendant, a city, to have their property annexed to the city. Five years later, the plaintiffs sought to have the same property deannexed, which the defendant denied. The plaintiffs filed a lawsuit against the defendant, which the District Court dismissed because the complaint had not been timely served and the statute of limitations for the plaintiffs' claims barred them from being refiled. One month after the District Court's ruling, the plaintiffs filed another suit against the defendant, and the District Court granted summary judgment in favor of the defendant, holding that claims preclusion barred the plaintiffs' second suit. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the four-part test for claims preclusion had been satisfied. Schweitzer v. Whitefish, 2016 MT 254, 385 Mont. 142, 383 P.3d 735.

Claim Preclusion Applicable Based on Common Facts — Speculation Not Allowed Regarding Federal Court Consideration of State Law Claims: The plaintiffs' state law claims for indemnification from the defendant seller of a Superfund site were denied because the claims were not raised in an earlier federal District Court proceeding. The Supreme Court reasoned there was a common nucleus of operating facts underlying both actions and the plaintiff could have sought to amend its complaint at the federal level after learning new facts. The argument that the defendant concealed facts that were not known was not a determining factor, as the facts were known prior to final judgment in the federal action. Additionally, the Supreme Court declined to speculate whether the federal District Court would have continued to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the state law claims, as such speculation defeated the policy of judicial economy and a definite end to litigation that the claim preclusion doctrine is intended to advance. Asarco LLC v. Atl. Richfield Co., 2016 MT 90, 383 Mont. 174, 369 P.3d 1019.

Saving Statute Inapplicable — Claim Preclusion Prohibits Pursuit of Common-Law Bad Faith Insurance Claim in State Court After Dismissal in Federal Court: After the original action was dismissed for insufficient pleading in federal court, the plaintiff filed a declaratory judgment action to pursue a common-law bad faith claim against the defendant insurance company. The federal District Court's judgment for inadequate pleading, however, is a final judgment on the merits for purposes of claim preclusion when leave to amend was available and was not requested or was requested but properly denied by the court. Brilz v. Metropolitan Gen. Ins. Co., 2012 MT 184, 366 Mont. 78, 285 P.3d 494, followed in Estate of Kinnaman v. Mtn. W. Bank, 2016 MT 25, 382 Mont. 153, 365 P.3d 486.

Relitigating Issues Raised in Bankruptcy Proceeding Barred by Res Judicata: In defendants' bankruptcy proceeding, they contended that notes issued by plaintiff contained a usurious interest rate and were prompted by fraud. The Bankruptcy Court determined that the notes were valid, enforceable, and unaffected by usury or fraud. During plaintiff's subsequent collection proceeding in District Court, defendants sought to amend their answer to allege usury, but the District Court held that the Bankruptcy Court's judgment barred defendants' claim under res judicata and granted summary judgment for plaintiff. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The Bankruptcy Court's judgment was accorded finality as to the issues raised or that could fairly have been raised in the adversary proceeding. Defendants were not precluded from litigating any of their defenses to the notes in the bankruptcy proceeding and thus were barred from relitigating the usury issue in District Court. Absent a genuine issue of material fact relating to defendants' default on the notes, summary judgment for plaintiff was proper. Olympic Coast Inv., Inc. v. Wright, 2005 MT 4, 325 M 307, 105 P3d 743 (2005), following Fox v. 7L Bar Ranch Co., 198 M 201, 645 P2d 929 (1982), and distinguishing Traders St. Bank of Poplar v. Mann, 258 M 226, 852 P2d 604 (1993).

Claim for Punitive Damages Not Precluded by Estoppel — Issues of Previous Litigation Not Identical: Finstad was injured by asbestos in defendant's mine. A jury trial resulted in a verdict for Finstad and an award of $400,000 in compensatory damages, as well as a determination that punitive damages were warranted. The District Court conducted a minitrial on the issue of punitive damages, and the jury awarded $83,000. Defendant contested the award of punitive damages and moved for dismissal on grounds that Finstad's claim was barred by collateral estoppel by virtual representation because the issue had already been litigated in two previous Lincoln County cases against defendant. Defendant contended that the issues were identical, that final judgment had been rendered, and that Finstad was a party to or in privity with a party in the previous cases and thus was virtually represented by those parties in the previous cases. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss, finding that the issues were not identical, and also ruled for Finstad on the question of estoppel by virtual representation. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the record, noting that although some of the evidence and witnesses regarding the punitive damages claim were the same as in the previous cases, several significant factual distinctions and legal claims existed. Because the first element of collateral estoppel regarding identical parties was not met, the Supreme Court affirmed without reaching the question of estoppel by virtual representation. Finstad v. W.R. Grace & Co., 2000 MT 228, 301 M 240, 8 P3d 778, 57 St. Rep. 934 (2000), following Holtman v. 4-G's Plumbing & Heating, Inc., 264 M 432, 872 P2d 318 (1994).

Clarification of "Parties or Their Privies" Element of Res Judicata: The concept of "privity" in the context of a judgment applies to one whose interest has been represented at trial. Privies are also defined as those so connected in estate, in blood, or in law as to be identified with the same interest and consequently affected with each other by litigation. However, mutual conduct between parties does not necessarily establish a shared legal interest. In this case, absent a showing of an agency relationship, the mere fact that two parties were involved in related elements of the same occurrence did not form a sufficient basis for summary judgment on the issue of privity or shared legal interest between the parties. Holtman v. 4-G's Plumbing & Heating, Inc., 264 M 432, 872 P2d 318, 51 St. Rep. 340 (1994).

Defendants Estopped From Questioning Permanent Partial Disability Rate in Second Trial on Different Issues: The claimant argued that the Workers' Compensation Court applied the wrong standard in the first trial with respect to what elements the claimant had to establish in a claim for permanent partial disability. The first case was remanded with specific instructions to the lower court to apply the proper standard in determining permanent partial disability. On remand, the defendants attempted to challenge the amount of payments they had stipulated prior to the first trial. The Supreme Court ruled that the defendants had ample opportunity to challenge the stipulated payment rate in the first trial and that they were therefore estopped from questioning the rate in the second trial by the doctrine of res judicata. Beck v. Flathead County, 240 M 128, 783 P2d 383, 46 St. Rep. 1996 (1989).

Res Judicata Inapplicable to Bankruptcy Court Proceedings and Federal District Court Appeal: A Bankruptcy Court dismissed with prejudice a debtor's Chapter 11 proceedings on the grounds that no plan had been filed, no assets remained in the estate, costs of administration exceeded assets, and there was no chance of reorganization. The dismissal included all adversary matters pending in relation to the Chapter 11 proceedings. The dismissal was affirmed on appeal by the U.S. District Court. Plaintiff, a third party creditor, filed a complaint in state court that set forth theories of liability based on misrepresentation, equitable estoppel, fraud, and bad faith. Plaintiff asserted that because the Bankruptcy Court decided only the issue of equitable subordination, the effect of the dismissal was to restore all parties to the status quo before the bankruptcy petition was filed. The Supreme Court found that res judicata was inapplicable to plaintiff's claim because the subject matter of the actions was not the same and the issues relating to them were not the same. Phil-Co Feeds, Inc. v. First Nat'l Bank in Havre, 238 M 414, 777 P2d 1306, 46 St. Rep. 1380 (1989).

Question of Identical Issues as Bar to Second Action: In determining if the principle of res judicata was a bar to a second action when there was a question of whether the issues were the same, the court relied on its decision in Brannon v. Lewis & Clark County, 143 M 200, 387 P2d 706 (1963), citing Phoenix Mut. Life Ins. Co. v. Brainard, 82 M 39, 265 P 10 (1928), where it found that "[u]nless it clearly appears that the precise question involved in the second case was raised and determined in the former, the judgment is no bar to the record action". Baertsch v. Lewis & Clark County, 223 M 206, 727 P2d 504, 43 St. Rep. 1660 (1986), followed in DeMers v. Roncor, Inc., 249 M 176, 814 P2d 999, 48 St. Rep. 629 (1991), and Slater v. Cent. Plumbing & Heating Co., 1999 MT 257, 297 M 7, 993 P2d 654, 56 St. Rep. 1023 (1999).

Judgment Final — Law of the Case — Issues Outside Scope of Original Action: Plaintiff moved for relitigation of contractual issues on which judgment was final and also moved for consideration of new contractual issues that had arisen after judgment. All issues previously ruled upon were subject to the law of the case doctrine and could not be relitigated. See Schmidt v. Colonial Terrace Associates, 202 M 46, 656 P2d 807, 39 St. Rep. 2318 (1982); on remand, Schmidt v. Colonial Terrace Associates, 215 M 62, 694 P2d 1340, 42 St. Rep. 182 (1985). Contractual issues arising after the judgment were outside the scope of the original action. Former Rule 60(b)(5), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), did not give the court power to preside over controversies throughout the life of the contract. Schmidt v. Colonial Terrace Associates, 223 M 8, 723 P2d 954, 43 St. Rep. 1489 (1986).

Barring of Action by Res Judicata — Criteria: The Supreme Court, in State ex rel. Sullivan v. School District, 100 M 468, 50 P2d 252 (1935), originally stated the criteria to be used in determining whether an action is barred by res judicata as follows: (1) the parties or their privies must be the same; (2) the subject matter of the action must be the same; (3) the issues must be the same and must relate to the same subject matter; and (4) the capacities of the persons must be the same in reference to that subject matter and to the issues between them. Since the claim by appellant in the case at bar failed as it related to criteria (2) and (3), the court upheld the District Court finding that all matters relating to a lease agreement were res judicata with the exception of a security deposit which was not contemplated in the previous action. Geissler v. Nelson, 222 M 409, 722 P2d 632, 43 St. Rep. 1372 (1986). This criteria was applied in C B & F Dev. Corp. v. Culbertson St. Bank, 256 M 1, 844 P2d 5, 49 St. Rep. 1122 (1992).

Probate Distribution — Not Res Judicata for Corporate Liquidation: In a previous probate proceeding, the plaintiff, as one of several legatees of a corporation, moved to have the corporation liquidated and distributed in cash or assets. The District Court, in an interpretation of the will, denied the motion and ordered distribution to be made "in kind". This ruling was not res judicata in a subsequent action for liquidation of the corporation based on oppression and shareholder deadlock. Although seeking the same relief, the two actions rested on a different set of facts. Fox v. 7L Bar Ranch Co., 198 M 201, 645 P2d 929, 39 St. Rep. 862 (1982).

Conscionability of Divorce Settlement Agreement Not Same as Sufficiency — Finding of Conscionability Not Res Judicata on Completeness of Agreement: At the conclusion of a hearing on the enforcement of his divorce settlement agreement several months after his divorce, the former husband moved to amend the finding of deficiency of the settlement agreement or, in the alternative, to grant a new trial. The motion was denied and the former husband appealed. The District Court had found in its decree of legal separation that the settlement agreement executed by the parties and incorporated into the decree was conscionable and should be approved. The husband appealed that this finding was res judicata as to the issue of the marital agreement, thus barring any further requests by the wife. The Supreme Court found that the res judicata requirement of identity of issue was not met because there was sufficient dissimilarity between the issues in the two actions. The agreement disposed of the marital property but made no provision for any future support. The property disposition had no direct bearing on any contemporary agreement for obligations to be fulfilled in the near future. Res judicata, therefore, did not bar further action on any alleged agreements between the parties as to matters not involving the disposition of marital property. In re Harris v. Harris, 189 M 509, 616 P2d 1099, 37 St. Rep. 1696 (1980).

Refusal of Court in Original Action to Adjudicate Present Issue — Refusal Not Prior Judicial Determination: Buyers of land under contract for deed were not estopped from bringing an action to establish beneficial ownership of water rights evidenced by ditch company stock under the contract for deed by virtue of having brought a prior action for specific performance of the contract where the District Court, in the first case, refused to adjudicate the water rights as an issue that was beyond the scope of the controversy presented to it; failure to take an appeal from the trial court's denial to decide the controversy in the prior case did not effect a judicial determination of the controversy. Schwend v. Jones, 163 M 41, 515 P2d 89 (1973).

Probate Proceedings — Parties: Denial by probate court of motion of brother of decedent to vacate decree of distribution, which confirmed in decedent's widow whatever title passed to her in certain stock by virtue of death of decedent, was not an adjudication of title to the stock as between the widow and the brother. Roberts v. Roberts, 286 F2d 647 (9th Cir. 1961).

Creek Adjudicated — Binding as to All Possible Issues — Binding on Successors: A final decree adjudicating the rights and priorities of numerous parties to the waters of a creek is binding and conclusive between all the parties, their privies and successors in interest as to all matters adjudicated, and as to all issues which could have been properly raised, irrespective as to whether they were in fact litigated, for all time, unless and until regularly modified, the rights given to each litigant under the decree being property rights which it is the duty of the courts to protect. Kramer v. Deer Lodge Farms Co., 116 M 152, 151 P2d 483 (1944), followed with respect to enforcement of mechanics' liens in Orlando v. Prewett, 236 M 478, 771 P2d 111, 46 St. Rep. 520 (1989). Orlando was followed in Hall v. Heckerman, 2000 MT 300, 302 M 345, 15 P3d 869, 57 St. Rep. 1266 (2000).

Successive Decrees: While a decree in a water right suit is res judicata as to the parties to the action in which rendered, where subsequently the matter in issue is relitigated and readjudicated, the last decree controls, determines the rights of the parties, and cannot be collaterally impeached by showing the first. Gans & Klein Inv. Co. v. Sanford, 91 M 512, 8 P2d 808 (1932).

Defendant's Burden — Contrary Facts Beyond Record of Judgment: In the absence of any evidence in the record on appeal in a chattel mortgage foreclosure suit in which the defense was res judicata, the Supreme Court in determining what was adjudicated in the former action is limited to what appears on the face of the judgment relied upon; in such a case the burden of showing any contrary facts affecting the scope of the judgment rests upon defendant. Stockgrowers' Fin. Corp. v. Nett, 91 M 334, 7 P2d 540 (1932).

Mandamus Judgment: Mandamus being an action at law, judgment therein is conclusive of all of relator's rights properly involved therein; hence inclusion of a clause in the decree that it was given without prejudice to his right to recover the damages sustained by him on account of the proceeding was surplusage. State ex rel. Golden Valley County v. District Court, 75 M 122, 242 P 421 (1925). See also Solberg v. Sunburst Oil & Gas Co., 76 M 254, 246 P 168 (1926).

Issues Adjudicated — Scope and Effect:

An adjudication is final and conclusive not only as to the matter actually determined but as to every matter which the parties might have litigated and have decided as an incident to or essentially connected with the subject matter of the litigation. State ex rel. Golden Valley County v. District Court, 75 M 122, 242 P 421 (1925).

As between the parties to an action, the judgment is an adjudication not merely of the conclusions expressed but of everything necessarily included in them. Lyon v. USF&G Co., 48 M 591, 140 P 86 (1914).

Water Rights: Where the rights of the parties defendant in a water right suit are not, as between themselves, presented to the court by the pleadings for determination, the decree will not estop them from having such rights determined in a subsequent case. Sloan v. Byers, 37 M 503, 97 P 855 (1908), distinguished in Bennett v. Quinlan, 47 M 247, 131 P 1067 (1913); Cocanougher v. Mont. Life Ins. Co., 103 M 536, 64 P2d 845 (1936).

Injunction Proceedings: A judgment in a prior action, which adjudicated the ultimate right of the parties in the subject in controversy, meets the requirements of this section and was erroneously rejected on the hearing of an order to show cause why an injunction should not issue to restrain defendant from operating a certain mine pending a suit for an interest therein. Wetzstein v. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co., 26 M 193, 66 P 943 (1901).

Foreign Judgment — Summary Judgment Proper: A New Mexico bank successfully sued New Mexico defendants in New Mexico on defaulted loans secured by mortgages on Montana property. The bank then sought foreclosure in Montana. The law of the state where a judgment is rendered controls the interpretation of the effect of the foreign judgment in any subsequent actions between the parties or those with whom there is privity. Under a collateral estoppel analysis, the bank was entitled to summary judgment in Montana. The bank is entitled to attorney fees and costs, including attorney fees on appeal. First Nat'l Bank of Albuquerque v. Quinta Land & Cattle Co., 238 M 335, 779 P2d 48, 46 St. Rep. 1313 (1989).

Parties the Same When Plaintiff and Defendant in First Action Switch Places in Second: For res judicata purposes, the parties were the same when the plaintiff in the first action was the defendant in the second and the defendant in the first was the plaintiff in the second. In applying the res judicata rule, parties means all persons who have a direct interest in the subject matter of the action and a right to control the proceedings, defend, examine witnesses, and appeal. Burgess v. St., 237 M 364, 772 P2d 1272, 46 St. Rep. 870 (1989).

Siting Act Decision Not Estoppel for PSC Ratemaking Decision: In 1973, Montana Power Co. (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Department of Environmental Quality) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. MPC filed an application for original jurisdiction and declaratory judgment or other appropriate relief with the Supreme Court. The PSC later concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. MPC argued that the PSC was collaterally estopped from considering whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". The court held that the need issue determined in the siting process was not identical to the used and useful issue, therefore collateral estoppel was not applicable. MPC also argued that because of the certificate of need, the State was promissory estopped from excluding Unit 3 from the rate base. MPC contended that issuance of a certificate of need under the Siting Act established a contractual relationship between the State and MPC. The court held that issuance of a certificate by a governmental authority to engage in conduct that would be improper without a certificate does not create a contractual relationship between the State and the licensee. Neither the Siting Act nor the certificate of need contemplate a promise that a facility will be included in a utility's rate base. Promissory estoppel was also inapplicable. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

Union-Employer Trust Fund for Employees and Union — Suing Employer in Separate Actions: A union sued an electrical contractor in federal court, claiming that the contractor failed to hire persons referred by the union and failed to require persons he hired to join the union and that persons referred who were not hired lost compensation and contributions to a benefit trust fund administered by the union and an electrical contractors' association. The assignee of the trust fund's claim against the contractor sued the contractor in a state District Court for contributions due the trust fund. The federal action was dismissed with prejudice by stipulation of the union and contractor. The state District Court then held that the state action was barred by res judicata. That ruling was erroneous, for the rights and claims sought to be enforced in the two actions were not the same and the claimants in the two actions were not in privity. Their functions and duties were different. Audit Services, Inc. v. Anderson, 211 M 323, 684 P2d 491, 41 St. Rep. 1388 (1984).

District Court Jurisdiction — Invoked by Probable Cause in Leave to File Information — Res Judicata After Appeal Process: The issue of subject matter jurisdiction cannot be waived or conferred by consent of a party and may be raised at any stage of a judicial proceeding or sua sponte by the court; but if the question of jurisdiction turns upon a finding of whether the affidavit of application for leave to file an information shows probable cause and the defendant has been found guilty and the judgment has not been appealed or has been affirmed on appeal, the issue of probable cause is res judicata. St. v. Davis, 210 M 28, 681 P2d 42, 41 St. Rep. 898 (1984).

Section a Rule of Evidence: Appellant sought to use this section as an authority for setting aside judgment in a partition of property action. The District Court properly found that this section is a rule of evidence that merely sets forth circumstances under which a judicial record may be impeached and does not provide a remedy for setting aside a partition judgment. Brown v. Jensen, 231 M 340, 753 P2d 870, 45 St. Rep. 665 (1988).

Motion to Set Judgment Aside Followed by Suit Attacking Judgment for First Time on Jurisdictional Ground — Res Judicata Applied: In 1971 a default judgment had been entered against present plaintiffs, granting sole ownership of certain property to present defendant E.G.W., who sold the property to present codefendants in 1972. Plaintiffs' 1971 motion to set aside the default was denied. In 1981 plaintiffs sued for a one-half quieted interest, or in the alternative, an accounting and one-half the proceeds of the 1972 sale. The complaint was based on the claim that the 1971 judgment was void because it granted relief beyond that prayed for in the pleadings and the court lacked jurisdiction to grant the relief it granted. Res judicata barred litigation of the voidness issue because plaintiffs failed to raise it in their 1971 motion to set aside the default. Once there has been full opportunity to present an issue for judicial decision in a given proceeding, including jurisdiction issues, the court's determination in that proceeding must be accorded full finality as to all issues raised or which fairly could have been raised and their later consideration is precluded by res judicata. Wellman v. Wellman, 198 M 42, 643 P2d 573, 39 St. Rep. 752 (1982), followed in Tungsten Holdings, Inc. v. Kimberlin, 2000 MT 24, 298 M 176, 994 P2d 1114, 57 St. Rep. 125 (2000).

Part 2Effect of Specific Kinds of Judicial Records*26-3-201. Effect of judgment or final order — when conclusive.*Case Notes

Issue Preclusion and Claim Preclusion Inapplicable — Tort Claim in Motor Vehicle Accident Not Identical to Underinsured Motorist Contract Claim Against Insurer: The plaintiff recovered damages arising from injuries sustained in an automobile accident from the insurance company of the person that hit him in the full amount of the policy limit. The plaintiff also filed a separate underinsured motorist claim against his own insurance company. The plaintiff's insurance company, as the defendant in the second court action, moved for summary judgment, arguing that the underinsured motorist claim was barred by the doctrines of issue preclusion and claim preclusion because the plaintiff had recovered damages from another party. The District Court affirmed the motion and the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the defendant's underinsured motorist claim was not barred by either the doctrine of issue preclusion or claim preclusion. The related common-law doctrines of issue preclusion and claim preclusion, also known as collateral estoppel and res judicata, respectively, exist to preclude future litigation of a final judgment. Issue preclusion bars the same parties or their privies from relitigating issues in a second suit that is based on a "different cause of action". Claim preclusion bars a second suit involving the same parties or their privies based on the "same cause of action". The defendant's issue preclusion and claim preclusion arguments failed, because the personal injury issue decided in the prior adjudication was not identical to the contractual issue in the underinsured motorist claim. Reisbeck v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 2020 MT 171, 400 Mont. 345, 467 P.3d 557.

Claim Preclusion Applicable Based on Common Facts — Speculation Not Allowed Regarding Federal Court Consideration of State Law Claims: The plaintiff's state law claims for indemnification from the defendant seller of a Superfund site were denied because the claims were not raised in an earlier federal District Court proceeding. The Supreme Court reasoned there was a common nucleus of operating facts underlying both actions and the plaintiff could have sought to amend its complaint at the federal level after learning new facts. The argument that the defendant concealed facts that were not known was not a determining factor, as the facts were known prior to final judgment in the federal action. Additionally, the Supreme Court declined to speculate whether the federal District Court would have continued to exercise supplemental jurisdiction over the state law claims, as such speculation defeated the policy of judicial economy and a definite end to litigation that the claim preclusion doctrine is intended to advance. Asarco LLC v. Atl. Richfield Co., 2016 MT 90, 383 Mont. 174, 369 P.3d 1019.

Date of Rendition of Judgment Controlling, Not Date of Filing Complaint — Res Judicata — Effect of Voluntary Dismissal: The plaintiffs filed two complaints within a week of each other that both challenged the county's denial of their request for a zoning change. The complaints named the same parties and addressed the same issues. Ultimately, the plaintiffs voluntarily dismissed the later-filed action with prejudice and the defendants amended their answer to the other complaint to include res judicata as an affirmative defense. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's grant of summary judgment in favor of the defendants, concluding that the plaintiffs' claims were barred under res judicata. The court held that the voluntary dismissal of the later-filed case constituted a final judgment that barred the claims set forth in the earlier-filed complaint. Touris v. Flathead County, 2011 MT 165, 361 Mont. 172, 258 P.3d 1, followed in Estate of Kinnaman v. Mtn. W. Bank, 2016 MT 25, 382 Mont. 153, 365 P.3d 486.

Breach of Intervention Agreement — Issue Preclusion Applicable: McDaniel was sentenced to 20 years for burglary, with the sentence suspended subject to several conditions. About 4 months after sentencing, McDaniel tested positive for drugs, and the probation officer elected to initiate an intervention hearing, where an agreement was entered into in lieu of a formal violation being filed. Upon learning of the intervention hearing, the County Attorney filed a petition to revoke McDaniel's suspended sentence based on McDaniel's drug use. McDaniel moved for partial summary judgment on grounds that the intervention hearing agreement constituted a final adjudication of the probation violation and a binding contract and that the state was barred from relitigating the issue. The District Court denied the motion, McDaniel appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed. McDaniel and the state, acting through the Department of Corrections, entered a valid binding contract that precluded filing of a formal violation, and the state breached the contract by filing the revocation petition. Additionally, the elements of issue preclusion were satisfied with respect to the state's liability on the breach of contract claim, including the state's opportunity to argue liability, so absent any genuine issue of material fact, McDaniel was entitled to partial summary judgment on the breach of contract claim. McDaniel v. St., 2009 MT 159, 350 M 422, 208 P3d 817 (2009), following Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006).

Due Process Applicable to Revocation Proceedings, Not Deprivation of Property — Failure to Raise Due Process Claims in Motion to Dismiss — Summary Judgment Properly Denied: McDaniel was sentenced to 20 years for burglary, with the sentence suspended subject to several conditions. About 4 months after sentencing, McDaniel tested positive for drugs, and the probation officer elected to initiate an intervention hearing, where an agreement was entered into in lieu of a formal violation being filed. Upon learning of the intervention hearing, the County Attorney filed a petition to revoke McDaniel's suspended sentence based on McDaniel's drug use. McDaniel moved for partial summary judgment on grounds that litigation of the revocation petition should be barred on due process grounds because the issue had already been litigated and thus should be barred by issue preclusion. The District Court denied the motion and McDaniel appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The issue preclusion argument failed because the due process question as a deprivation of property was not raised in the analysis of the state's liability for a procedural due process violation, nor was the state afforded an opportunity to argue the deprivation of property due process claim. Additionally, McDaniel never raised a due process argument in the motions to dismiss, so the state did not address the due process issue that McDaniel claimed was adjudicated in District Court. Thus, McDaniel's motion for summary judgment on the due process claim was properly denied. McDaniel v. St., 2009 MT 159, 350 M 422, 208 P3d 817 (2009).

Final Judgment in Prior Claim Prerequisite for Application of Res Judicata: In a 2003 suit, William sued his brother Otto on the issue of partnership assets, and then in 2004, when that case was still pending, William filed claims against Otto for further misappropriating business assets and against Otto's wife Frances for conspiring to assist Otto. The District Court held that the 2004 case was barred by res judicata because Otto and Frances were in privity and the issues in both cases were identical. On appeal, the parties argued vigorously as to whether the elements of res judicata were met, and William even conceded that the 2004 suit was barred as to claims against Otto. The Supreme Court disagreed. Because final judgment was not entered in the 2003 case, despite William's acquiescence, res judicata did not bar any claims raised in the 2004 case. Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006). See also Adams v. Two Rivers Apartments, LLLP, 2019 MT 157, 396 Mont. 315, 444 P.3d 415, finding that a binding settlement dismissing a case with prejudice satisfied the final judgment requirement.

Finality of Judgment Requirement in Applying Collateral Estoppel: In a 2003 suit, William sued his brother Otto on the issue of partnership assets, and then in 2004, when that case was still pending, William filed claims against Otto for further misappropriating business assets and against Otto's wife Frances for conspiring to assist Otto. The District Court held that the 2004 case was barred by collateral estoppel, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. It is appropriate to accord finality to an earlier judgment that contains findings of fact that definitively resolve all new allegations and legal theories included in a later complaint, and the 2004 judgment was sufficiently final for applying collateral estoppel. The determinative fact of whether and to what extent Frances misappropriated partnership funds without Otto's knowledge was actually and necessarily decided in the 2003 case. Because the precise issue or allegation that provided the basis for each of William's 2004 theories of recovery was already presented and decided in 2003, the District Court properly found that the 2004 suit was barred by collateral estoppel. Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006). See also Martelli v. Anaconda-Deer Lodge County, 258 M 166, 852 P2d 579 (1993), Dowell v. Dept. of Public Health and Human Services, 2006 MT 55, 331 M 305, 132 P3d 520 (2006), and Adams v. Two Rivers Apartments, LLLP, 2019 MT 157, 396 Mont. 315, 444 P.3d 415, finding that a binding settlement dismissing a case with prejudice satisfied the final judgment requirement.

No Res Judicata Absent Final Judgment in Related Case: Brown was one of 64 prisoners who filed a complaint in 2002 alleging that the Department of Corrections improperly transferred prisoners to prisons where treatment, training, and rehabilitation opportunities were not available. While that case was pending, Brown filed suit in 2004 against the Department, alleging that his liberty interest in parole was violated because the Department transferred him to locations where he was unable to obtain the sex offender treatment required for parole eligibility. The District Court concluded that the 2004 case was barred by res judicata because Brown was a plaintiff in the 2002 case, which presented identical claims. Brown appealed, and the Supreme Court reversed and remanded. Under Audit Serv., Inc. v. Anderson, 211 M 323, 684 P2d 491 (1984), the primary requirement necessary to sustain a plea of res judicata is that there be a judgment on the merits. Because the 2002 case was still pending, dismissal of the 2004 case on res judicata grounds was error. Brown v. Dept. of Corrections, 2005 MT 58, 326 M 231, 108 P3d 498 (2005).

Relitigating Issues Raised in Bankruptcy Proceeding Barred by Res Judicata: In defendants' bankruptcy proceeding, they contended that notes issued by plaintiff contained a usurious interest rate and were prompted by fraud. The Bankruptcy Court determined that the notes were valid, enforceable, and unaffected by usury or fraud. During plaintiff's subsequent collection proceeding in District Court, defendants sought to amend their answer to allege usury, but the District Court held that the Bankruptcy Court's judgment barred defendants' claim under res judicata and granted summary judgment for plaintiff. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The Bankruptcy Court's judgment was accorded finality as to the issues raised or that could fairly have been raised in the adversary proceeding. Defendants were not precluded from litigating any of their defenses to the notes in the bankruptcy proceeding and thus were barred from relitigating the usury issue in District Court. Absent a genuine issue of material fact relating to defendants' default on the notes, summary judgment for plaintiff was proper. Olympic Coast Inv., Inc. v. Wright, 2005 MT 4, 325 M 307, 105 P3d 743 (2005), following Fox v. 7L Bar Ranch Co., 198 M 201, 645 P2d 929 (1982), and distinguishing Traders St. Bank of Poplar v. Mann, 258 M 226, 852 P2d 604 (1993).

Easement Issue Resolved Against Predecessor in Interest Barred by Res Judicata and Collateral Estoppel: Plaintiffs claimed an easement by necessity over Skyline Drive. Defendants asserted that the action was barred by res judicata and collateral estoppel based on a prior District Court ruling that another property owner did not have an easement over Skyline Drive. The District Court agreed and granted summary judgment to defendants, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. As set out in Hall v. Heckerman, 2000 MT 300, 302 M 345, 15 P3d 869 (2000), res judicata applies if: (1) the parties or their privies are the same; (2) the subject matter of the present and past action is the same; (3) the issues are the same and relate to the same subject matter; and (4) the capacities of the persons are the same in reference to the subject matter and to the issues between them. A form of res judicata, collateral estoppel, applies if: (1) the identical issue raised was previously decided in a prior adjudication; (2) a final judgment of the merits was issued in the prior litigation; and (3) the party against whom the plea is now asserted was a party or in privity with a party in the prior adjudication (see Finstad v. W.R. Grace & Co., 2000 MT 228, 301 M 240, 8 P3d 778 (2000)). In this case, plaintiffs attempted to raise an easement issue that was previously adjudicated and conclusively resolved against their predecessor in interest, so plaintiffs' claim was barred by res judicata and collateral estoppel. Kullick v. Skyline Homeowners Ass'n, Inc., 2003 MT 137, 316 M 146, 69 P3d 225 (2003), followed in Baltrusch v. Baltrusch, 2006 MT 51, 331 M 281, 130 P3d 1267 (2006).

Claim for Punitive Damages Not Precluded by Estoppel — Issues of Previous Litigation Not Identical: Finstad was injured by asbestos in defendant's mine. A jury trial resulted in a verdict for Finstad and an award of $400,000 in compensatory damages, as well as a determination that punitive damages were warranted. The District Court conducted a minitrial on the issue of punitive damages, and the jury awarded $83,000. Defendant contested the award of punitive damages and moved for dismissal on grounds that Finstad's claim was barred by collateral estoppel by virtual representation because the issue had already been litigated in two previous Lincoln County cases against defendant. Defendant contended that the issues were identical, that final judgment had been rendered, and that Finstad was a party to or in privity with a party in the previous cases and thus was virtually represented by those parties in the previous cases. The District Court denied the motion to dismiss, finding that the issues were not identical, and also ruled for Finstad on the question of estoppel by virtual representation. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the record, noting that although some of the evidence and witnesses regarding the punitive damages claim were the same as in the previous cases, several significant factual distinctions and legal claims existed. Because the first element of collateral estoppel regarding identical parties was not met, the Supreme Court affirmed without reaching the question of estoppel by virtual representation. Finstad v. W.R. Grace & Co., 2000 MT 228, 301 M 240, 8 P3d 778, 57 St. Rep. 934 (2000), following Holtman v. 4-G's Plumbing & Heating, Inc., 264 M 432, 872 P2d 318 (1994).

Findings and Conclusions of Federal Bankruptcy Court Binding Upon State District Court — Forum Selection Clause in Bankruptcy Settlement Agreement Binding: After a federal Bankruptcy Court in Missouri issued a judgment against Lurie, Lurie and the liquidating trustee, Blackwell, held settlement negotiations resulting in three settlement agreements. The agreements were signed by Blackwell but not by Lurie. The Bankruptcy Court gave Lurie an extended period of time in which to close the agreements. Later, after the Bankruptcy Court issued findings and conclusions and an order finding that Lurie could not, as a matter of law, comply with the agreements and that certain release language in the agreements was therefore unenforceable, Lurie filed "releases" in a Montana District Court and moved the District Court to order the release of the judgment of the Bankruptcy Court, which had been filed against Lurie as a foreign judgment. The Supreme Court held that the District Court had properly concluded that the findings and conclusions and the order of the Missouri Bankruptcy Court were binding upon the District Court under this section. The Supreme Court further held that whether the three settlement agreements, unsigned but "released" by Lurie, satisfied the judgment against Lurie under 25-9-311 was not a matter for the District Court to decide because the settlement agreements contained forum selection clauses designating the federal Bankruptcy Court in Missouri as the only court in which issues relating to the enforcement of the agreements could be litigated. Blackwell v. Lurie, 284 M 351, 943 P2d 1318, 54 St. Rep. 916 (1997). See also Lurie v. Blackwell, 285 M 404, 948 P2d 1161, 54 St. Rep. 1215 (1997), and Lurie v. Sheriff, 2000 MT 103, 299 M 283, 999 P2d 342, 57 St. Rep. 414 (2000).

Preclusive Effect of Res Judicata as to Claims That Could Have Been Raised Previously: Res judicata precludes claims that could have been raised in a prior lawsuit as well as those actually adjudicated. However, the preclusive effect applies only to claims raised in subsequent lawsuits between the parties in the original action or their privies. Therefore, when two parties shared no legal interest, adjudication of a claim against one party did not bar a claim against the other on grounds of res judicata. Holtman v. 4-G's Plumbing & Heating, Inc., 264 M 432, 872 P2d 318, 51 St. Rep. 340 (1994).

Tort and Contract Defenses in Bank's Foreclosure Action Following Borrowers' Tort Action Against Bank: In Mann I, the borrowers sued Traders State Bank for tort damages. In this case, Mann II, the bank sought foreclosure against the borrowers, who asserted both tort and contract defenses. The subject matter of the two cases is generally the same because both suits revolve around the borrower-lender banking relationship. The issues in the Mann I tort case are distinct from those inherent in the Mann II contract case. The fundamental question in the first case was whether the bank violated a standard of care, and the fundamental question in the second case is whether the mortgage, security interests, and underlying notes are valid and enforceable contracts. Therefore, res judicata does not bar the contract defenses. It was not necessary to raise the issue of the validity of the notes in Mann I; thus, res judicata did not bar the contract defenses in Mann II on the grounds that the notes' validity should have been raised in Mann I. The entire tort action occurred during the borrowers' bankruptcy proceeding, during which the debtor could not challenge the validity of the notes. By the time of Mann II, however, the bankruptcy action had been dismissed; thus, issues as to the validity of the notes had not been decided, and the borrowers could assert the contract defenses. However, the tort defenses were barred because they could have been raised in Mann I. Traders St. Bank of Poplar v. Mann, 258 M 226, 852 P2d 604, 50 St. Rep. 509 (1993), overruled, with regard to voluntary versus involuntary payment or performance as affecting waiver of right to appeal without having bearing on mootness, in Turner v. Mtn. Eng'r & Constr., Inc., 276 M 55, 915 P2d 799, 53 St. Rep. 23 (1996).

Failure to Show Unfair Denial of Opportunity to Have Case Heard — Res Judicata: Richland County sought to enforce a 6¼% oil, gas, and mineral royalty interest reserved prior to a 1937 quiet title decree by asserting that there was extrinsic fraud upon the court because plaintiff's attorney in the quiet title action, who also happened to be the Richland County Attorney, failed to appear on behalf of the county, resulting in a default judgment against the county and denying the county the opportunity to litigate the reservation. However, the county failed to produce facts to substantiate its theory that the county's interest was subverted or that the county was unfairly denied an opportunity to have its case heard. Absent such a showing, relitigation of the reservation claim was barred by res judicata. Filler v. Richland County, 247 M 285, 806 P2d 537, 48 St. Rep. 200 (1991).

Ineffective Assistance Claim on Direct Appeal — Res Judicata: An evidentiary hearing held on the issue of ineffective assistance of counsel resulted in a District Court decision that the Supreme Court reviewed and affirmed. On direct appeal, the claim was held to have been fully litigated and reconsideration was barred because additional review of the same issue between the same parties would negate the intent of the doctrines of res judicata and law of the case. St. v. Black, 245 M 39, 798 P2d 530, 47 St. Rep. 1677 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Lindeman, 285 M 292, 948 P2d 221, 54 St. Rep. 1156 (1997).

Personal Representative's Removal for Cause Not Stayed by Bankruptcy: The personal representative argued that his removal for cause in a probate proceeding should have been stayed by his filing for bankruptcy. The Supreme Court ruled that the removal for cause was not stayed because it was an action in the probate of the decedent's estate and not an action against the personal representative or his property even though the removal order might preserve and determine the petitioner's cause of action against the personal representative following the bankruptcy proceedings. Brown v. Robbins, 243 M 276, 794 P2d 677, 47 St. Rep. 1218 (1990).

Defendants Estopped From Questioning Permanent Partial Disability Rate in Second Trial on Different Issues: The claimant argued that the Workers' Compensation Court applied the wrong standard in the first trial with respect to what elements the claimant had to establish in a claim for permanent partial disability. The first case was remanded with specific instructions to the lower court to apply the proper standard in determining permanent partial disability. On remand, the defendants attempted to challenge the amount of payments they had stipulated prior to the first trial. The Supreme Court ruled that the defendants had ample opportunity to challenge the stipulated payment rate in the first trial and that they were therefore estopped from questioning the rate in the second trial by the doctrine of res judicata. Beck v. Flathead County, 240 M 128, 783 P2d 383, 46 St. Rep. 1996 (1989).

Claim of Federal Constitution Violation in First Action and State Constitution Violation in Second: For res judicata purposes, the issues were not different when the claim in the first action was that a statute violated the federal constitution and the claim in the second action was that the statute violated the state constitution. Once a party has had full opportunity to present a claim or issue, the judgment is final as to all claims or issues that have or could have been raised. Burgess v. St., 237 M 364, 772 P2d 1272, 46 St. Rep. 870 (1989), followed in Bozeman v. AIU Ins. Co., 272 M 349, 900 P2d 929, 52 St. Rep. 823 (1995).

Parties the Same When Plaintiff and Defendant in First Action Switch Places in Second: For res judicata purposes, the parties were the same when the plaintiff in the first action was the defendant in the second and the defendant in the first was the plaintiff in the second. In applying the res judicata rule, parties means all persons who have a direct interest in the subject matter of the action and a right to control the proceedings, defend, examine witnesses, and appeal. Burgess v. St., 237 M 364, 772 P2d 1272, 46 St. Rep. 870 (1989).

Judgment Final — Law of the Case — Issues Outside Scope of Original Action: Plaintiff moved for relitigation of contractual issues on which judgment was final and also moved for consideration of new contractual issues that had arisen after judgment. All issues previously ruled upon were subject to the law of the case doctrine and could not be relitigated. See Schmidt v. Colonial Terrace Associates, 202 M 46, 656 P2d 807, 39 St. Rep. 2318 (1982); on remand, Schmidt v.

Colonial Terrace Associates, 215 M 62, 694 P2d 1340, 42 St. Rep. 182 (1985). Contractual issues arising after the judgment were outside the scope of the original action. Rule 60(b)(5), M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20), did not give the court power to preside over controversies throughout the life of the contract. Schmidt v. Colonial Terrace Associates, 223 M 8, 723 P2d 954, 43 St. Rep. 1489 (1986).

Collateral Estoppel Not Applicable: Citing the test pronounced in Beckman v. Chamberlain, 673 P2d 480 (1983) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports), the Supreme Court held that the doctrine of collateral estoppel was not applicable when it found that certain critical issues had not been previously litigated and the appeal from the original judgment, having been dismissed, had never been decided. St. Dept. of Commerce v. Gallatin Dairies, Inc., 221 M 492, 719 P2d 790, 43 St. Rep. 1001 (1986).

Court Ruling on Use of Prior DUI Conviction — Later Civil License Revocation for Second Offense: A Justice's Court ruled that a prior DUI conviction could not be used in sentencing defendant for a second DUI offense because the prior record did not show that defendant was advised of and waived his rights before he pleaded guilty. A District Court then decided that the prior conviction could be used by the Division of Motor Vehicles in revoking defendant's license. The issues in the two causes were not the same, and therefore the prior ruling was not res judicata. Lancaster v. Dept. of Justice, 218 M 97, 706 P2d 126, 42 St. Rep. 1425 (1985).

Siting Act Decision Not Estoppel for PSC Ratemaking Decision: In 1973, Montana Power Co. (MPC) filed an application for a certificate of environmental compatibility and public need for Colstrip Units 3 and 4 under the Montana Major Facility Siting Act. In granting the certificate, the Board of Natural Resources and Conservation (now Department of Environmental Quality) found that there was a need for the energy which would be produced and that the units would serve the public interest, convenience, and necessity. After Unit 3 was completed, MPC filed an application with the Public Service Commission (PSC) to increase electric rates to reflect Unit 3 in its rate base. At the rate hearing, the PSC took evidence regarding whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". MPC moved to strike this testimony, contending the PSC was precluded from considering this by the certificate of need issued under the Siting Act. The PSC concluded Unit 3 was not used and useful and could not be included in the rate base. MPC argued that the PSC was collaterally estopped from considering whether Unit 3 was "used and useful". The court held that the need issue determined in the siting process was not identical to the used and useful issue, therefore collateral estoppel was not applicable. MPC also argued that because of the certificate of need, the State was promissorially estopped from excluding Unit 3 from the rate base. MPC contended that issuance of a certificate of need under the Siting Act established a contractual relationship between the State and MPC. The court held that issuance of a certificate by a governmental authority to engage in conduct that would be improper without a certificate does not create a contractual relationship between the State and the licensee. Neither the Siting Act nor the certificate of need contemplate a promise that a facility will be included in a utility's rate base. Promissory estoppel was also inapplicable. Mont. Power Co. v. P.S.C., 214 M 82, 692 P2d 432, 41 St. Rep. 2332 (1984).

Union-Employer Trust Fund for Employees and Union — Suing Employer in Separate Actions: A union sued an electrical contractor in federal court, claiming that the contractor failed to hire persons referred by the union and failed to require persons he hired to join the union and that persons referred who were not hired lost compensation and contributions to a benefit trust fund administered by the union and an electrical contractors' association. The assignee of the trust fund's claim against the contractor sued the contractor in a state District Court for contributions due the trust fund. The federal action was dismissed with prejudice by stipulation of the union and contractor. The state District Court then held that the state action was barred by res judicata. That ruling was erroneous, for the rights and claims sought to be enforced in the two actions were not the same and the claimants in the two actions were not in privity. Their functions and duties were different. Audit Services, Inc. v. Anderson, 211 M 323, 684 P2d 491, 41 St. Rep. 1388 (1984).

Estoppel by Judgment — Test: Plaintiff's suit against the Myllymakis failed because of a complete lack of proof on his part. He sued Chamberlain for the same alleged wrongs to the same property during the same time period. The suit was barred by estoppel by judgment. That Chamberlain was not a party to the Myllymaki suit did not preclude application of the bar, as strict mutuality of parties is no longer a necessity in such situations. The more relevant considerations are whether: (1) the party adversely affected by estoppel has had a full and fair opportunity to litigate the critical issues; (2) the assertion of estoppel by a stranger to the original judgment would create analogous results in the latter case; (3) the party affected by estoppel has sound reasons why he or she should not be bound by the previous judgment; (4) the previous judgment was the result of thorough litigation; and (5) there was an appeal from the original judgment. Beckman v. Chamberlain, 673 P2d 480, 40 St. Rep. 2044 (1983) (apparently not reported in Montana Reports).

Complaint Dismissal as Collateral Attack on Another Judgment: The Public Service Commission (P.S.C.) found that Intermountain could not be depended upon to provide adequate telephone service to the people in its service area and invited other private telephone companies to come into the service area. Following that order, Mid-Rivers began moving into the area. On appeal to District Court, the P.S.C. obtained a judgment affirming the order. Intermountain brought another suit seeking a permanent injunction against Mid-Rivers. Intermountain alleged that it was providing reasonably adequate service to the area. The District Court properly dismissed the complaint because it was a collateral attack upon the judgment on the same issue obtained by the P.S.C. Intermountain Tel. & Power Co. v. Mid-Rivers Tel. Co-op, Inc., 201 M 448, 655 P2d 491, 39 St. Rep. 2226 (1982).

Motion to Set Judgment Aside Followed by Suit Attacking Judgment for First Time on Jurisdictional Ground — Res Judicata Applied: In 1971 a default judgment had been entered against present plaintiffs, granting sole ownership of certain property to present defendant E.G.W., who sold the property to present codefendants in 1972. Plaintiffs' 1971 motion to set aside the default was denied. In 1981 plaintiffs sued for a one-half quieted interest, or in the alternative, an accounting and one-half the proceeds of the 1972 sale. The complaint was based on the claim that the 1971 judgment was void because it granted relief beyond that prayed for in the pleadings and the court lacked jurisdiction to grant the relief it granted. Res judicata barred litigation of the voidness issue because plaintiffs failed to raise it in their 1971 motion to set aside the default. Once there has been full opportunity to present an issue for judicial decision in a given proceeding, including jurisdiction issues, the court's determination in that proceeding must be accorded full finality as to all issues raised or which fairly could have been raised and their later consideration is precluded by res judicata. Wellman v. Wellman, 198 M 42, 643 P2d 573, 39 St. Rep. 752 (1982), followed in Tungsten Holdings, Inc. v. Kimberlin, 2000 MT 24, 298 M 176, 994 P2d 1114, 57 St. Rep. 125 (2000). See also First Bank v. District Court, 226 M 515, 737 P2d 1132, 44 St. Rep. 861 (1987), Orlando v. Prewett, 236 M 478, 771 P2d 111, 46 St. Rep. 520 (1989), and Higham v. Red Lodge, 247 M 400, 807 P2d 195, 48 St. Rep. 273 (1991). Orlando was followed in Hall v. Heckerman, 2000 MT 300, 302 M 345, 15 P3d 869, 57 St. Rep. 1266 (2000).

Civil Rights Action — State Court Ruling — Res Judicata: A state prison inmate was denied relief in a civil rights action brought under 42 U.S.C. § 1983, instituted in state court. Because the principle of res judicata is applicable to civil rights actions, the inmate was barred from bringing the same action against the same parties in federal court. Harvey v. Pomroy, 535 F. Supp. 78, 39 St. Rep. 657 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Quiet Title Action Not Res Judicata Where Deed Executed After Action: A quiet title action as to mineral interests reserved by the county was not res judicata because the quiet title action occurred before the deed in question was executed, delivered, and accepted. McSweyn v. Musselshell County, 193 M 525, 632 P2d 1095, 38 St. Rep. 1260 (1981), distinguishing Smith v. County of Musselshell, 155 M 376, 472 P2d 878 (1970).

Judgment Res Judicata — Precedent for Standing Subsequently Overruled: The res judicata consequences of a final unappealed judgment on the merits are not altered by the fact that the judgment may have rested on a legal principle pertaining to standing that was subsequently overruled in another case. Thus, defendants may not now avoid the effect of a final judgment by complaining that if the suit were to be brought after the time of judgment, plaintiffs would not have standing. Libby Rod & Gun Club v. Moraski, 519 F. Supp. 643, 38 St. Rep. 1213 (D.C. Mont. 1981).

Judgment for Property Settlement Upon Dissolution of Marriage — Jurisdiction to Determine Conscionability of Agreement — Res Judicata: The District Court had no jurisdiction to determine conscionability when its earlier decree of dissolution found the agreement to be not unconscionable and the parties, subject matter of the action, issues, and capacities of the parties were the same. The issue of conscionability was thus res judicata. Hopper v. Hopper, 183 M 543, 601 P2d 29, 36 St. Rep. 1695 (1979).

Enforcement of Foreign Divorce Decree: Plaintiff in an action to enforce alimony provisions of a final, unappealed foreign divorce decree was properly granted summary judgment when no factual issues were raised by defendant but ultimate issues of law that are res judicata. Cicinia v. Cicinia, 173 M 39, 566 P2d 61 (1977).

Decree of Distribution — Not Final Judgment: A decree of distribution does not concern itself with and is not the final order of the court on the payment of legacies, but that is the office of the decree of discharge under section 91-3906, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed). Hustad v. Reed, 133 M 211, 321 P2d 1083 (1958).

Matters Not Determined: A judgment or final order in an action or proceeding is not evidence, conclusive or otherwise, of matters that were not involved in the proceeding and not determined. Hustad v. Reed, 133 M 211, 321 P2d 1083 (1958).

Sale of Estate Property — Confirmation of Sale as Judgment: A proceeding for the sale of estate property is a continuous one, commencing with the filing of the petition and ending with the order of confirmation of the sale, which is the only judgment or final order in the proceeding finally determining the rights of the parties and adjudicating that the property shall be sold to a certain person for a certain amount. Until then, the heirs' or devisees' title is not divested. Hence, up until the time of valid sale, the District Court has the right to set aside the order of sale if it finds that action for the best interests of the estate and those interested therein. In re Ryan's Estate, 114 M 281, 134 P2d 732 (1943).

Title Acquired Pending Action:

In an action to quiet title secured through a decree of foreclosure in a federal court, defendant's claim that when he acquired his interest he had no knowledge of the action was not meritorious, where a lis pendens had been filed in due form on the day the foreclosure action was commenced, thus imparting constructive notice to him and other defendants claiming under him. Thomson v. Nygaard, 98 M 529, 41 P2d 1 (1935).

Under this section, a person acquiring title to property during the pendency of an action affecting it is concluded by the judgment if he has notice of the pendency of the action. Griffiths v. Thrasher, 95 M 238, 26 P2d 983 (1933); State ex rel. Thelen v. District Court, 93 M 149, 17 P2d 57 (1932).

Title Acquired Before Action: Where defendant in an action to quiet title (one in personam or quasi in rem) was not a party to a prior action to set aside a mortgage on the same property on the ground of fraud and acquired his interest therein long before the defendant in the former parted with title or interest in the land, judgment in the former suit was not res judicata or binding on defendant in the second suit. Teisinger v. Hardy, 86 M 180, 282 P 1050 (1929).

Decedents' Estates — Judgments Against:

A judgment against an executor or administrator upon a claim against the estate establishes the claim to be paid in due course of administration. In re Smith's Estate, 60 M 276, 199 P 696 (1921).

A judgment against an executor or administrator of an estate is in effect a judgment against the estate, and all persons interested in the estate, whether they be heirs, legatees, or creditors, as privies are foreclosed by it on the merits of the claim. In re Smith's Estate, 60 M 276, 199 P 696 (1921).

Adoption Decree: The rule that a judgment valid on its face is not subject to collateral attack based upon considerations dehors (not within) the record is especially applicable to a decree of adoption. In re Pepin's Estate, 53 M 240, 163 P 104 (1917).

Erroneous Decision: Where a judgment is rendered on the merits and not thereafter reversed, modified, or set aside, it is res judicata as to the cause of action, without regard to whether it was right or wrong. Peterson v. Butte, 52 M 13, 155 P 265 (1916).

Prior Action — Barred by Statute of Limitations: A judgment which recited that, as shown by the evidence, it was barred by 27-2-204, being upon the merits, was conclusive on that point and, in the absence of a timely appeal, became final and constituted a bar to another action on the same cause. Peterson v. Butte, 52 M 13, 155 P 265 (1916).

Setting Aside Judgment: When a final judgment has once been rendered, it cannot be set aside by the court which has rendered it, except upon motion for a new trial or some other method authorized by statute, and unless void upon its face, it is conclusive as to the matter adjudged upon the parties and their successors. State ex rel. Working v. District Court, 50 M 435, 147 P 614 (1915).

One Party Not Bound: One not a party to a judgment is not bound thereby. Conrow v. Huffine, 48 M 437, 138 P 1094 (1914).

Injunction Proceedings: A judgment in a prior action, which adjudicated the ultimate rights of the parties in the subject in controversy, meets the requirements of this section and was erroneously rejected on the hearing of an order to show cause why an injunction should not issue to restrain defendant from operating a certain mine pending a suit for an interest therein. Wetzstein v. Boston & Mont. Consol. Copper & Silver Min. Co., 26 M 193, 66 P 943 (1901).

Case Notes

Final Judgment of Illinois State Court in FELA Case Ordering Plaintiff to Refile in Indiana Not Entitled to Full Faith and Credit: Upon dismissing Cook's Federal Employers Liability Act (FELA) claim for damage to his knees, an Illinois state court dismissed Cook's claim as a forum non conveniens claim and ordered Cook to refile his claim in Indiana. Instead, Cook chose to refile in Montana. The defendant, Soo Line Railroad, moved to dismiss the claim in Montana, arguing that the issue of where to file the claim was now res judicata because of the order of the Illinois court and that that order should be given full faith and credit by Montana courts, and the District Court agreed. The Montana Supreme Court reversed, citing Thoring v. LaCounte, 225 M 77, 733 P2d 340 (1987), and cases from other jurisdictions and holding that because the judgment in Illinois was not a judgment on the merits but only a determination by that court that it was a forum non conveniens, the judgment of the Illinois court was not entitled to full faith and credit under the U.S. Constitution. The court noted that under one provision of FELA, 45 U.S.C. 56, Cook's claim could also be brought in any U.S. District Court where the Soo Line was doing business. Cook v. Soo Line Railroad Co., 2008 MT 421, 347 M 372, 198 P3d 310 (2008).

Full Faith and Credit Afforded Out-of-State Renewable Child Support Judgment — Res Judicata Applicable: Article IV, sec. 1, U.S. Const., provides that full faith and credit be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. As restated in Baker v. Gen. Motors Corp., 522 US 222, 139 L Ed 2d 580, 118 S Ct 657 (1998), a final judgment in one state, if rendered by a court with adjudicatory authority over the subject matter and persons governed by the judgment, qualifies for recognition throughout the land. When issues of jurisdiction have been determined by one court, the doctrine of res judicata precludes a second court from considering jurisdiction as long as the first court fully and fairly considered the issue, and that judgment, as to jurisdiction, is entitled to full faith and credit in the second court. In the present case, a Utah renewable child support judgment, in which the Utah court established jurisdiction of the parties, was entitled to full faith and credit in Montana, despite contentions by the husband that he no longer had minimum contacts with Utah after moving to Montana. The jurisdiction arguments raised before the Montana Supreme Court were identical to the arguments that were previously raised, fairly considered, and finally decided in Utah, precluding relitigation by the Montana court under res judicata. In re Child Support of Mason, 1998 MT 192, 290 M 253, 964 P2d 743, 55 St. Rep. 803 (1998), followed with regard to full faith and credit of a judgment by an out-of-state court following full and fair consideration of jurisdiction in Genuine Parts Co. v. Rascal's Auto Parts, Inc., 2008 MT 313, 346 M 56, 192 P3d 1153 (2008).

Defendant's Sufficient Contact With Alaska to Allow Binding In Personam Judgment Enforceable: Defendant's continuous and extensive presence in Alaska, and the fact that his acts and omissions in Alaska gave rise to the claims against him, constituted sufficient contact with Alaska to make the binding judgment in personam reasonable and just and in conformance with notions of fair play and substantial justice. Lewis v. Lewis, 239 M 505, 784 P2d 897, 46 St. Rep. 1868 (1989), citing Int'l Shoe Co. v. Wash., 326 US 310, 90 L Ed 95, 66 S Ct 154 (1945).

Nonapplicability of North Dakota Dram Shop Law to Montana Bar — Liability Under Montana Law Not Litigated in North Dakota: In a wrongful death action, the personal representative filed suit in North Dakota and Montana. The North Dakota Supreme Court dismissed the action with prejudice, narrowly holding that a Montana bar could not be liable under the North Dakota Dram Shop Act; however, the issue of liability under Montana law was never litigated. The Montana Supreme Court held that, under the Full Faith and Credit Clause, Art. IV, sec. 1, U.S. Const., and under this section, relitigation of the issue of extraterritorial effect of the North Dakota Dram Shop Act was barred by res judicata. However, factual questions precluded summary judgment in Montana, and as the liability issue was not litigated, Montana courts were free to examine the issue. Thoring v. LaCounte, 225 M 77, 733 P2d 340, 44 St. Rep. 264 (1987), followed in Cook v. Soo Line Railroad Co., 2008 MT 421, 347 M 372, 198 P3d 310 (2008). See also Thoring v. Bottensek, 350 NW 2d 586 (N.D. 1984), Nehring v. LaCounte, 219 M 462, 712 P2d 1329, 43 St. Rep. 93 (1986), and St. v. Ailport, 1998 MT 315, 292 M 172, 970 P2d 1044, 55 St. Rep. 1292 (1998).

Applicability of Collateral Estoppel to Judgment Made in Another State: Aetna Life Insurance Company (Aetna) contended that the Montana District Court erred in failing to give collateral estoppel effect to a South Dakota District Court judgment. Aetna asserted that the South Dakota decision, holding that Aetna was not guilty of fraud, was entitled to full faith and credit in Montana and conclusively defeated the fraud allegations. The Montana District Court apparently declined full faith and credit because that decision was on appeal to the South Dakota Supreme Court at the time of the Montana trial. The Montana Supreme Court found that this approach ignored the fact that in South Dakota a judgment on appeal can have collateral estoppel or res judicata effect; therefore, the judgment was entitled to the same effect in Montana, since the requirements for applicability of collateral estoppel outlined in Aetna Life & Cas. Ins. Co. v. Johnson, 207 M 409, 673 P2d 1277, 41 St. Rep. 40 (1984), were met. Aetna Life Ins. Co. v. McElvain, 221 M 138, 717 P2d 1081, 43 St. Rep. 697 (1986).

Error to Refuse Intervention in Proceeding to Enforce Foreign Divorce Decree: An Oregon divorce decree awarded Montana property to the wife. Before the wife filed an action under 26-3-203 to enforce the foreign decree, husband conveyed the Montana property to Christiana, who later proposed to intervene in the instant action. The Supreme Court held that the District Court erroneously refused intervention. Insofar as the Oregon court attempted to directly transfer husband's Montana property to wife, its act was not effective in this state. The District Court erred in treating the foreign decree as a direct and self-executing transfer of Montana property. However, in an enforcement action in this state, the Oregon decree is an enforceable determination of the rights and equities of husband and wife with respect to the Montana real property in question. Gammon v. Christiana, Inc., 210 M 463, 684 P2d 1081, 41 St. Rep. 1161 (1984). For application of principle to effect of Montana divorce decree on out-of-state property, see In re Marriage of Bahm, 225 M 331, 732 P2d 846, 44 St. Rep. 279 (1987).

Dismissal of Other State's Judgment Not a Judgment on the Merits — Montana Action Not Barred: Plaintiff brought an action to enforce a Colorado judgment. Neither the pleadings nor the stipulated dismissal of the enforcement action with prejudice raised any issue regarding the merits of the underlying obligation; nor was it the function of the court in which the enforcement action was brought to reconsider the merits of the Colorado action. Therefore, the dismissal was not a judgment on the merits of the underlying obligation and did not bar an original Montana action on that underlying obligation. Hughes v. Salo, 203 M 52, 659 P2d 270, 40 St. Rep. 289 (1983).

Effect of Void Judgment of Another State on Action in Montana: Colorado judgment against Montana defendant was void from its inception because the court did not have personal jurisdiction over defendant. It thus did not bar subsequent Montana action by same plaintiff against same defendant on same cause of action, filed after plaintiff's Montana proceeding to enforce the Colorado judgment was dismissed with prejudice by stipulation of the parties with no statement as to the reason for the stipulation or dismissal. The fact that the nullity of the Colorado judgment was not explicitly recognized by the parties until plaintiff appealed the judgment in the Montana action did not make the Colorado judgment valid as of the time the Montana action was filed for purposes of barring the Montana action under the doctrine of merger and the rule against splitting causes of action. Hughes v. Salo, 203 M 52, 659 P2d 270, 40 St. Rep. 289 (1983).

Valid Final Judgment Necessary to Doctrines of Merger and Splitting Causes of Action: Both the rule against splitting causes of action and the doctrine of merger are inextricably related to the principles of res judicata, and the application of either to bar a subsequent action depends upon the existence of a valid and final prior judgment. Hughes v. Salo, 203 M 52, 659 P2d 270, 40 St. Rep. 289 (1983), followed in Baertsch v. Lewis & Clark County, 223 M 206, 727 P2d 504, 43 St. Rep. 1660 (1986).

Void Foreign Judgment — Res Judicata Not Applicable: Colorado judgment against Montana defendant was void from its inception because the court did not have in personam jurisdiction over defendant. Therefore, res judicata did not apply to Montana action by same plaintiff against same defendant on same cause of action. Hughes v. Salo, 203 M 52, 659 P2d 270, 40 St. Rep. 289 (1983).

Enforcement of Tribal Court Judgment — Special Proceeding Required: Plaintiffs, tribal members, obtained a loan from the Blackfeet Tribe. Plaintiffs defaulted, and the tribe obtained a judgment in tribal court. The tribe filed notice of the judgment with the Clerk and Recorder as a lien in the District Court. Plaintiffs agreed to sell their ranch to Robertson and to provide title insurance. A portion of the purchase price was to be kept in escrow to cover the amount owing the tribe. A year after the conveyance, plaintiffs filed a complaint against Robertson and the tribe requesting that the tribe set forth the nature of its claims to the ranch and the escrow funds and that the court adjudicate the rights of all parties. Defendants both counterclaimed. The trial court ruled in favor of the defendants, holding that the tribal court judgment was entitled to full faith and credit as a matter of comity. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that there is no Montana law allowing a tribe or foreign nation to place a lien against property by filing a notice of judgment. An action or special proceeding must be instituted in the District Court of the county where the judgment is sought to be enforced. The District Court acted properly in ordering the tribe's notice of judgment stricken from the court's records and in declaring it was not a lien on plaintiffs' property. Here, the action filed by plaintiffs laid the foundation for the court's inquiry into the validity of the tribal court's judgment. The only question was of the amount of the judgment, and the case was remanded for that determination. Wippert v. Blackfeet Tribe, 201 M 299, 654 P2d 512, 39 St. Rep. 2117 (1982), overruled in part on other grounds by Green v. Gerber, 2013 MT 35, 369 Mont. 20, 303 P.3d 729.

Foreign Jurisdiction — Lack of Personal Jurisdiction: Figgins entered into a collective bargaining agreement with the Teamsters Union. The agreement contained provisions concerning payment to the Teamsters Pension Trust Fund located in Seattle. The agreement did not specify where the contributions were to be made, but Figgins agreed to execute all necessary forms. One form designated a bank in Colorado as the depository bank. Figgins sent payments to the Colorado bank. Later, Figgins was audited and an action brought in Colorado to collect delinquent contributions. Figgins did not defend the Colorado suit. Plaintiff brought suit in Montana to enforce the Colorado default judgment. The Montana Supreme Court said that Figgins did not have sufficient contacts or ties to the state of Colorado to make it reasonable and just, according to our traditional conception of fair play and substantial justice, to enforce the Colorado judgment. May v. Figgins, 186 M 383, 607 P2d 1132, 37 St. Rep. 493 (1980), followed (same fact situation) in Hughes v. Salo, 203 M 52, 659 P2d 270, 40 St. Rep. 289 (1983).

Certified Copy of Judicial Record: The effect of a judicial record of a sister state, when proved, is the same in Montana as in the state where it was made, and a certified copy thereof is admissible in evidence in the courts of this state. Quickenden v. Hulbert, 83 M 501, 272 P 994 (1928).

Administrator From Another State: An administrator appointed in another state cannot maintain an action in the courts of this state in his representative capacity. Lefebure v. Baker, 69 M 193, 220 P 1111 (1923), distinguished in In re Livingston's Estate, 91 M 584, 9 P2d 159 (1932).

Case Notes

Full Faith and Credit Afforded Out-of-State Renewable Child Support Judgment — Res Judicata Applicable: Article IV, sec. 1, U.S. Const., provides that full faith and credit be given in each state to the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of every other state. As restated in Baker v. Gen. Motors Corp., 522 US 222, 139 L Ed 2d 580, 118 S Ct 657 (1998), a final judgment in one state, if rendered by a court with adjudicatory authority over the subject matter and persons governed by the judgment, qualifies for recognition throughout the land. When issues of jurisdiction have been determined by one court, the doctrine of res judicata precludes a second court from considering jurisdiction as long as the first court fully and fairly considered the issue, and that judgment, as to jurisdiction, is entitled to full faith and credit in the second court. In the present case, a Utah renewable child support judgment, in which the Utah court established jurisdiction of the parties, was entitled to full faith and credit in Montana, despite contentions by the husband that he no longer had minimum contacts with Utah after moving to Montana. The jurisdiction arguments raised before the Montana Supreme Court were identical to the arguments that were previously raised, fairly considered, and finally decided in Utah, precluding relitigation by the Montana court under res judicata. In re Child Support of Mason, 1998 MT 192, 290 M 253, 964 P2d 743, 55 St. Rep. 803 (1998), followed with regard to full faith and credit of a judgment by an out-of-state court following full and fair consideration of jurisdiction in Genuine Parts Co. v. Rascal's Auto Parts, Inc., 2008 MT 313, 346 M 56, 192 P3d 1153 (2008).

Enforcement of Tribal Court Judgment — Special Proceeding Required: Plaintiffs, tribal members, obtained a loan from the Blackfeet Tribe. Plaintiffs defaulted, and the tribe obtained a judgment in tribal court. The tribe filed notice of the judgment with the Clerk and Recorder as a lien in the District Court. Plaintiffs agreed to sell their ranch to Robertson and to provide title insurance. A portion of the purchase price was to be kept in escrow to cover the amount owing the tribe. A year after the conveyance, plaintiffs filed a complaint against Robertson and the tribe requesting that the tribe set forth the nature of its claims to the ranch and the escrow funds and that the court adjudicate the rights of all parties. Defendants both counterclaimed. The trial court ruled in favor of the defendants, holding that the tribal court judgment was entitled to full faith and credit as a matter of comity. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that there is no Montana law allowing a tribe or foreign nation to place a lien against property by filing a notice of judgment. An action or special proceeding must be instituted in the District Court of the county where the judgment is sought to be enforced. The District Court acted properly in ordering the tribe's notice of judgment stricken from the court's records and in declaring it was not a lien on plaintiffs' property. Here, the action filed by plaintiffs laid the foundation for the court's inquiry into the validity of the tribal court's judgment. The only question was of the amount of the judgment, and the case was remanded for that determination. Wippert v. Blackfeet Tribe, 201 M 299, 654 P2d 512, 39 St. Rep. 2117 (1982), overruled in part on other grounds by Green v. Gerber, 2013 MT 35, 369 Mont. 20, 303 P.3d 729.

Comity — Definition and Standards: Comity is the basis for the voluntary enforcement or recognition by one state of the judicial proceedings of a sister state. It is not a binding obligation but rather a courtesy voluntarily extended to another state for reasons of practice, convenience, and expediency. However, deference is not offered when it would contravene the public or judicial policy of the state. Kane v. Kane, 198 M 335, 646 P2d 505, 39 St. Rep. 1036 (1982).

Comity — Divorce Proceeding Arising in Another State — Dispute Over Montana Land: Wyoming residents were divorced under a Wyoming divorce decree that provided that disagreements between the parties arising out of any transaction relating to the decree were to be submitted to the Wyoming District Court for resolution. A disagreement arose in connection with the parties' interests in property located in Montana. Husband filed suit in Montana, and wife sought a ruling that the Montana court lacked jurisdiction and that the Wyoming court was the proper forum. The Montana District Court properly decided that it should decline to exercise jurisdiction on the basis of the doctrine of comity, though it did have jurisdiction. Application of the comity doctrine did not contravene the public policy of Montana or the open court policy mandated by the Montana Constitution. Kane v. Kane, 198 M 335, 646 P2d 505, 39 St. Rep. 1036 (1982).

Federal Full Faith and Credit — Montana Jurisdiction Over Transitory Action Arising in Another State: The Full Faith and Credit Clause of the United States Constitution does not prohibit a state from exercising jurisdiction in a transitory cause of action, even though a sister state has provided that action on the particular claim may not be brought outside its territory. Kane v. Kane, 198 M 335, 646 P2d 505, 39 St. Rep. 1036 (1982).

CHAPTER 10 MONTANA RULES OF EVIDENCE

Chapter Compiler's Comments

Annotator's Preface to Rules of Evidence and Commission Comments: The Montana Rules of Evidence were formulated by the Montana Supreme Court Commission on Evidence, submitted to the Supreme Court on November 3, 1976, and adopted by the Supreme Court on December 29, 1976, effective July 1, 1977, pursuant to Administrative Supreme Court Order 12729, under authority granted the Supreme Court by Article VII, section 2(3), Montana Constitution.

The commission comments on the Montana Rules of Evidence and Table "C" (found in these compiler's comments), Table "D" (found at part compiler's comment, Title 26, ch. 1, part 6), and Table "E" (found at compiler's comment, Rule 902, Montana Rules of Evidence) were prepared by the Supreme Court Commission on Evidence. The commission comments and Tables "D" and "E" are presented verbatim; any changes made by the annotator, other than the correction of obvious typographical errors, are set off in brackets. Cites to the Revised Codes of Montana, 1947, (R.C.M. 1947) have been updated, giving in brackets the current section number in the Montana Code Annotated or, if the section is not currently in the MCA, whether the section has been superseded by Supreme Court Order, repealed, or not codified.

Cases Case Noted: Only those cases interpreting the Montana Rules of Evidence have been case noted for inclusion in this chapter. Cases interpreting superseded statutes and common-law cases on evidence have not been included. Because the Montana Rules of Evidence present a break with former Montana law on evidence, the annotator believes that any method of case noting other than that used would be misleading and probably erroneous. That is because some Montana law on evidence is carried forward into the rules and some is specifically superseded.

The problem of properly categorizing and making judgments on them is best left to the analysis of case law in the Commission Comments following each rule. Under the annotations of the Revised Codes of Montana, 1947, only those cases interpreting a specific statute were annotated; because much of the former law of evidence was nonstatutory, a great body of evidentiary case law has never been case noted. To do so now would be inexpedient because of the rules and would be time consuming and expensive.

Effect of Publishing Rules: Sec. 2, Ch. 1, L. 1979, provided: “(1) The legislature recognizes the supreme court’s authority pursuant to Article VII, section 2, of the Montana Constitution to make rules governing procedure and practice before the courts.

(2) The legislature also recognizes that the practice of printing such rules with the Montana statutes is of benefit to code users and facilitates implementation of Article VII, section 2(3), of the Montana Constitution concerning disapproval by the legislature.

(3) Therefore, the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure, printed as chapter 20, Title 25, MCA; the Montana Rules of Appellate Civil Procedure [now Montana Rules of Appellate Procedure], printed as chapter 21, Title 25, MCA; and the Montana Rules of Evidence, printed as chapter 10, Title 26, MCA, appear only for the purpose of facilitating use of the code. Neither this act nor publication of the rules may be construed as an attempt to readopt or promulgate the rules.”

Superseded Statutes: Supreme Court Order 12729 (July 10, 1979) provided:

“1. Pursuant to Article VII, Section 2, of the 1972 Montana Constitution, the following sections of the Revised Codes of Montana, 1947, are declared to have been superseded by the provisions of the Montana Rules of Evidence:

Sections 93-301-3; 93-301-4; 93-301-5; 93-301-6; 93-301-7; 93-301-8; 93-301-12; 39-301-13[sic]; 93-301-14; 93-301-17; 93-401-2; 93-401-3; 93-401-5; 93-401-6; 93-401-9; 93-401-10; 93-401-11; 93-401-12; 93-401-20; 93-401-24; 93-401-25; 93-401-27; 93-501-1 through 93-501-8; 93-701-2; 93-701-3; 93-701-5; 93-701-6; 93 801-1 through 93-801-6; 93-901-1 through 93-901-5; 93-1001-13; 93-1001-14; 93-1001-17; 93-1001-18; 93-1001-19; 93-1001-30; 93-1001-31; 93-1001-33 and 93-1001-34; 93-1001-35; 93-1001-36; 93-1101-8; 93-1101-9; 93-1101-10; 93-1101-11; 93-1101-12; 93-1101-14; 93-1101-15; 93-1101-18; 93-1101-19; 93-1101-21; 93-1201-1; 93-1301-3; 93-1301-5; 93-1401-1; 93-1401-2; 93-1601-1; 93-1601-5; 93-1901-1; 93-1901-2; 93-1901-3; 93-1901-6; 93-1901-7; 93-1901-8; 93-1901-9; 93-1901-10; 93-1901-11; 93-1901-12; 93-1901-13; 93-1901-14; 93-2201-5; and 93-2501-3.

2. The foregoing superseded sections were superseded upon the adoption of the Montana Rules of Evidence by order of this Court dated December 29, 1976, and were thereby rendered obsolete, unnecessary and redundant; the continued presence of said sections as a part of the law of Montana tends to lead to confusion, uncertainty and conflict in the law, all of which are contrary to the spirit and purpose of the Montana Rules of Evidence and the ends of justice.”

Wigmore Cites: Cites to Wigmore on Evidence in the collateral references to each rule are to the 3rd Edition, 1940, with revised editions of volumes 2 through 8 (Chadbourn and McNaughton editions), including the 1988 pocket supplements by Walter A. Reiser.

Rules as Differing From Federal Rules — Table C: The following table lists the Montana Rules of Evidence by number, giving their source and how they differ from that source. The table was prepared by the Montana Supreme Court Commission on the Rules of Evidence in 1977 as a guide to consideration of the rules.

The table uses the following abbreviations: “FRE” means the Federal Rules of Evidence adopted by Congress in 1975. They are roughly based upon an original version proposed by the U.S. Supreme Court in 1972. “Cal. Ev. Code” means the California Evidence Code of 1965; and “URE” followed by a date means the Uniform Rules of Evidence of that date.

The Revised Codes of Montana, 1947, sections cited in the table have been superseded by the Montana Rules of Evidence (see compiler’s comments: Superseded Statutes).

Chapter Case Notes

Error in Denial of Continuance so That New Psychosexual Evaluation Might Be Performed Without Polygraph Test: As part of a plea agreement in an incest case, Anderson was required to voluntarily submit to a psychosexual evaluation, which included a polygraph test. Results of the test were considered in the preparation of the presentence sexual offender evaluation. Anderson moved for a continuance of the sentencing hearing so that a new psychosexual evaluation could be performed without the use of a polygraph, but the continuance motion was denied. Noting that pursuant to St. v. Staat, 248 M 291, 811 P2d 1261 (1991), polygraph evidence may not be used in any proceeding in a Montana court, the Supreme Court reversed and ordered a new psychosexual evaluation performed without the use of a polygraph and the preparation of a new presentence sexual offender evaluation in light of the new psychosexual evaluation. St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 58, 293 M 472, 977 P2d 315, 56 St. Rep. 243 (1999), followed in In re N.V., 2004 MT 80, 320 M 442, 87 P3d 510 (2004).

Introduction of Polygraph Results in Custody or Visitation Dispute Prohibited: As part of a modification of Robert's visitation rights, the District Court required that Robert undergo a sex offender evaluation. Robert argued that the results of a polygraph test taken as a part of the sex offender evaluation should not be introducible. Citing St. v. Staat, 248 M 291, 811 P2d 1261 (1991), and 37-62-302 (now repealed), the Supreme Court held that the results of a polygraph test taken as part of a court-ordered sex offender evaluation would not be admissible in subsequent proceedings in the case. In re Marriage of Njos/Allard, 270 M 54, 889 P2d 1192, 52 St. Rep. 74 (1995), followed in St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 58, 293 M 472, 977 P2d 315, 56 St. Rep. 243 (1999).

Use of Polygraph Results to Elicit Confession Prohibited: It is unacceptable for police to use the results of a polygraph examination to tell a defendant that the defendant has lied in order to elicit a statement or confession. St. v. Craig, 262 M 240, 864 P2d 1240, 50 St. Rep. 1533 (1993).

Polygraph Examination Results Barred From All Court Proceedings: In light of the untrustworthiness of the results of polygraph tests, the mandatory prohibition on the introduction of polygraph evidence in 37-62-302 (now repealed) was not limited to court proceedings in which the rules of evidence govern but was extended to every proceeding in Montana courts of law, including limited circumstances involving admission of the evidence by stipulation of the parties. St. v. Staat, 248 M 543, 810 P2d 314, 48 St. Rep. 331 (1991), overruling St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120 (1989), and followed in St. v. Hensley, 250 M 478, 821 P2d 1029, 48 St. Rep. 1018 (1991), St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 58, 293 M 472, 977 P2d 315, 56 St. Rep. 243 (1999), In re N.V., 2004 MT 80, 320 M 442, 87 P3d 510 (2004), and St. v. Walker, 2018 MT 312, 394 Mont. 1, 433 P.3d 202.

Admissibility in Police Disciplinary Hearing of Fact Witness Took Polygraph Test: Although the results of a witness's polygraph exam were not admitted in evidence, she was asked if she took a test and answered that she had. There was no objection, and the chairman of the Police Commission sitting at a police officers' disciplinary hearing admonished the Commission that evidence of taking the exam was to be ignored. On appeal, the District Court found no prejudice. The Supreme Court agreed. Gentry v. Helena, 237 M 353, 773 P2d 309, 46 St. Rep. 862 (1989). However, see St. v. Walker, 2018 MT 312, 394 Mont. 1, 433 P.3d 202.

Rules of Evidence Inapplicable to Sentencing: Defendant contended that the court erred in adding 10 years to his sentence for being a persistent felony offender because the court relied on evidence improperly before it. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence because the rules of evidence do not apply to sentencing and because the evidence was competent. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988), followed in St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989). See also St. v. Passwater, 2015 MT 159, 379 Mont. 372, 351 P.3d 382, holding that the rules of evidence do not apply to an award of restitution as a part of sentencing.

Inadmissibility of Polygraph Evidence — Decision Prior to Statutory Effective Date: An insurer contended that because it was being sued for bad faith, polygraph results ought to be admissible as proof of the insurer's good faith in refusing to pay the claim. The Supreme Court held that the District Court Judge properly followed Gropp v. Lotton, 160 M 415, 503 P2d 661 (1972), in denying evidence of the polygraph results, even though his ruling preceded the effective date of 37-62-302 (now repealed). Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Admissions Made to Polygraph Examiner After Polygraph Examination Finished — Admissible: Admissions made to a polygraph examiner in a postexamination interview were not inadmissible because they were somehow tied to the inadmissibility of polygraph examination results. The admissions were made after disconnection from the device and in another room and were made in response to a note given to the examiner while the postexamination interview was being conducted. The evidence of the accused's admissions had nothing to do with polygraph test results wherein the operator evaluated the credibility of a witness. The operator merely related admissions he perceived from the accused, and it was then the jury's province to evaluate the testimony. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Parol Evidence Rules Substantive, Not Procedural — Subject to Rules of Evidence and Common-Law Exceptions: The Montana Uniform Commercial Code's parol evidence rule contained in 30-2-202 continues the operation of the traditional law of contracts parol evidence rule, though with some modifications. Each is a principle of substantive law, not a procedural rule of evidence. Thus, the admissibility of any evidence is ultimately subject to the provisions of the Montana Rules of Evidence, and the traditional common-law exceptions to the contract law parol evidence rule, such as proof of fraud, misrepresentation, or mistake, remain exceptions to the parol evidence rule in the Montana Uniform Commercial Code. Norwest Bank Billings v. Murnion, 210 M 417, 684 P2d 1067, 41 St. Rep. 1132 (1984).

Admissibility of Evidence Contrary to Motion In Limine — Review in Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding: The trial court granted a motion in limine to exclude threats made by the defendant to persons other than the victim. Nevertheless, such threats were admitted and the admission was upheld by the Montana Supreme Court. This ruling was not disturbed by the federal District Court because states are given a wide latitude in developing their own rules of evidence, and a habeas corpus action is not considered the proper remedy to correct trial errors absent a denial of fundamental fairness. Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Admissibility of Polygraph Evidence — Review in Federal Habeas Corpus Proceeding: The longstanding rule in Montana is that polygraph evidence is inadmissible at trial. Because states are afforded wide latitude in developing their own rules of evidence, the petitioner in a federal habeas corpus proceeding must prove that an exclusion of polygraph evidence so fatally infected the trial as to deprive him of the fundamental fairness mandated by due process. Where the examinee was allowed to testify at trial to those items raised in the polygraph examination, fundamental fairness was not affected. Bashor v. Risley, 539 F. Supp. 259, 39 St. Rep. 960 (D.C. Mont. 1982).

Jury Instructions — Presumption of Innocence: In a criminal prosecution for theft of an automobile in which the defendant timely requested and was twice denied an instruction on the presumption of innocence, an instruction on the State's burden of proof could not supplant an instruction on the presumption of innocence. The standard for prejudicial effect of the lack of the instruction was established in St. v. Harrison, 23 M 79, 57 P 647 (1899), and is more strict than that used by the U.S. Supreme Court. It is per se reversible error to deny the instruction. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224, 36 St. Rep. 1959 (1979).

Rule 100. Short title.

Rule 101. Scope.

Commission Comments

(a) Proceedings Generally. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 101 with these exceptions: "all" is added to modify both proceedings and courts; "in the state of Montana" is substituted for the Federal phrase making the rules apply in Federal courts and before Federal magistrates and the Uniform Rule phrase "of this state"; "to the extent and" is deleted from both rules; and "exceptions stated in this rule" is substituted for the Federal and Uniform Rules phrase "exceptions stated in Rule 1101".

The first two changes are added to make it clear that the Montana Rules of Evidence will apply in all proceedings and in all courts in the state of Montana unless there is an exception stated in the rules. The third and fourth changes are made to conform to the different scheme employed in setting forth the exceptions. The Federal Rules contain a separate rule (Rule 1101) to provide for their application. Exceptions to the Montana Rules of Evidence are not nearly as complex as the Federal Rules and are placed in the first rule to provide clearer organization and easier understanding.

The Supreme Court's authority to promulgate these rules is Article VII, Section 2(3) of The 1972 Constitution of Montana, allowing the court to make rules of practice and procedure for all courts. A similar provision establishing such authority is Section 93-2801-1, R.C.M. 1947 [3-2-701]. Existing Montana law covers the application of the law of evidence quite generally rather than applying it to specific proceedings. Section 93-2501-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], provides that the law of evidence applicable in jury trials is equally applicable where there is no jury. Section 95-3001, R.C.M. 1947 [46-16-201], provides that rules of evidence applicable in civil cases are also applicable in criminal cases, except as otherwise provided in the Montana Code of Criminal Procedure. Therefore the Commission feels that the Supreme Court has the authority to make these rules consistent with existing Montana law or practice or, if there is neither, with what makes clear good sense.

(b) Privileges. This subdivision is identical to Federal Rule 1101(c) except that "found in Article V" is included as reference to the rules of privilege. Existing Montana law on privileges is contained in Section 93-701-4, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-801], which states in part: "There are particular relations in which it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and to preserve it inviolate..." (emphasis added). Therefore the proposed rule is consistent with this statute and what the Commission believes to be the rule in Montana on privileges.

(c) Rules inapplicable. This subdivision is identical to Federal Rule 1101(d) in paragraphs (1) and (2). Paragraph (3) is identical to Federal Rule 1101(d)(3) except that the following additions are made to conform to Montana practice: "and proceedings on applications for leave to file informations" after "preliminary examinations"; "dispositional hearings in youth court proceedings" after "sentencing"; "or parole" after "probation"; and "notices to appear" after "criminal summonses". Paragraph (4) is based on Rule 1101(b)(4) of the Uniform Rules of Evidence (1974). Paragraph (5) is original.

The reason for these changes is to extend the exceptions of the Federal Rules to follow the Montana practice of not applying rules of evidence in the following instances. Paragraph (1) is consistent with section 93-2501-2, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-201], calling for the court to make determinations of this sort and with the view that it is impractical to require the court to observe rules of evidence when determining the admissibility of evidence under Rule 104(a).

Paragraph (2) is consistent with Section 95-1408(a), R.C.M. 1947 [46-11-314], covering grand juries and with the view that it is impossible for rules of evidence to be applied in grand jury proceedings when there is no one to object and no one to rule on objections.

Paragraph (3) is consistent with Montana practice in criminal and youth court proceedings where application of rules of evidence would be impractical. The Commission does not intend that substantive due process be abrogated by suspension of the rules in the proceedings covered in paragraph (3); the rules may be applied when the court finds it necessary. An example of this problem can be found in Section 95-1506, R.C.M. 1947 [46-13-108], where an increased sentence for prior conviction is not allowed unless the prosecution proves it at a separate hearing. In this situation, it is possible that the provision of this rule on sentencing would exclude the use of rules of evidence; however, as the Commission does not intend to abrogate due process by suspension of the rules, where the court feels that the rules should apply, they shall apply.

The statutes which the Commission believes cover most of the various criminal proceedings are as follows: extradition or rendition under Section 95-3101, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 [46-30-101]; preliminary examination under Section 95-1202, R.C.M. 1947 [46-10-202], and applications for leave to file information under Section 95-1301, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 [Title 46, ch. 11, part 2]; sentencing under Section 95-2201, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 [Title 46, ch. 18]; granting or revoking probation or parole under Section 95-3201, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 [Title 46, ch. 23, part 11]; issuance of arrest warrants under Section 95-603, R.C.M. 1947 [46-6-201, 46-6-214, 46-6-215], criminal summonses under Section 95-612, R.C.M. 1947 [46-6-213], and notices to appear under Section 95-614, R.C.M. 1947 [46-6-310]; issuance of search warrants under Section 95-704, R.C.M. 1947 [46-5-221]; and proceedings with respect to bail or otherwise under Section 95-1101, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 [46-9-102, et seq.]. Youth court dispositional hearings are covered under Section 10-1221, R.C.M. 1947 [41-5-522, renumbered 41-5-1511].

Paragraph (4) is consistent with practical considerations and the Montana provision on direct contempt, Section 93-9803, R.C.M. 1947 [3-1-511], allowing the court to act summarily in punishing such conduct. It is conceivable that other provisions of the law may allow the court to act in such a manner, and if the court points out where it is authorized by law to so act, the rules may be suspended. A specific instance where this rule does not apply is [former] Rule 56, M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded], motions for summary judgment.

Paragraph (5) is consistent with practical considerations and the Montana practice that where the proceedings are such that no rules of evidence will be invoked, there is no need to have the rules apply.

Case Notes

Hearings Officer's Decision on Hostile Work Environment Claim — Insufficient Evidence to Determine Whether Standards of Evidence Properly Applied to Testimony: The petitioner quit working for the respondent after 2 months on the job and filed a complaint alleging that the owner of the company had sexually harassed her. A hearings officer for the Human Rights Commission granted judgment in favor of the respondent, which the Commission upheld. Following the District Court's denial of her petition for judicial review, the petitioner appealed to the Supreme Court, arguing that the hearings officer had failed to properly weigh the testimony of her witnesses. The Supreme Court reversed, concluding that the hearings officer's decision lacked sufficient explanation for the court to determine whether or not the standards of evidence had been applied, and directed the officer on remand to consider the testimony of the plaintiff's witnesses and to apply the standards of review set forth in the opinion. Jones v. All Star Painting, Inc., 2018 MT 70, 391 Mont. 120, 415 P.3d 986.

Error for District Court to Refuse to Admit Unauthenticated Documents During Revocation Hearing — Different Evidentiary Standard: During a revocation hearing, the defendant attempted to admit out-of-state documents to show that the state knew he was in Washington state after his escape from custody. The District Court admitted documents originating in Montana but refused to admit any documents from Washington state, including a postal receipt for registered mail. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that both federal and state courts have allowed admission of similar unauthenticated documents in revocation proceedings and that the limitations courts place on the admissibility of documentary evidence in revocation proceedings arise solely out of concern for a defendant's sixth amendment confrontation rights. As such, the District Court's refusal to admit the unauthenticated documents was an error. However, the error was harmless, given that the defendant's substantive argument was rejected. St. v. Graves, 2015 MT 262, 381 Mont. 37, 355 P.3d 769.

Class Certification — Traditional Rules of Evidence Not Required: A District Court's inquiry into a motion for class certification is tentative, preliminary, and limited to a determination of only whether the litigation may be conducted on a class basis. The decision to certify a class is not a conclusive judgment on the merits of the case and is not accompanied by the traditional rules and procedure applicable to civil trials. Consequently, evidence considered for the purpose of class certification need not be in trial-admissible form. Jacobsen v. Allstate Ins. Co., 2013 MT 244, 371 Mont. 393, 310 P.3d 452.

Consideration at Sentencing of Alleged Crimes Dismissed by Plea Bargain Not Violative of Due Process: At sentencing, the District Court considered allegations of other crimes for which Mason had been initially charged but that had been dismissed by plea agreement. Mason contended that consideration of statements related to unproved conduct violated the right to due process. The Supreme Court noted that due process protects a defendant from being sentenced based on misinformation and requires that a defendant be given an opportunity to rebut any information that may lead to deprivation of life, liberty, or property, but does not protect against all misinformation unless the sentence is premised on materially false misinformation. The court also noted that St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376 (1996), allows a sentencing court to consider any evidence that has probative force, including other acts that have been dismissed by plea agreement, as in St. v. Baldwin, 192 M 521, 629 P2d 222 (1981). Nothing in Mason's plea agreement prevented the state from presenting the facts of the case during the sentencing hearing, and in fact, that inquiry is required as part of the presentence investigation report under 46-18-112. Mason failed to show that the sentencing court relied on misinformation and thus was not entitled to resentencing on due process grounds. Further, the plea agreement required relinquishment of Mason's parental rights, so the sentencing court properly considered evidence of the danger Mason posed to the other children in order to approve that portion of the agreement. St. v. Mason, 2003 MT 371, 319 M 117, 82 P3d 903 (2003).

No Constitutional Violation in Admission of Telephonic Testimony at Revocation Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion Upon Good Cause: To accommodate counsel, the state moved to allow the admission of telephonic testimony from two law enforcement officers who could not attend Megard's sentence revocation hearing in person. Megard objected, relying on Rule 611, M.R.Ev., and In re Marriage of Bonamarte, 263 M 170, 866 P2d 1132 (1994). The District Court held that neither the rule nor Bonamarte applied and that Megard's fundamental rights would be adequately protected, so the motion was granted. On appeal, Megard also contended that allowing the telephonic testimony violated his due process right and the right to confront witnesses. The Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court was familiar with the witnesses. Allowing telephonic testimony did not impede the ability to judge a witness's credibility in relation to other witnesses, who corroborated the testimony, because knowledge of a witness's identity and credentials may constitute a special circumstance under which telephonic testimony is allowed. Although telephonic testimony is generally not allowed in trials absent special circumstances or the parties' consent, evidentiary rules do not apply to revocation proceedings. Because a revocation hearing is not a criminal trial, Megard had no constitutional right to confront witnesses at the hearing. Further, Megard's due process rights were not violated because his counsel actually cross-examined the witnesses, and good cause existed for the District Court to admit the telephonic testimony to address scheduling conflicts. Even if error occurred, it was harmless, given Megard's failure to establish prejudice pursuant to St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003). St. v. Megard, 2004 MT 67, 320 M 323, 87 P3d 448 (2004). See also St. v. Macker, 2014 MT 3, 373 Mont. 199, 317 P.3d 150.

Plea to Lesser Included Offense — Introduction at Sentencing of Evidence of Commission of Charged Offense — Language of Plea Agreement: Collier was arrested and charged with solicitation of deliberate homicide, which was reduced to criminal endangerment by a plea bargain. At the District Court level and on appeal, Collier challenged the state's introduction of evidence tending to prove her commission of the originally charged offense. The Supreme Court upheld the introduction of the evidence, noting not only that the rules of evidence do not apply in sentencing, but also that the plea agreement provided that "counsel for the State may make any recommendation and may introduce . . . evidence in support thereof at the time of sentencing". St. v. Collier, 277 M 46, 919 P2d 376, 53 St. Rep. 534 (1996).

Consideration of Polygraph Test in Mental Health Evaluations — No Error in Sentencing: Defendant presented the sentencing court with three evaluations that were conducted at his request and submitted by him in support of his recommendation for sentencing. On appeal, he complained that the court improperly considered the report of a lie detector test referred to in two of the evaluations. The judge was not required to consider the evaluations, but under the relaxed standards of evidence in a sentencing situation, he was free to do so. Polygraph information is inadmissible as evidence at trial; however, the Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing hearings. Defendant invited consideration of the evaluations and could not complain on appeal that it was in the record. Therefore, the court did not err in considering the evidence of the polygraph test at sentencing. St. v. McPherson, 236 M 484, 771 P2d 120, 46 St. Rep. 525 (1989).

Sentencing — Rules Not Applicable:

Defendant contended that the court erred in adding 10 years to his sentence for being a persistent felony offender because the court relied on evidence improperly before it. The Supreme Court affirmed the sentence because the rules of evidence do not apply to sentencing and because the evidence was competent. St. v. Smith, 232 M 156, 755 P2d 569, 45 St. Rep. 955 (1988), followed in St. v. Farnsworth, 240 M 328, 783 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 2165 (1989).

The Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to sentencing hearings. The court correctly used relaxed rules of evidence during the sentencing hearing. St. v. Holmes, 207 M 176, 674 P2d 1071, 40 St. Rep. 1973 (1983).

Probation Revocation Hearings — Rules Not Applicable: The Montana Rules of Evidence do not apply to probation revocation hearings. St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 181 (1987).

Felony Offender Hearings — Rules Not Applicable: Subsection (c)(3) of this rule exempts sentencing proceedings from evidentiary constraints, and because felony offender hearings are part of the sentencing proceedings, they too are subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence. St. v. Lamere, 202 M 313, 658 P2d 376, 40 St. Rep. 110 (1983).

Rule 102. Purpose and construction.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 102. The general philosophy followed in drafting the Federal Rules was to allow a court to "...admit the evidence unless some good reason exists to exclude it." Statement attributed to Albert Jenner, Chairman, Federal Rules Advisory Committee, in Schwartz, "The Proposed Federal Rules of Evidence: An Introduction and Critique", 38 U. Cinn. L. Rev. 449, 453 (1969). The Commission feels that this rule is a good statement of the purpose of the rules and how they should be construed; it also concurs in the statement of their philosophy. There is no existing law in Montana specifically on this point; however a statement of similar policy is found in Section 93-2801-1, R.C.M. 1947 [3-2-701], granting the Supreme Court the authority to make rules: "...for the purpose of simplifying judicial proceedings... and for promoting the speedy determination of litigation upon its merits".

Rule 103. Rulings on evidence.

Commission Comments

(a) Effect of erroneous ruling. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 103(a). It was adopted because the Commission feels that it accurately states what is good about existing Montana law and overrules what is not.

The first clause of this rule states the harmless error provision of the rules. In allowing error to be predicated only where "a substantial right of the party is affected", the rule is consistent with the following Montana provisions:

1. Section 93-5603, R.C.M. 1947 [25-11-102], (grounds for new trial): "The former verdict or other decision may be vacated and a new trial granted...for any of the following causes, materially affecting the substantial rights of the parties..."

2. [Former] Rule 61, M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded] (harmless error): "...The court at every stage of the proceeding must disregard any error or defect in the proceeding which does not affect the substantial rights of the parties."

3. Rule 14, M.R.App.Civ.P. [now M.R.App.P., now superseded] (following review of rulings against the respondent on appeal): "...any order, ruling, or proceeding of the trial court against the respondent, affecting his substantial rights on the appeal of said cause..."

4. Section 95-2425, R.C.M. 1947 [46-20-701(2)], (appeals in criminal cases): "Any error, defect, irregularity or variance which does not affect substantial right shall be disregarded".

Cases in Montana following these statutes have held that technical errors in rulings on evidence will not be grounds for reversal and in order to allow reversal the ruling must affect substantial rights. White v. Chicago, M & PS Ry. 49 Mont. 419, 429, 143 P. 561 (1914); Roper v. Caterpillar Tractor Co., 98 Mont. 76, 97, 37 P2d 812 (1934); Lewis v. New York Life Ins. Co., 113 Mont. 151, 166, 124 P2d 579 (1942); State v. Romero, 161 Mont. 333, 341, 505 P2d 1207 (1973).

(1) Objection. This first paragraph presents the rule that an error may not be predicated unless the "substantial right of the party is affected" and, if the "ruling is one admitting evidence", an objection or motion to strike is made. The requirements for an objection or motion to strike are the same: it must be timely and it must state the specific ground of objection. This is consistent with Montana law: cases dealing with the proposition that an objection be specific are based on early cases: Herman v. Jeffries, 4 Mont. 513, 522, 1 P 11 (1883) and City of Helena v. Albertose, 8 Mont. 499, 504, 20 P 817 (1889). The requirement was also part of Section 93-5503 (superseded) stating: "...the grounds of the objection shall be particularly stated", and is part of [former] Rule 46, M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded] which reads: "...his objection to the action of the court and his grounds therefor..." A motion to strike must be preceded by a timely objection. Yoder v. Reynolds, 28 Mont. 183, 194, 72 P 417 (1903) and Poindexter & Orr Livestock Co. v. Oregon Short Line Ry., 33 Mont. 338, 341, 83 P 886 (1905). It must also be specific as to what testimony should be excluded, for there is no error in denying a motion that is too broad. Dorais v. Doll, 33 Mont. 314, 319, 83 P 884 (1905); Copenhaver v. Northern Pacific Ry., 42 Mont. 453, 469, 113 P 467 (1911); and Baldwin v. Silver, 58 Mont. 495, 499, 193 P 750 (1920).

An exception to the requirement that the objection be specific is the last phrase of paragraph (1) of this rule: "...if the specific ground was not apparent from the context..." The Commission feels that this is a good rule; however it is not clear whether or not this exception is consistent with Montana law. Cases have referred to evidence which is determined to be inadmissible from the context of the transcript of the trial, and one in particular, Yoder v. Reynolds, supra at 193, indicates that a general objection can be properly made when it appears that the evidence is entirely inadmissible from the context of the case. In another circumstance, where grounds are apparent from the context, the court may sustain an objection before counsel is able to state his grounds. On appeal the proponent of the evidence may claim that the court improperly sustained the objection. Although the Supreme Court could presume the ruling of the trial court is correct (see appended Table D for cases [at part compiler's comment, Title 26, ch. 1, part 6]), the objecting party could be penalized for not stating the grounds for his objection. The Commission feels that this is unfair, for the party is being penalized for an action of the trial court when there is good reason for the objection. This exception solves this problem.

An exception to the timeliness requirement not found in this rule is in [former] Rule 46, M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded]: "...if a party has no opportunity to object to a ruling or order at the time it is made, the absence of an objection does not thereafter prejudice him". However rarely this exception would be invoked, it is unfair to require a timely objection or motion to strike when there appears to be no reason for either. Therefore application of this exception allows a party to make an objection and motion to strike when the grounds therefor only become apparent sometime after both should have been made.

Barring the application of any of these exceptions, the Commission intends the rule of this paragraph to mean that if an objection or motion to strike is not made, it is waived. Labbitt v. Bunston, 84 Mont. 597, 599, 277 P 620 (1929) and Estate of Schueren v. Union Bank & Trust Co., 162 Mont. 417, 433, 512 P2d 1283 (1973). The effect of this rule is to allow any inadmissible evidence which is admitted without objection to be treated the same as any admissible evidence.

(2) Offer of proof. The second paragraph of this subdivision presents the rule that an error may not be predicated unless the "substantial right of the party is affected" and if the "ruling is one excluding evidence" an offer of proof was made. The offer of proof is incorporated in [former] Rule 43(c), M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded], but this rule is only codification of prior practice in Montana. The reason for the offer was succinctly stated in Milwaukee Gold Extraction Co. v. Gordon, 37 Mont. 209, 223, 95 P 995 (1908): "It is impossible for this court to say whether certain evidence was improperly excluded, unless the record discloses the offered evidence". The offer must be specific as to the facts that would be proved. Palmer v. McMaster, 10 Mont. 390, 396, 25 P 1056 (1891).

Two exceptions to these rules are contained in Montana cases. The adoption of [former] Rule 43(c) of the the M.R.Civ.P. did not answer the problem raised by them, for it only states: "In an action tried by a jury, if an objection to a question propounded to a witness is sustained by the court, the examining attorney may make a specific offer..." (emphasis added).

The first case law exception deals with offers of proof on cross-examination: "The rule which requires that an offer of proof be made has no application to cross-examination." Herzig v. Sandberg, 54 Mont. 538, 542, 172 P 132 (1918), citing other cases, and followed in Budd v. N. Pac. Ry., 59 Mont. 238, 242, 195 P 1109 (1921) and Loncar v. National Union Fire Ins. Co., 84 Mont. 141, 151, 274 P 844 (1929).

The Commission specifically rejects this exception to the offer of proof rule by not including it in Rule 103(a)(2). The rationale of the exception is not stated in the cases, but according to McCormick, Handbook on the Law of Evidence 111 n.9(2nd ed. 1972): "On cross-examination, the examining counsel is ordinarily assumed not to have had an advance opportunity to know what the witness will answer...." This is no longer true because of the extensive discovery now allowed. The rationale for the exception fails when considering that the scope of cross-examination is usually limited to matters brought out on direct examination and matters of credibility: the likelihood of counsel not knowing what the answer to his question will be in this context is small. The purposes of an offer of proof are to show the trial court what error might be committed if the evidence is excluded, to give it a chance to change its mind, and to show the appellate court what evidence has been excluded so it can determine whether there has been error. These purposes are defeated by the exception. The Commission therefore rejects this exception to the requirement of an offer of proof because it is no longer valid, defeats the purpose of the offer of proof, and is not good law.

The second exception is contained in the Federal and Montana Rule. It allows the offer to be dispensed with where the substance of the offer is apparent from the context. This exception is recognized in Montana to the extent that the court was unwilling to rule on the propriety of excluding evidence because that evidence was not apparent from the context. First National Bank of Portland v. Carroll, 35 Mont. 302, 309, 88 P 1012 (1907) and Trogdon v. Hanson Sheep Co., 49 Mont. 1, 4, 139 P 792 (1914). The exception is followed in Herzig v. Sandberg, supra at 541; Henderson v. Campbell, 95 Mont. 180, 184, 26 P2d 351 (1933); and Koppang v. Sevier, 106 Mont. 79, 97, 75 P2d 790 (1938).

(b) Record of offer and ruling. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 103(b). It was adopted to improve the practice of submitting offers of proof. The first sentence of the subdivision is the third sentence of [former] Rule 43(c), M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded]. The provision is meant to allow the trial court to clarify the record for the appellate court's review. The final sentence is derived from the final sentence of [former] Rule 43(c), M.R.Civ.P. It allows the court to direct the offer of proof to be made in question and answer form.

(c) Hearing of jury. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 103(c). It clarifies [former] Rule 43(c), M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded] which states: "The court may require the offer to be made out of the hearing of the jury" and expands the rule to include any mention of inadmissible evidence within the hearing of the jury. The Commission feels that this is the practice in Montana and therefore adopts the rule. It may also be noted that the rule conforms to Canons of Professional Ethics DR-7-106(c)(1) and (7) adopted by the Supreme Court of Montana, 160 Mont. XXIII, XLVI (1972), prohibiting an attorney from asking questions which are not supported by admissible evidence or intentionally or habitually violating established rules of evidence.

(d) Plain error. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 103(d). The Commission feels that although this rule is not formally recognized in Montana, it is consistent with Rule 102, purpose and construction, particularly allowing “elimination of unjustifiable expense and delay” and providing “that the truth may be ascertained and proceedings justly determined”. Having the rule formally recognized is not intended to negate subdivision (a) of this rule, which can be distinguished from this subdivision as follows: under subdivision (a) the party can, as a right, predicate error only when a substantial right is affected and an objection, motion to strike, or offer of proof is made. However, under subdivision (d), while a party may point out that an error affecting a substantial right has been made (for the first time on appeal), only the court has the power to invoke the rule. Therefore this rule will be used in exceptional cases and should not be relied upon by counsel. It should also be noted that while this rule is generally one of appellate review, it is not intended to preclude the trial court from allowing a new trial because of plain error.

Case law in Montana under subdivision (a) of this rule holds that the general rule is that unless a point is raised in the trial court, the Supreme Court will not hear the point on appeal; one of the latest examples is Spencer v. Robertson, 151 Mont. 507, 511, 445 P2d 48 (1968). However, the Supreme Court has settled cases in accord with its view of substantial justice and ignored the general view. In one example, Tracy v. Harmon, 17 Mont. 465, 468, 43 P 500 (1896), the court allowed counsel to raise the vagueness of the description of land in a judgment for the first time on appeal, and found the judgment void for this reason. In another example, State v. Duran, 127 Mont. 233, 235, 259 P2d 1051 (1953), the Supreme Court reversed a conviction on a point raised at trial level, but not argued by either side on appeal, noted by the dissent at 240. The Supreme Court will also consider jurisdictional questions (O'Donnell v. City of Butte, 72 Mont. 449, 457, 235 P 707 (1925)) and constitutional questions (In re Clark's Estate, 105 Mont. 401, 410, 74 P2d 401 (1937)) on its own motion. Therefore, rather than ignore such actions by the Supreme Court, the Commission adopts this rule.

OBJECTION

Ineffective Assistance of Counsel Denied Because Not Record Based — Plain Error Review Unwarranted — Defendant Failed to Identify Constitutional or Substantial Right Triggering Plain Error Review. St. v. McCaulou, 2022 MT 197, 410 Mont. 291, 518 P.3d 862.

Failure to Object to Admission of Summaries of Electronic Evidence — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel: The defendant argued that his attorney was ineffective because the attorney failed to object during trial to the admission of summaries of electronic evidence consisting of pornographic computer images. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the attorney had previously objected to the admission of the electronic evidence itself in a pretrial motion in limine, which was denied by the District Court. The Supreme Court held that the defendant failed to satisfy the second prong of the Strickland test because the defendant could not show that there was a reasonable probability the District Court would have sustained the objection to the summaries, since the District Court had already ruled against the objection to the electronic evidence. Stock v. St., 2014 MT 46, 374 Mont. 80, 318 P.3d 1053.

Objection to Damage Calculation Not Preserved for Appeal — Sufficient Evidence That Prevailing Party Mitigated Damages: The uninsured employers' fund (UEF) breached a contract and the District Court awarded consequential damages to the prevailing party. On appeal, UEF claimed that the District Court did not properly calculate damages based on two grounds. First, UEF claimed the District Court awarded gross damages rather than net damages. Second, UEF claimed the District Court should have offset any damages that it awarded given that the party that was awarded damages did not mitigate its damages by selling inventory to other dealers. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that UEF did not preserve the net damages argument based on a failure to object at trial. Additionally, the testimonial evidence supported the District Court's determination that the prevailing party could not sell its inventory to other dealers. Elk Mtn. Motor Sports, Inc. v. Dept. of Labor and Industry, 2012 MT 261, 367 Mont. 36, 289 P.3d 165.

Sanction for Failure to Object to Evidence by Motion In Limine — Admission of Patently Inadmissible Evidence Reversible Error: At Stevenson's trial alleging age discrimination, the trial court's scheduling order required that trial objections that could have been resolved by a pretrial motion in limine would be considered waived if not presented in a timely motion in limine. Defendant sought to introduce a Human Rights Bureau report that was patently inadmissible pursuant to Crockett v. Billings, 234 M 87, 761 P2d 813 (1988), but because plaintiff had not addressed the issue by pretrial motion, the trial court allowed the evidence. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. In this case, the trial court's establishment in the scheduling order of a waiver of the right to object to inadmissible evidence at trial was a sanction, especially when it resulted in the admission of patently inadmissible evidence. The sanction of waiver of the right to object to demonstrably inadmissible evidence is not recognized in the Montana Rules of Civil Procedure, and the trial court's admission of patently inadmissible evidence constituted reversible error. Stevenson v. Felco Indus., Inc., 2009 MT 299, 352 M 303, 216 P3d 763 (2009).

Failure to Object to Firefighter's Lay Testimony Regarding Burn Patterns — Admissibility Affirmed: During Henderson's arson trial, the state sought to introduce testimony of a firefighter who was at the scene. Defense counsel objected that because the firefighter was not a qualified expert, the firefighter's opinion testimony should not be allowed. The trial court allowed counsel to voir dire the firefighter in the presence of the jury, and the firefighter responded by explaining how to find a point of origin of a fire, describing indications of arson, and discussing pour patterns. Defense counsel did not move to strike the testimony or move for a limiting instruction after the court allowed the firefighter to testify as a lay witness, nor did counsel register a continuing objection to ensuing testimony that was based in part on the voir dire responses. Following conviction, Henderson contended that the testimony amounted to impermissible expert testimony, but the Supreme Court affirmed. By eliciting the evidence on voir dire, Henderson waived the right to object on appeal. Additionally, even though the testimony went beyond personal observations made at the scene, given Henderson's failure to object to the voir dire testimony regarding pour patterns, the trial court did not err in allowing testimony concerning the firefighter's observation of pour patterns at the scene. St. v. Henderson, 2005 MT 333, 330 M 34, 125 P3d 1132 (2005).

No Objection at Trial — Same Objection Barred on Appeal:

At Brasda's assault trial, the state offered Brasda's knife into evidence. Brasda objected on the basis of the knife's condition; the trial court heard evidence explaining the knife's condition; and the state again moved to admit the knife. Brasda did not object, argue that the knife had been tampered with, request a mistrial or new trial, move to reconsider admissibility, or propose a cautionary instruction for the jury. Nevertheless, Brasda claimed error on appeal. The Supreme Court found that the knife was properly admitted into evidence and that Brasda's failure to object constituted a waiver of the right to claim error on appeal. St. v. Brasda, 2003 MT 374, 319 M 146, 82 P3d 922 (2003).

As defendant made no objection at trial to the introduction of any of the testimony he now claims was improperly admitted hearsay, he is barred from predicated error on its admission on appeal. St. v. Owens, 182 M 338, 597 P2d 72, 36 St. Rep. 1182 (1979). See also Spraggins v. Elvidge, 199 M 155, 647 P2d 859, 39 St. Rep. 1229 (1982); Flanigan v. Prudential Fed. S&L Ass'n, 221 M 419, 720 P2d 257, 43 St. Rep. 941 (1986).

Deposition of Witness Taken During Trial — Insurer's Counsel Allowed to Testify at Trial — Objection to Testimony Not Preserved for Appeal: Defendant insurer assumed that its attorney was listed as a witness and called the attorney at trial, but the attorney was not a listed witness, so plaintiffs objected. The trial court took steps to abate any prejudice to plaintiffs by continuing the trial, reopening discovery, and allowing plaintiffs to depose the attorney and examine the correspondence file that the attorney would rely on during testimony. When trial resumed the following day, the court noted that it had granted the motion to add the attorney as a witness with the understanding that the relevant files would be made available to plaintiffs and inquired whether the issue had been resolved. Both parties responded affirmatively, plaintiffs stipulated to admitting the correspondence file as an exhibit, and the attorney went on to testify without further objection from plaintiffs. On appeal, plaintiffs contended that the trial court abused its discretion in allowing the attorney to testify. The Supreme Court found no fault in allowing the attorney to testify when plaintiffs' actions indicated agreement and acquiescence with the court's resolution of the initial objection to the testimony. Further, plaintiffs' objection was not preserved for appeal because plaintiffs made no renewed objection following the trial court's resolution of the matter. Nelson v. Farmers Union Mut. Ins. Co., 2003 MT 101, 315 M 268, 68 P3d 689 (2003). See also Schuff v. Jackson, 2002 MT 215, 311 M 312, 55 P3d 387 (2002).

Sufficiency of Objection to Expert Testimony — Failure to Disclose Expert Witness: Defendant contended that because plaintiff did not object at trial to the expert witness called by the defense for impeachment purposes, the objection could not be raised for the first time on appeal. In order to preserve an objection to admission of evidence for purposes of appeal, the objecting party must make a timely objection stating the specific ground of objection, if the specific objection is not apparent from the context. An objection is sufficiently specific if accompanied by a reasonably definite statement of the grounds for objection. Here, plaintiff's objection advised the District Court that defendant had never disclosed that it intended to call the witness as an expert or otherwise. The Supreme Court declined to draw a distinction between the failure to disclose a witness and the failure to disclose an expert witness, concluding that plaintiff's objection was adequate. Superior Enterprises, LLC v. Mont. Power Co., 2002 MT 139, 310 M 198, 49 P3d 565 (2002). See also Kizer v. Semitool, Inc., 251 M 199, 824 P2d 229 (1991).

Objection to Qualifications of Pathologist to Testify Regarding Gunshot Wound: At Clausell's deliberate homicide trial, objection was made to the testimony of a Board-certified clinical pathologist who offered opinions regarding a gunshot wound, on grounds that the pathologist was not a Board-certified forensic pathologist and therefore was not qualified to testify. However, the doctor had performed over 400 autopsies, including about 40 that involved gunshot wounds. Clausell did not offer any applicable legal theory that a clinical pathologist with such experience who is not a forensic pathologist is not qualified to testify in a homicide case, and the Supreme Court declined to adopt a rule to that effect. Further, Clausell failed to preserve any other objection at trial to the pathologist's testimony and was precluded from raising other issues regarding the testimony on appeal. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001), distinguishing In re K.H. & K.L.E., 1999 MT 128, 294 M 466, 981 P2d 1190 (1999).

Question of Battered Woman Syndrome Not Properly Framed — Not Preserved by Objection: Castle objected at trial to the testimony of a clinical social worker regarding the general nature of battered woman syndrome as speculative. The District Court held that a foundation had been laid for the testimony. The issue of whether Castle's wife exhibited characteristics of the syndrome was never properly framed before the District Court, and the court did not address it. Castle's "speculation" objection was not specific enough to preserve the issue on appeal, nor was specific ground for objection apparent from the objection. Castle waived the right to claim error on appeal, and the Supreme Court declined to address the issue of whether the expert testimony should have been admitted. St. v. Castle, 1999 MT 141, 982 M 1035, 982 P2d 1035, 56 St. Rep. 558 (1999), following Kizer v. Semitool, Inc., 251 M 199, 824 P2d 229, 48 St. Rep. 1115 (1991).

Lack of Objection to Expert Testimony on Hedonic Damages — Testimony Allowed: In order to preserve an objection to the admission of evidence for purposes of appeal, the objecting party must make a timely objection and state specific grounds for the objection. To be timely, an objection must be made as soon as the grounds for the objection become apparent. Here, defendant became aware at least 1 year before trial that plaintiff intended to introduce expert testimony regarding plaintiff's hedonic damages for loss of enjoyment of life, but failed to file a motion in limine at that time seeking to have the evidence excluded. Defendant had another opportunity to object to introduction of the evidence when the District Court issued its pretrial order listing witnesses and exhibits to be used at trial, but defendant failed to object until the second day of trial. Thus, the court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the expert testimony because of the lack of a timely and specific objection or in denying defendant's motion for a new trial on grounds that the admission of the evidence resulted in an unfair trial and excessive damages. Hunt v. K-Mart Corp., 1999 MT 125, 294 M 444, 981 P2d 275, 56 St. Rep. 503 (1999), following Kizer v. Semitool, Inc., 251 M 199, 824 P2d 229, 48 St. Rep. 1115 (1991).

Asking Rape Prosecution Witness if Victim Would Take Claim as Far as Trial Were Claim Not True: In a prosecution for burglary, kidnapping, and sexual intercourse without consent, prosecutor asked a lay witness for defendant if the witness remembered telling the prosecutor that the victim "wouldn't go this far with this if it weren't true". Defendant objected that the question called for speculation. The question was not improper on that ground. An objection raised for the first time on appeal (that the question was improper impeachment that had the effect of bolstering the victim's credibility) was not apparent from the context in which the question was asked. Therefore, it was not error to overrule the objection. A mistrial was not warranted when the witness answered "no" and had previously testified that he was a friend of both parties and when the judge told the jury to disregard the testimony. St. v. Greytak, 262 M 401, 865 P2d 1096, 50 St. Rep. 1610 (1993).

Objection Raised in Trial Brief but Never Ruled Upon Not Preserved for Appeal: Defendant claimed it adequately preserved its objection by raising the issue of speculative damages for plaintiff's lost future profits in its trial briefs. However, at no time did defendant solicit a ruling from the trial court on the issue of speculative future damages. Mere inclusion of the issue in the trial brief did not preserve the objection for appeal. Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993).

Insufficiency of General Objection: A general objection made without giving specific grounds for the objection is insufficient to preserve an error for appeal. An objection, to be good, must point out the specific ground of the objection. St. v. Birthmark, 253 M 526, 833 P2d 1103, 49 St. Rep. 583 (1992), citing St. v. Walker, 148 M 216, 419 P2d 300 (1966).

Expert Opinion by Expert Witness Invaded Province of Jury — Objection Preserved by Objection Following Expert's Summary: The Supreme Court held that testimony by an expert witness invaded the province of the jury. The Supreme Court also held that objections to the expert's testimony by defendant's counsel properly preserved the objection. In order to preserve an objection, the objection must be timely, must state specific grounds, and must be made on the record. The record showed that first, the expert summarized five theories of the defendant's conduct and then examined the theories one at a time. During this more detailed testimony, the expert began to give testimony on the ultimate issue of whether the employer defendant violated its covenant of good faith and fair dealing with its employee, at which time defendant's counsel objected and stated the basis for his objection. The Supreme Court held that the objection was sufficiently preserved under these conditions. Kizer v. Semitool, Inc., 251 M 199, 824 P2d 229, 48 St. Rep. 1115 (1991), followed, but with a different result, in In re Estate of Bayers, 1999 MT 154, 295 M 89, 983 P2d 339, 56 St. Rep. 607 (1999), and Spinler v. Allen, 1999 MT 160, 295 M 139, 983 P2d 348, 56 St. Rep. 632 (1999).

Motion In Limine Properly Preserved When Nature of Evidence Unchanged: Prior to trial, plaintiff objected to certain evidence by motion in limine. At trial, following the original objection, the nature of the evidence was not modified; therefore, the objection at the time of the motion in limine covered the same evidence presented at trial and was sufficiently preserved for purposes of review on appeal. Beil v. Mayer, 242 M 204, 789 P2d 1229, 47 St. Rep. 661 (1990).

Failure of Plaintiff to Appear at Trial or Present Evidence — Judgment for Defendant Proper: Objections by the plaintiff on appeal as to whether evidence was properly admitted at trial were waived because of plaintiff's failure to appear at trial, in person or by counsel, and to make a timely objection. Similarly, plaintiff's contention that the District Court should have found evidence of fraud failed because plaintiff failed to appear or present any evidence at trial to support the claim. Gibson v. Swanson, 239 M 380, 780 P2d 1137, 46 St. Rep. 1764 (1989).

Failure to Object to Closing Argument as Trial Strategy — Consideration Barred on Appeal: Defendant argued that the state's closing argument denied him due process and a fair trial but admitted that he chose not to object as a matter of trial strategy and instead moved for a new trial. Contrary to defendant's contentions, St. v. Harris, 209 M 511, 682 P2d 159, 41 St. Rep. 866 (1984), did not hold that a motion for a new trial preserved objection to a closing argument but relied instead on the plain error doctrine in 46-20-702 (now 46-20-701(2)), which did not apply here. The District Court correctly ruled that failure to object barred consideration of this issue because defendant's substantial rights were not affected. In affirming, the Supreme Court noted that Montana has long held that objections to closing arguments first made on appeal are too late. (Hawkins v. Crist, 178 M 206, 583 P2d 396 (1978), citing St. v. French, 166 M 196, 531 P2d 373 (1975).) St. v. Pease, 222 M 455, 724 P2d 153, 43 St. Rep. 1417 (1986), followed in St. v. Laverdure, 241 M 135, 785 P2d 718, 47 St. Rep. 142 (1990), and in St. v. Rodgers, 257 M 413, 849 P2d 1028, 50 St. Rep. 335 (1993).

Failure to Object as Fruitless — Fear of Alienating Judge — "Trial Tactic" Precluding Application of Plain Error Doctrine: Hearing on increase of child support payments was held in chambers with the judge briefly questioning the parties in the presence of their attorneys, a court clerk, and a court reporter. During the hearing the judge refused to allow expert testimony offered by the father's attorney. Father's attorney did not object to the method of hearing or refusal to hear testimony for fear it would be fruitless, and he did not want to alienate the judge. The Supreme Court refused to apply the plain error doctrine to review the father's allegations of error based on due process and the refusal of evidence because the errors were not brought to the attention of the trial court as a matter of the father's "trial tactics". His voluntary participation in the procedures and intentional choice precluded review of the issue. In re Marriage of Purkett, 222 M 225, 721 P2d 349, 43 St. Rep. 1217 (1986).

Admissibility of Videotape With Cautionary Instruction — No Objection — Waiver: An insurer assigned as error the admission to evidence of a doctor's videotaped deposition, contending the deposition was cumulative, had no probative value, and invoked the sympathy and passion of the jury. The videotape was submitted to the jury without any objection by the insurer and under a cautionary instruction from the court that the video was not to be considered for the insured's damages but only to show whether he was physically able to participate in the fire in the way the insurer claimed he did. The District Court Judge, in his order denying the posttrial motions, properly found the objection to submission of the evidence to have been waived. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Failure to Object to Time Limit on Closing Argument: Rumley appealed his conviction for negligent homicide based on the District Court's limitation on closing arguments to 45 minutes. There is no indication on the record that an objection was made by defense counsel to that limitation, and there is no record of either the state's or the defendant's closing argument. Since there is no record, the Supreme Court cannot determine whether defendant's rights were abridged by the time limitation. The Supreme Court will not consider issues that are not based on a record to which it can look. St. v. Rumley, 194 M 506, 634 P2d 446, 38 St. Rep. 1351A (1981). See also Scofield v. Estate of Wood, 211 M 59, 683 P2d 1300, 41 St. Rep. 1212 (1984), and Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122, 53 St. Rep. 428 (1996).

Request for Modification of Divorce Agreement — Timeliness: The former wife orally requested the court for additional property over 6 months after entry of the legal separation decree and approval of the written agreement incorporated into the divorce decree; the former husband contended that the request was barred by former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). The Supreme Court said that this may have been a crucial issue at the trial court but that the husband's failure to object makes timeliness a nonjudicable issue on appeal. Without an objection there need be no ruling, and the Supreme Court concluded that without a ruling the wife made her request within the "reasonable time" required by former Rule 60(b), M.R.Civ.P. In re Harris v. Harris, 189 M 509, 616 P2d 1099, 37 St. Rep. 1696 (1980).

Written Divorce Settlement Agreement — Simultaneous Oral Agreement Given Effect When No Objection Made: At the conclusion of a hearing on the enforcement of his divorce settlement agreement several months after his divorce, the former husband moved to amend the finding of deficiency of the settlement agreement or, in the alternative, to grant a new trial. Appeal was taken from the denial of the motion. One ground was the assertion that the District Court erred in considering evidence of an oral agreement made simultaneously with the written settlement agreement. The record disclosed no objection during trial to the wife's testimony about the automobile and the insurance to be furnished her. The failure to raise the issue of parol evidence at the trial court forfeited any right to a remedy on appeal. In re Harris v. Harris, 189 M 509, 616 P2d 1099, 37 St. Rep. 1696 (1980).

One Proceeding With Two Hearings — Failure to Object Again — Waiver of Error: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding to terminate parental rights when the father of the youngest child was to have his rights determined a month after a hearing involving the termination of both parents' rights to the two older children, the father of the youngest child waived his right to complain of error on appeal because he failed to object to questions by the judge at the second hearing involving a prior felony conviction, even though objection was made and overruled in the first hearing. In re T.J.D., J.L.D., and R.J.W., 189 M 147, 615 P2d 212, 37 St. Rep. 1385 (1980).

OFFER OF PROOF

Evidence of Other Slip and Falls Not Admissible — Not Substantially Similar: The District Court did not err when it did not allow plaintiffs to introduce evidence of other falls on the defendant's clinic campus. A District Court has broad discretion to determine whether evidence is relevant and admissible. Evidence of other falls is not admissible to prove negligence. The evidence is admissible to show the existence of danger, defect, or knowledge. A prior accident must be "substantially similar to" and "not too remote from the accident in question" to qualify for admission. As applied, the District Court properly concluded that evidence of other falls was not similar to the plaintiffs' as the other falls occurred in parking lots rather than on sidewalks or at sister facilities not on the defendant's main hospital campus. Nolan v. Billings Clinic, 2020 MT 167, 400 Mont. 326, 467 P.3d 545.

No Error in Prohibiting Impeachment of Witness With Another Person's Out-of-Court Statement: Defendant argued that he was not allowed to impeach the testimony of a detective during cross-examination by showing that the detective's characterization of a victim's statement was inconsistent with the victim's prior statement to the police. The state objected to the victim's out-of-court statement as hearsay, and the trial court sustained the objection. Defendant argued on appeal that because the prior statement was not offered to prove the truth of the matter asserted but rather to impeach the detective's testimony, the prior statement was not hearsay and contended that the ruling violated his right to confront the witness. The Supreme Court disagreed. Error may not be predicated upon a ruling that excludes evidence unless a substantial right of the party is affected and an offer of proof is made. In this case, no substantial right was affected and no offer of proof was made, so the District Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding the victim's prior statement. St. v. Skinner, 2007 MT 175, 338 M 197, 163 P3d 399 (2007).

Hearsay Evidence and Parental Rights Termination — Admission of Hearsay Evidence at Show Cause, Adjudicatory, and Termination Hearings Held Proper Because Children "Unavailable" — J.C.E. Case Distinguished — No Offer of Proof Made: Hearsay evidence in the form of videotaped interviews of young children talking with investigators about sexual abuse by their parents was admitted after the District Court found that the children were "unavailable" to testify because they would be traumatized by testifying against their parents in a courtroom setting. The Supreme Court held that the videotaped testimony was properly admitted by the District Court, based upon the thorough findings by the District Court, at the show cause hearing, the adjudicatory hearing, and the parental rights termination hearing. The Supreme Court distinguished St. v. J.C.E., 235 M 264, 767 P2d 309 (1988), because that case was a criminal case in which the right of confrontation under Art. II, sec. 24, Mont. Const., applied, whereas the case now before the Supreme Court was a civil case. The Supreme Court also held that the District Court properly analyzed the mother's attempt to call the children as witnesses as one of relevance, and because no offer of proof was made under this rule by the mother, the Supreme Court could not conclude that the District Court acted arbitrarily. In re O.A.W., 2007 MT 13, 335 M 304, 153 P3d 6 (2007).

Clarification of General Requirement of Substantially Similar Circumstances as Precedent to Admission of Evidence of Prior Accident: Evidence of prior accidents, although inadmissible to prove negligence, may be admitted for other purposes, such as to show: (1) the existence of a particular physical condition or defect; (2) the dangerousness of the condition or defect; (3) the possibility that the condition or defect might cause an accident or injury of the type alleged; (4) cause in fact; and (5) knowledge of the condition or defect. (See Modern Evidence: Doctrine and Practice, Mueller & Kirkpatrick, § 4.8 at 281, 282 (1995), and McCormick on Evidence § 200 at 844-847, 4th Ed. (1992).) Regarding the degree of identity of circumstances required when offering prior accident evidence for the sole purpose of notice or knowledge, the general requirement of substantially similar circumstances is relaxed or less strict when the evidence is proffered to show notice rather than dangerousness or causation, and a lack of exact similarity of conditions will not preclude admission under these circumstances if the accident was of a kind that should have served to warn defendant. In proving notice, there may be dissimilarities between the accidents; however, the differences affect the weight of the evidence, but not necessarily the admissibility. Here, Kissock slipped and fell in defendant's parking lot. The District Court excluded proffered evidence of a fall by another person in the same parking lot days earlier because it occurred at a different time of day under different physical circumstances. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed, holding that the minor spatial and temporal differences existing between the two slip-and-fall accidents went to the weight rather than admissibility of the evidence in supporting an inference that defendant had notice or knowledge of the icy conditions. The circumstances surrounding the prior accident were not so remote or dissimilar from Kissock's accident that the probative value was substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice to defendant. Kissock v. Butte Convalescent Center, 1999 MT 322, 297 M 307, 992 P2d 1271, 56 St. Rep. 1288 (1999). See also Runkle v. Burlington N., Inc., 188 M 286, 613 P2d 982, 37 St. Rep. 995 (1980), *Bailey v. S. Pac. Admissibility of Shingles for Demonstrative Purposes Only: Harwoods sought to introduce as an exhibit shingles retrieved from the Harwood home, which had been destroyed by fire, allegedly by sparking from electrical wiring that might have been damaged by shingles similar to the shingles introduced in evidence. The shingles offered were not the shingles that surrounded the area where the wires entered the home and could not be demonstrated to be in the same condition as those that the wires may have actually contacted. The District Court properly allowed the shingles as demonstrative evidence only, to provide the jury with an understanding of the shingles' texture and potential for damaging wires, without the risk of suggesting that the shingles at issue were in the identical condition as the shingles surrounding the area where the wires entered the home. Harwood v. Glacier Elec. Co-op, Inc., 285 M 481, 949 P2d 651, 54 St. Rep. 1257 (1997).

Denial of Motion to Call Deleted Witness — Failure to Make Offer of Proof — Objection Not Preserved: In order to preserve a trial date, Rathbun was deleted from plaintiff's list of potential witnesses, and defendant accepted the decision. Midtrial, defendant moved to call Rathbun as a witness, contending that because Rathbun was originally listed in the pretrial order, the right to call her as a witness was reserved. The trial judge denied the motion, but defendant failed to make an offer of proof concerning testimony that would have been elicited, thereby failing to properly preserve the objection to the excluded testimony. The trial judge properly denied the motion because at the point that defendant accepted the decision to delete the witness, defendant no longer retained the right under the catchall provision to call Rathbun from the witness list. Guertin v. Moody's Mkt., Inc., 265 M 61, 874 P2d 710, 51 St. Rep. 407 (1994).

Substance of Evidence Apparent From Context: In a child custody modification case, husband contended that wife should not be allowed to argue on appeal that the trial court erred when it excluded predecree evidence because wife did not preserve an objection by making an offer of proof of the predecree evidence. However, although no offer of proof was made, the substance of the predecree evidence was apparent from the context of the wife's attorney's questions and the information was made a substantive part of the record at the time of the hearing through affidavits of a social worker and a licensed counselor. Therefore, it was proper for wife to assert on appeal that the trial court's exclusion of the predecree evidence was in error. In re Marriage of Johansen, 261 M 451, 863 P2d 407, 50 St. Rep. 1403 (1993).

Disallowance of Cumulative Character Evidence Not Reversible Error — Offer of Proof: Defendant was not allowed to impeach a witness directly through introduction of character evidence. Defendant was allowed to make an offer of proof, but he made no statement as to what facts were to be proved or that an alternative manner would be less objectionable. The evidence defendant attempted to present was cumulative in that it came out in various forms, directly and indirectly, throughout the trial after the witness testified. The exclusion of the character evidence affected no substantial right and was not reversible error. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

No Offer of Proof Made in Murder Trial: The defendant did not make an offer of proof before attempting to enter evidence demonstrating the witnesses' propensity for violence, use of drugs, and past acts of violent behavior for the purpose of showing the witnesses, not defendant, committed the murders. As no offer of proof of facts pointing directly to the guilt of the witnesses was made, the evidence properly was kept out. St. v. Bell, 225 M 83, 731 P2d 336, 44 St. Rep. 56 (1987).

Mere Allegations of Prejudice Insufficient to Satisfy Cumulative Error Doctrine: Defendant contended that the overall demeanor of the prosecution and the District Court, together with other alleged errors, required a reversal of his conviction; however, he articulated no particular comments or remarks and alleged no prejudice to his substantial rights. The Supreme Court has acknowledged the cumulative error doctrine, which is the accumulation of errors which prejudice a defendant's right to a fair trial, but noted that mere allegations of error without proof of prejudice are insufficient to satisfy the doctrine. The resolution of the alleged errors indicated no error meriting reversal of this case, and the court held that defendant failed to carry his burden of showing prejudice and declined to reverse his conviction on grounds of cumulative error. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004), St. v. Kearney, 2005 MT 171, 327 M 485, 115 P3d 214 (2005), and St. v. Hatfield, 2018 MT 229, 392 Mont. 509, 426 P.3d 569.

Evidence of Prior Accidents — No Offer of Proof — No Error: Evidence of prior accidents, while inadmissible for the purpose of proving negligence, is nevertheless admissible for the purpose of showing the existence of a danger or defect and notice thereof. Such evidence of prior accidents, however, must show situations substantially similar to or not too remote from the accident in question, although absolute identity of circumstances is not necessary. Here, where there was no offer of proof as to what the prior accidents would have shown, the Supreme Court could not determine admissibility, and therefore no reversible error was committed. Runkle v. Burlington N., 188 M 286, 613 P2d 982, 37 St. Rep. 995 (1980). See also Kissock v. Butte Convalescent Center, 1999 MT 322, 297 M 307, 992 P2d 1271, 56 St. Rep. 1288 (1999).

No Offer of Proof — No Record or Other Basis for Review: The defendant sought to introduce evidence he claimed was exculpatory and rehabilitating and that impeached testimony offered by the State. The State's objection to the evidence was sustained. On appeal, the court found nothing in the record to disclose the nature of the alleged impeaching testimony and no offer of proof was made. Absent this, the court had no basis for review. St. v. Hall, 183 M 511, 600 P2d 1180, 36 St. Rep. 1780 (1979).

No Offer of Proof at Trial — Effect on Appeal: The Supreme Court refused to review various documents attached to appellant's brief in an appeal pro se when no offer of proof was made at trial because, as such, they were not a part of the record on appeal. Jerome v. Jerome, 175 M 429, 574 P2d 997 (1978).

PLAIN ERROR

Assertion of Error in Alleged Comment on Post-Miranda Silence — No Doyle Violation: Clausell contended that the state violated his right to due process and privilege against self-incrimination by commenting on his silence after he received a Miranda warning, relying on Doyle v. Ohio, 426 US 610 (1976). The Supreme Court found that the issue was reviewable under the common-law plain error doctrine set out in St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996); however, the court found no Doyle violation in this case. Not only did the record fail to support Clausell's assertion that the prosecution commented on his post-Miranda silence, it also did not support his assertion that he was silent after he received Miranda warnings. In fact, between the time that they arrived at the hospital and the time of being arrested and given the warnings, Clausell gave five different accounts of how his girlfriend was injured. He had not received a Miranda warning prior to making any of the statements that the state referred to in arguments at trial. The Doyle rule is limited to instances in which the prosecution seeks to impeach a defendant's testimony based on silence after Miranda warnings are given, and no construction of Doyle could be read to preclude the state from comparing Clausell's voluntary, inconsistent statements. Clausell failed to establish any improper comment on his post-Miranda silence, and thus his constitutional rights were not violated by the state's comments at trial. St. v. Clausell, 2001 MT 62, 305 M 1, 22 P3d 111 (2001).

Jury Instruction Disallowing Evidence of Intoxication in Determining State of Mind Not Error — Full and Fair Instructions on Law: Following Raugust's criminal trial, the court instructed the jury that it could not consider evidence of intoxication for any purpose, pursuant to 45-2-203. Raugust maintained on appeal that the instruction was in error because depriving him of the ability to admit intoxication evidence lessened the state's burden of proof and confused the jury, in violation of his due process rights. However, the error urged on appeal was not contained in the objection made to the instruction during the final settling of jury instructions, constituting waiver of the argument on appeal. Moreover, the plain error doctrine did not apply because review under that doctrine was requested for the first time on appeal. Here, the jury was instructed regarding: (1) the elements of each offense charged and the state's burden of proving each element beyond a reasonable doubt; (2) the definition of the applicable mental states—purposely and knowingly; (3) the fact that the existence of a mental state may be inferred from the acts of the accused and from the facts and circumstances connected with the offense; (4) the difference between direct and circumstantial evidence; (5) witness credibility; and (6) the need for a unanimous verdict. Read as a whole, these instructions fairly and fully instructed the jury on the law applicable to the case, and giving the instruction disallowing the defense of intoxication was not erroneous. St. v. Raugust, 2000 MT 146, 300 M 54, 3 P3d 115, 57 St. Rep. 570 (2000). See also St. v. Hagen, 283 M 156, 939 P2d 994 (1997).

Impeachment Questioning on Defendant's Silence — Not Error: In a trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the District Court allowed the defendant to be cross-examined on statements that the defendant had voluntarily made to a police officer prior to arrest and on how the defendant's testimony at trial conflicted with those statements. The District Court did not err in allowing the state to use the defendant's silence regarding consensual sexual intercourse during the initial interrogation by police as evidence against the defendant at trial. St. v. Graves, 272 M 451, 901 P2d 549, 52 St. Rep. 755 (1995).

Incorrect Jury Instruction Requested — Plain Error Not Applied: In a civil rights action against a county and hospital, Buhr argued at trial that the deliberate indifference standard was the correct standard of care to apply to the defendants in the case and requested a jury instruction to that effect. During trial, Buhr discovered his error and, on appeal, argued for the first time that the correct standard to be applied in the case was the professional judgment standard. He further argued that the District Court erred in applying the deliberate indifference standard and that the Supreme Court should apply the plain error doctrine in order to reach the conclusion that the professional judgment standard applies to his civil rights claim. The Supreme Court refused to apply the plain error doctrine, noting that Buhr himself requested the jury instruction on deliberate indifference. Buhr v. Flathead County, 268 M 223, 886 P2d 381, 51 St. Rep. 1258 (1994).

Prosecutorial Comment on Defendant's Silence — Failure to Object — No Plain Error or Doyle Violation: There is no plain error or Doyle violation (Doyle v. Ohio 426 US 610, 49 L Ed 2d 91, 96 S Ct 2240 (1976)) when the defendant first focuses on the issue of his earlier silence in cross-examination of the state's witnesses, fails to object to the state's reference to the same silence for alleged improper purposes, and then for the first time on appeal, alleges that admission of such evidence constitutes plain reversible error. St. v. Sadowski, 247 M 63, 805 P2d 537, 48 St. Rep. 93 (1991).

Use of Expert Testimony to Identify Victim of Sexual Abuse — Not Plain Error: Defendant argued that even though no objection was made at trial, the admission of expert testimony indicating a child had been sexually abused was improper because it was not scientifically reliable and constituted plain error. However, defendant presented no evidence that the testimony was prejudicial as to his guilt or innocence or that the alleged error met any of the criteria of 46-20-701(2). Further, when expert testimony in child abuse cases has not been objected to at trial as improper, the Supreme Court will not entertain the issue on appeal. St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111, 47 St. Rep. 1143 (1990), following St. v. Eiler, 234 M 38, 762 P2d 210 (1988).

Anonymous Tip — Hearsay — Plain Error: In the prosecution of defendant for conspiracy to commit arson and attempted criminal mischief, admission of the contents of an anonymous tip was error as the tip was hearsay. However, because defendant did not object to admission of the tip at trial, the inquiry of whether admission constituted reversible error extends only to determining whether the admission was plain error affecting substantial rights of the defendant under Rule 103, M.R.E. St. v. Cain, 220 M 509, 717 P2d 15, 43 St. Rep. 568 (1986).

Violation of Order Granting Motion In Limine: The "plain error" rule does not apply when only nonsubstantial rights of appellant are affected by testimony entered in violation of a motion in limine. St. v. Libs, 218 M 124, 706 P2d 500, 42 St. Rep. 1453 (1985).

Prosecution Comments on Witnesses in Opening and Closing — No Objection — No Effect on Substantial Rights: The prosecution in opening and closing made comments on the truthfulness and credibility of witnesses and other matters not related to the defendant's right not to testify. A lack of objection does not preclude consideration in the trial court of error that affects the defendant's substantial rights, but these matters were subject to free comment to the jury under the circumstances of this case and thus did not affect substantial rights of the defendant. St. v. Harris, 209 M 511, 682 P2d 159, 41 St. Rep. 856 (1984).

Plain Error Doctrine — Strictly Construed: Plaintiffs brought suit for personal injuries arising out of an automobile accident. Defendant's attorney obtained a motion in limine to prevent mention of insurance matters during trial. The jury returned a verdict awarding plaintiffs $5,000. Plaintiffs moved for a new trial, alleging inflammatory remarks by defense counsel during closing arguments, allegedly violating the motion in limine. No objections were made, no request for an admonition by the court was made, and no corrective jury instruction was requested. Plaintiffs contended they were entitled to a new trial under the "plain error doctrine". The Supreme Court was not sympathetic to a broad definition of "substantial rights" that must be impaired in order to apply the "plain error doctrine". The court stated that "plain error" generally involves an act or omission of a more serious nature than "reversible error", and only on rare occasion is it invoked in civil cases. The application of the "plain error doctrine" to cases where failure or refusal to raise the issue involved at the trial level was conscious on the part of trial counsel would so liberalize the doctrine as to effectively negate the substance of the remainder of Rule 103. The time and place for objecting to unwarranted references to insurance are during trial. Reno v. Erickstein, 209 M 36, 679 P2d 1204, 41 St. Rep. 537 (1984), followed in Cosner v. Nagler, 249 M 253, 813 P2d 989, 48 St. Rep. 652 (1991), Geiger v. Sherrill, Inc., 262 M 505, 866 P2d 1106, 50 St. Rep. 1661 (1993), and Guertin v. Moody's Mkt., Inc., 265 M 61, 874 P2d 710, 51 St. Rep. 407 (1994).

"Plain Error" — Appellable Though No Objection Made: In adopting the "plain error" doctrine, appellate courts have a duty to determine whether the parties before them have been denied substantial justice by the trial court, and when that has occurred, they can, within sound discretion, consider whether the trial court has deprived a litigant of a fair and impartial trial, even though no objection was made to the conduct during the trial. Such was the case when appellant was denied his day in court by the trial judge's recess and failure to reconvene. Halldorson v. Halldorson, 175 M 170, 573 P2d 149 (1977). See also Zimmerman v. Boseman Prod. Credit Ass'n, 233 M 156, 759 P2d 166, 45 St. Rep. 1387 (1988).

GENERAL

Sidebar Conversations on Evidentiary Matters Not Recorded — No Abuse of Discretion: During a civil trial involving the death of a man killed by a police officer, the District Court held several sidebar conferences on objections lodged by both parties. Most of the conversations were off the record, with only the District Court's ruling on the objections being recorded. On appeal, the estate argued that these sidebar conversations were so numerous as to deprive it of a fair trial and constituted fundamental, structural error. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by failing to record all sidebar discussions of evidentiary objections because its rationale for holding off-the-record sidebars was supported by Rule 103, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). In re Estate of Frazier, 2021 MT 85, 404 Mont. 1, 484 P.3d 912.

Revocation Hearing — Report of Violation by Former Probation Officer, Not Present at Hearing — No Abuse of Discretion: At the defendant's revocation hearing, his current probation officer testified to the contents of a report of violation issued by his former probation officer, who did not testify. Following his revocation, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court had violated his sixth amendment right to confront the former probation officer. The Supreme Court disagreed, emphasizing that revocation hearings are not subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence. Accordingly, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the use of documentary evidence, such as the report, did not violate due process. St. v. Ferret, 2020 MT 264, 401 Mont. 538, 474 P.3d 811.

Excluding Cross-Examination of Witness Regarding Prior Inconsistent Statements — Abuse of Discretion: The District Court abused its discretion when it ruled that the plaintiff's counsel could not impeach a witness through cross-examination because the plaintiff was entitled under Rule 613, M.R.Ev., to cross-examine the witness about her prior inconsistent statements and a related motion in limine did not restrict such cross-examination. The District Court's error affected the outcome of the case and materially affected the plaintiff's right to a fair trial. Maier v. Wilson, 2017 MT 316, 380 Mont. 43, 409 P.3d 873.

Relevance — Exclusion of Collateral Evidence Proper — Not Related to Central Issue in Case: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence proffered by the defendant to rebut the plaintiff's breach of contract and damages claims. Allowing the defendant to introduce evidence regarding the plaintiff's business dealings with other businesses would have consumed a substantial amount of time, led to a mini-trial about issues collateral to the case, confused the issues, and was not relevant to the central issues in the case. Additionally, despite the exclusion of some of the defendant's proffered evidence, the defendant was able to present a defense that the plaintiff lost business from other parties because of the plaintiff's own failings and not because of the defendant's actions. S & P Brake Supply, Inc. v. STEMCO LP, 2016 MT 324, 385 Mont. 488, 385 P.3d 567.

Abuse of Discretion in Admitting Report of Three Nontestifying Doctors: The admission of the report of a panel of three doctors without opportunity for cross-examination affected the outcome of the trial and affected a substantial right of the plaintiff, justifying a new trial. Reese v. Stanton, 2015 MT 233, 381 Mont. 241, 368 P.3d 208.

Admission of Medical Records to Determine Whether Material Misrepresentation Made on Application — No Prejudice: When applying for credit life insurance, plaintiff's husband, Clarence, indicated that he was in good health. Less than 1 year later, Clarence died, and plaintiff submitted an insurance claim, but the claim was denied and the policy was rescinded, so plaintiff sued. At trial, the District Court admitted Clarence's medical records. Plaintiff argued that the records were allowed without foundation showing that the records existed when Clarence applied for the insurance or that the records were relied on by the parties. The court concluded that it was for the jury to decide whether Clarence made a material misrepresentation that would justify defendant's action in denying the claim and rescinding the policy. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court did not act arbitrarily or exceed the bounds of reason in admitting the records for jury inspection and that plaintiff failed to identify any prejudicial information in the records or show how introduction of the records harmed the case. Williams v. Union Fidelity Life Ins. Co., 2006 MT 273, 329 M 158, 123 P.3d 223 (2006). See also Lopez v. Josephson, 2004 MT 133, 306 M 446, 30 P.3d 326 (2001).

Evidence Related to Plaintiff's Bankruptcy Properly Precluded From Trial Regarding Plaintiff's Purchase of Credit Life Insurance: When Clarence and Barbara purchased a vehicle, the dealer offered credit life insurance as part of the transaction. Clarence died within 1 year of the purchase, but the insurer denied a life insurance claim and rescinded the policy. Barbara sued the insurer for fraud and bad faith. At trial, defendant sought to introduce evidence regarding plaintiff's bankruptcy, but the trial court granted Barbara's motion in limine excluding the bankruptcy evidence, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court found no evidence that the trial court acted arbitrarily or exceeded the bounds of reason in granting the motion in limine, and the trial court was affirmed. Williams v. Union Fidelity Life Ins. Co., 2005 MT 273, 329 M 158, 123 P3d 213 (2005). See also Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001).

Failure to Notify Defendant of State's Intent to Use Evidence of Alleged Violations at Probation Revocation Hearing Considered Due Process Violation — Harmless Error: At a hearing on the revocation of Pedersen's suspended sentence, the District Court allowed the state to introduce drug test results, even though drug use was not alleged prior to the hearing. Pedersen asserted that the failure to notify him that the drug test results would be used was a due process violation. The Supreme Court agreed. Even though a revocation hearing is not subject to the Montana Rules of Evidence, the hearing must be fundamentally fair, and minimum due process rights, including notice, extend to a revocation hearing. Thus, because Pedersen was not notified in advance, the District Court erred in admitting the drug test results. However, the error was harmless. The District Court's findings did not reference the drug test results, nor did the court rely on the results in revoking the suspended sentence, relying instead on the abundant evidence of Pedersen's violation of four other probation conditions. Therefore, the Supreme Court affirmed the sentence revocation. St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003), distinguished in St. v. Sebastian, 2013 MT 347, 372 Mont. 522, 313 P.3d 198. See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299 (1987).

No Requirement to Bifurcate Revocation Hearing Into Evidentiary and Dispositional Phases: Pedersen contended that he was entitled to a bifurcated sentence revocation hearing, with the evidentiary and dispositional phases separated into two distinct hearings, and that the only proper time for introducing and rebutting evidence was during the evidentiary phase of the hearing. However, Pedersen cited no authority for the bifurcation proposition, and the Supreme Court declined to adopt it. The District Court has wide latitude to control courtroom proceedings, and it was not an abuse of the court's discretion to allow the state to present evidence during the dispositional phase, rather than divide the hearing into distinct proceedings for evidentiary purposes. St. v. Pedersen, 2003 MT 315, 318 M 262, 80 P3d 79 (2003).

Introduction of Evidence of Acts Not Referred to in Pretrial Order — Not Grounds for New Trial: As a result of a dispute, the relationship between neighbors Lopez, Monroe, and Josephson deteriorated until assault charges were filed against Josephson. The operative contentions in the pretrial order were that Josephson assaulted Lopez by pointing a firearm at Lopez's face and assaulted Monroe verbally and fired a weapon toward Monroe's property. The District Court found it impossible to determine from the allegations the dates, times, and places that the alleged assaults took place, but the court concluded that the pretrial order nevertheless placed Josephson on notice that he was being accused of assault on multiple occasions over an unspecified period of time. Josephson moved for a new trial on grounds that plaintiffs were improperly allowed to introduce evidence of acts not referred to in the pretrial order, evidence of bad character, and evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts. However, because Josephson waited until the day of trial to clarify which assaults formed the basis of the case against him, rather than using available pretrial motions and rules of discovery, the District Court was not found to have abused its discretion in giving plaintiffs latitude in their proof of the various assaults at trial, including allowing evidence of bad character to impeach Josephson's testimony. The District Court did properly preclude evidence of assaults by Josephson on nonparty persons. Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001).

Lower Court's Admission of Testimony Regarding Ownership of Cattle Prod as Rebuttal Evidence Proper: Hart argued that the lower court should not have allowed the state to introduce rebuttal evidence concerning his ownership of a cattle prod allegedly used by him during an assault because the issue of ownership was first raised during the state's cross-examination of him and not during his direct testimony. The Supreme Court ruled that although rebuttal testimony may not be used to introduce new matters, Hart had raised the issue of ownership of the cattle prod during his direct testimony when he testified that he had seen the cattle prod previously in the victim's house and believed that she used it to train her dogs. Therefore, the state could present rebuttal evidence showing that the cattle prod belonged to Hart. St. v. Hart, 2000 MT 332, 303 M 71, 15 P3d 917, 57 St. Rep. 1398 (2000).

Improper Argument Concerning Witness Not Called Not Requiring Reversal: Moralli sued Lake County for a back injury that resulted from slipping and falling in the Lake County jail. During the closing argument at trial, Moralli's counsel commented upon the failure of the county to call the jailer as a witness, saying that the jailer's testimony would have hurt the county badly. Upon objection by the county, the District Court gave a curative instruction, admonishing the jury that it could not consider what the jailer might or might not say. The Supreme Court held that the argument was less prejudicial than the argument based upon excluded testimony considered by the Supreme Court in Gunnels v. Hoyt, 194 M 265, 633 P2d 1187 (1981). As in Gunnels, the Supreme Court held that the argument was improper but was not so prejudicial that it could not be cured by the District Court's instruction to the jury. Moralli v. Lake County, 255 M 23, 839 P2d 1287, 49 St. Rep. 872 (1992). However, see Harne v. Deadmond, 1998 MT 22, 287 M 255, 954 P2d 732, 55 St. Rep. 80 (1998).

Defendant's Difficulty With English Not Sufficient to Suppress Statements Made to Arresting Officer: The defendant was arrested at the scene of a burglary. During the trial, he moved to suppress statements made to the arresting officer on the basis that he did not have an adequate understanding of English. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that nothing in the record reflected an inadequate understanding on the defendant's part. St. v. Higareda, 238 M 130, 777 P2d 302, 46 St. Rep. 1146 (1989).

Negligent Suppression of Evidence — Harmless Error: In an appeal involving the negligent suppression of evidence, the court agreed with appellant that the state acted improperly in suppressing four taped witness statements during discovery and a possibly incriminating statement made by appellant during his arrest and in endorsing an additional witness on the first day of trial. However, the court found that the suppressed evidence was either repetitive of other testimony or minimally supportive of a self-defense theory, and that since the defense knew of the additional witness' connection with and importance in the case, it could not convincingly claim surprise at the endorsement. Therefore, all errors were held to be harmless and not grounds for reversal. St. v. Wallace, 223 M 454, 727 P2d 520, 43 St. Rep. 1908 (1986), followed, with regard to application of the harmless error rule to admissibility of hearsay testimony, in St. v. Alexander, 265 M 192, 875 P2d 345, 51 St. Rep. 474 (1994).

Excluded Documents Never Offered and Refused as Exhibits — Refusal to Consider on Appeal — Admonishment for Attaching to Appeal Brief: Medical documents that were excluded as evidence but were never offered as exhibits at trial and thus were not in the record as refused exhibits were included as part of an appendix to the defendant's appeal brief. The Supreme Court held that it was unable to evaluate or rule on the admissibility of documents that were never offered into evidence or described in the record and admonished counsel for attaching extraneous material to briefs as an attempt to introduce evidence through the "back door". Garza v. Peppard, 222 M 244, 722 P2d 610, 43 St. Rep. 1233 (1986), followed in Murphy v. St., 248 M 82, 809 P2d 16, 48 St. Rep. 335 (1991).

Evidence of Nonprosecution for Arson in Applying Valued Policy Statute: An insurer objected to closing arguments on the ground that evidence of nonprosecution for arson in cases for insurance proceeds was not admissible. The issue arose because of the provision in 33-24-102 which provides that the valued policy law applies without criminal fault on the part of the insured. The Supreme Court held that it was pertinent to the insured's case that the jury, in considering whether 33-24-102 was applicable, should also have known whether the insured was without criminal fault; otherwise, under its terms, the statute would not apply. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Motion In Limine to Exclude Documents and Testimony — General Testimony on Same Subject Allowed — No Effect on Substantial Rights of Defendant: A homicide defendant claimed error because the District Court granted the State a motion in limine refusing the introduction of specific documentary and testimonial evidence relating to an earlier incident involving the defendant and the victim that could have established the defendant's frame of mind relevant to self-defense in the homicide. The Supreme Court held that the refusal to admit such evidence did not affect substantial rights of the defendant because general testimony was admitted establishing that the incident occurred and what its general outcome was. St. v. Daniels, 210 M 1, 682 P2d 173, 41 St. Rep. 880 (1984).

Credibility of Probationer: Defendant's assertion that admission in probation revocation hearing of inadmissible probation violations had a detrimental impact on his credibility was pure fantasy. The record on appeal disclosed that if anything affected his credibility, it was his own testimony and that of his alibi witnesses that he was not present at the time and place of the alleged assault on his mother-in-law (one of the bases for petition for probation revocation) in the face of her positive identification of him as her assailant. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981).

Evidence of Offenses Not Charged — Probation Revocation: Admission in evidence, in probation revocation hearing, of alleged probation violations not contained in the petition to revoke was error, but it did not affect defendant's substantial rights and must be disregarded where two of the alleged violations were not made a basis of revocation of probation and, although the third was, the State introduced no evidence on the matter and all evidence on it was introduced by defendant. Defendant could not predicate reversible error on testimony he himself introduced. St. v. Steffans, 195 M 395, 636 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 1976 (1981). See also St. v. Nelson, 225 M 215, 731 P2d 1299, 44 St. Rep. 181 (1987).

Counsel's Remarks Concerning Evidence Not Given: The Supreme Court held that the defense counsel's remarks about the failure of the plaintiff to call his doctor to testify or to provide the doctor's records did not constitute misconduct amounting to reversible error. Gunnels v. Hoyt, 194 M 265, 633 P2d 1187, 38 St. Rep. 1492 (1981). See also Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989).

Admission of Irrelevant Evidence — No Effect on Substantial Rights: In a trial for a decree of divorce in which the only issue was the disposition of the family home, the court admitted evidence concerning bank deposits and checks. As the evidence admitted had nothing to do with the issue at trial, it cannot serve as a basis for error; no error exists for appeal unless a substantial right of the objecting party has been affected. In re Schwartz v. Schwartz, 184 M 178, 602 P2d 175, 36 St. Rep. 1980 (1979), followed in Funk v. Robbin, 212 M 437, 689 P2d 1215, 41 St. Rep. 1848 (1984).

Attempted Admission — Not Grounds for Reversal: The fact that State was unable to lay a proper foundation for the admission of items into evidence, which were not irrelevant or otherwise inadmissible in an essential way, did not require reversal of defendant's conviction on the ground their attempted admission was prejudicial. St. v. Larson, 175 M 395, 574 P2d 266 (1978).

Rule 104. Preliminary questions of admissibility.

Commission Comments

(a) Questions of admissibility generally. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 104(a) except that "subject to the provisions of subdivision (b)" is deleted because of a change in that subdivision. The Commission adopted this provision because of its common-sense approach to the problem of whether the judge or jury should determine such preliminary questions and because it is consistent with the practice in Montana. Section 93-2501-2, R.C.M. 1947 [25-7-102 and 26-1-201, amended 1983], states: "All questions of law, including the admissibility of testimony, the facts preliminary to such admission,...and other rules of evidence, are to be decided by the court...."

Montana cases have followed this statute, and two in particular provide detailed procedure to be followed in using this provision. State v. Newman, 66 Mont. 180, 185, 213 P 805 (1922) on the existence of a privilege; State v. Kacar, 74 Mont. 269, 280, 240 P 365 (1925) on the admissibility of a dying declaration; and Union Interchange, Inc. v. Parker, 138 Mont. 348, 355, 357 P2d 339 (1960) one of the latest cases.

The last sentence of this subdivision, providing for the suspension of the rules except for those with respect to privilege, is adopted for practical reasons: When the judge is determining these preliminary matters he must be able to view potentially inadmissible evidence in order to determine whether it can be admitted. It is not clear whether this part of the rule is consistent with existing Montana law. Section 93-2501-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], states that in the determination of facts in nonjury trials by the the court, the law of evidence is applicable; however, it does not state whether the law of evidence is applicable when the court determines questions of law, such as those under this rule. The final phrase in this sentence, applying rules of privilege in preliminary questions, means that the substance of a privileged communication will be protected, but all other rules of evidence will not apply in the determination of the existence of that privilege. Holding the substance of a privilege inviolate is consistent with Section 93-701-4, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-801], and Montana Rule 101(b).

(b) Admissibility subject to a condition. This subdivision is original and therefore entirely different from either Federal or Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 104(b). The Commission rejected those rules on relevancy conditioned on fact because they were impractical and inconsistent with Montana law. The Federal and Uniform Rule calls for a determination of the relevancy of an item by the jury when its relevance depends upon the existence of a preliminary fact. The impracticality of the rule arises when an attempt is made to apply it to various situations. The originator of the term, Morgan, in Basic Problems in Evidence 45-46 (1962), gives examples of entirely different situations than are given by the Advisory Committee in its Note to Federal Rule 104(b) at 46 F.R.D. 161, 189. As shown by the Commission Notes to Montana Rule 104(a), Montana law clearly has no provision for the jury to determine any preliminary questions. The policy behind Federal and Uniform Rule 104(b) is to allow the jury to decide questions similar to other questions of fact which it is capable of making, especially where none of the exclusionary rules of competence apply. Advisory Committee Note to the Federal Rule, supra at 190. The Commission feels that current Montana law should not be rejected on such policy grounds, particularly where the result is potentially confusing and impractical.

The rule adopted is the common practice in Montana allowing evidence to be introduced subject to the condition that it be connected up. Montana has apparently always allowed this practice. State ex rel. Felker, 27 Mont. 451, 459, 71 P. 668 (1903); Risken v. N. Pac. Ry., 137 Mont. 57, 70, 350 P2d 831 (1960). The phrase "except as otherwise provided by law" is included to prevent a misinterpretation of the rule which could allow evidence to be introduced with a promise to connect but without sufficient foundation; this would be clearly contrary to existing Montana law. Examples of situations which require that foundation evidence be introduced first are: the best evidence rule under Section 93-1101-9, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]; authentication of writings under Section 93-801-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], (business records), Section 93-901-1, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], (official reports), Sections 93-1001-17, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], -18 [superseded], and -30 [superseded], (public writings), and Sections 93-1101-12, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and -19 [superseded], (private writings); use of prior inconsistent statements under Section 93-1901-12, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]; refreshing memory from notes under Section 93-1901-6, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]; relevancy of material objects under Section 93-1201-1, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]; and qualification of expert witnesses and of lay witnesses in certain situations under Section 93-401-27(9), R.C.M. 1947 [superseded].

The final sentence is added to insure that the court retains its control over the parties' introduction of evidence under this rule. This is consistent with R.C.M. 1947 Sections 93-1901-1 [superseded], and 95-1910 [46-16-401] and case law. Exchange State Bank v. Occident Elevator Co., 95 Mont. 78, 91, 24 P2d 126 (1933); State v. Jensen, 153 Mont. 233, 237, 455 P2d 63 (1969); Spurgeon v. Imperial Elevator Co., 99 Mont. 432, 438, 43 P2d 891 (1935) and cases cited therein. Especially important is that the evidence is capable of being connected up. State v. Simanton, 100 Mont. 292, 309, 49 P2d 981 (1935). It may also be noted that Montana follows the majority rule and requires that when evidence is not connected up, it is the duty of counsel to object and make a motion to strike as soon as it is apparent. State v. Simanton, supra at 305 and Pfau v. Stokke, 110 Mont. 471, 474, 103 P2d 673 (1940).

(c) Hearing of jury. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 104(c). The rule was adopted because it expresses good policy and is generally consistent with Montana law. Having hearings on the admissibility of confessions outside the presence of the jury is consistent with the provisions of Section 95-1805, R.C.M. 1947 [46-13-301]. Hearings on other matters may or may not be conducted within the hearing of the jury, depending upon the nature of the matter; therefore, leaving this to the discretion of the court is the most practical solution to the problem and also current practice. The final part of this subdivision, allowing the accused in a criminal trial to request a hearing outside the presence of the jury when he is a witness, encourages testimony and prevents claims of prejudice.

(d) Testimony by accused. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 104(d). The rule was adopted because it expresses good policy, like that of subdivision (c), in encouraging the accused to testify in such preliminary matters, so that the admissibility of evidence is more easily determined. While there is no Montana law specifically dealing with this subdivision, the Commission does not intend to change the rule expressed in State v. Rogers, 31 Mont. 1, 7, 77 P 293 (1904) and State v. Smith, 57 Mont. 349, 359, 188 P 644 (1920) allowing a "wide latitude of cross-examination" when the accused testifies on his own behalf and "denies that he committed the crime for which he is on trial".

(e) Weight and credibility. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 104(e). It was adopted because it is consistent with Montana law and clarifies a potential misinterpretation of subdivision (a) of this rule. The misinterpretation could arise because of the similarity between evidence which may be preliminary to admissibility and that related to weight or credibility; the rule simply clarifies this situation. Sections 93-401-4, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-302], and 93-2001-1, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-203], respectively, have long provided the rule in Montana that the jury is the sole judge of credibility and weight, and therefore the rule is consistent with Montana law in allowing a party to introduce such evidence.

ADMISSIBILITY OF EVIDENCE

Mere Mentions of Witness and Witness’s Affidavit Insufficient to Introduce Testimony: The defendants in a deficiency action attached an affidavit by an expert to their pleadings valuing the defaulted property. Subsequently at trial, the plaintiff mentioned that the expert was expected to testify, although ultimately he did not testify, and mentioned the expert’s work during cross-examination. However, this did not introduce the expert’s testimony into evidence, and the District Court erred by improperly considering the expert’s report in its valuation of the property. Whitefish Credit Union v. Prindiville, 2015 MT 328, 381 Mont. 443, 362 P.3d 53.

Class Certification — Traditional Rules of Evidence Not Required: A District Court’s inquiry into a motion for class certification is tentative, preliminary, and limited to a determination of only whether the litigation may be conducted on a class basis. The decision to certify a class is not a conclusive judgment on the merits of the case and is not accompanied by the traditional rules and procedure applicable to civil trials. Consequently, evidence considered for the purpose of class certification need not be in trial-admissible form. Jacobsen v. Allstate Ins. Co., 2013 MT 244, 371 Mont. 393, 310 P.3d 452.

Causation — Traditional Evidentiary Consideration Given to Rebuttal Evidence Establishing Preexisting Injuries: When a defendant seeks to submit evidence of other injuries to negate causation, traditional evidentiary considerations are applied as opposed to evidence establishing a reasonable medical probability that the injury is divisible. Cheff v. BNSF Ry. Co., 2010 MT 235, 358 Mont. 144, 243 P.3d 1115.

Proper Admission of Evidence of Preexisting Conditions in Suit for Damages From Auto Accident — Denial of Judgment as Matter of Law on Causation Affirmed: The District Court limited but did not preclude defendant’s admission of evidence of plaintiff’s preexisting conditions in a case following an auto accident that injured plaintiff. Following admission of the evidence, plaintiff contended that defendant failed to prove preexisting conditions and moved for judgment as a matter of law on the issue of causation, but the trial court denied the motion and allowed the issue to go to the jury. On appeal, plaintiff contended that the trial court erred in allowing the evidence and in denying the motion for judgment. The Supreme Court affirmed the trial court’s holding that plaintiff’s preexisting head, cervical, and lumbar injuries, chronic pain, and depression were similar if not identical to the types of injuries attributed by plaintiff to the accident. The evidence was relevant and properly admitted. Because the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the evidence, denial of plaintiff’s motion for judgment was also proper, correctly leaving the causation issue to the jury. Clark v. Bell, 2009 MT 390, 353 M 331, 220 P3d 650 (2009). See also Truman v. District Court, 2003 MT 91, 315 M 165, 68 P3d 654 (2003), and Ele v. Ehnes, 2003 MT 131, 316 M 69, 68 P3d 835 (2003).

Admission of Exhibits Not Exchanged Prior to Trial — No Abuse of Discretion: Defendant claimed that the trial court erred in admitting exhibits that were not exchanged prior to trial. The Supreme Court disagreed. The exhibits were public records accessible to all parties prior to trial and could have been admitted during expert testimony, although it would have taken more time. Defendant was also allowed to introduce an unexchanged exhibit later in the trial. The admissibility of the exhibits was within the sound discretion of the trial court, and that discretion was not abused. Roe Family, LLC v. Lincoln County Bd. of Comm’rs, 2008 MT 70, 342 M 108, 179 P3d 514 (2008).

Child Incest Victim's Testimony Not Tainted by Interview Technique — Directed Verdict Denied: Following Gardner's incest conviction, he moved for a directed verdict, attacking the victim's credibility, criticizing the police investigation, and asserting that no medical evidence existed to support sexual abuse. The motion was denied, and Gardner appealed. A directed verdict of acquittal is appropriate only when there is no evidence to support a guilty verdict. Although not required, the District Court conducted a taint hearing to determine whether the child's testimony was rendered irremediably unreliable by the investigative process and determined that it was not. The court also heard testimony that no custody issues existed that may have motivated the mother to coax an adverse statement from the child about her father. The motion for a directed verdict was properly denied. On the issue of medical evidence, the Supreme Court noted that a conviction for a sex offense may be based entirely on uncorroborated evidence of the victim, even if the victim is a child, and that the credibility and weight of witness testimony are determined by the trier of fact. In this case, Gardner's allegations in conflict with his daughter's testimony constituted questions for the trier of fact, which the jury resolved against Gardner. Viewed in a light most favorable to the prosecution, a rational jury could have found the essential elements of incest beyond a reasonable doubt. The Supreme Court affirmed. St. v. Gardner, 2003 MT 338, 318 M 436, 80 P3d 1262 (2003), followed, with regard to allowing a conviction for a sex offense based entirely on the testimony of the child victim, in St. v. Skinner, 2007 MT 175, 338 M 197, 163 P3d 399 (2007).

Rule of Law Regarding Admissibility of Evidence of Subsequent Accident With Nonparty — Defendant's Burden to Show That Damages Divisible and Apportionment Proper: Following Truman's injury in an automobile accident, she was involved in a second automobile accident and in an accident involving an ultralight aircraft. The District Court held that evidence of Truman's injuries in the second automobile accident and the aircraft accident would be admissible in a trial related to the first automobile accident to disprove causation. After accepting supervisory control, the Supreme Court relied on an analogous situation in Azure v. Billings, 182 M 234, 596 P2d 460 (1979), holding that once a plaintiff presents a prima facie case that the defendant's conduct contributed as a cause of injury, the burden shifts to the defendant to prove that the injury is divisible. A defendant is permitted to submit relevant evidence of subsequent accidents to negate allegations that the defendant is the cause or sole cause of the injury, but the defendant may not attempt to apportion fault to the conduct of a nonparty because assignment of liability to a nonparty without affording that party the opportunity to defend against liability risks an unreliable and disproportionate assignment of liability and places the burden of defending the nonparty on the plaintiff. In this case, plaintiff must prove that defendant's conduct contributed as a substantial factor to the damages, but need not prove the extent to which defendant is responsible. If defendant proves by a reasonable medical probability that the injury is divisible and that defendant is responsible for only a portion of the damages, the jury may reduce defendant's obligation by the portion of damages for which it is proved that defendant is not responsible. However, if the injury is indivisible and evidence does not permit an apportionment, then defendant is liable for the entire damage. Truman v. District Court, 2003 MT 91, 315 M 165, 68 P3d 654 (2003), followed in Olson v. Shumaker Trucking & Excavating Contractors, Inc., 2008 MT 378, 347 M 1, 196 P3d 1265 (2008), and distinguished in Cheff v. BNSF Ry. Co., 2010 MT 235, 358 Mont. 144, 243 P.3d 1115.

Admissibility of Preliminary Alcohol Screening Test Results — Administrative Rule Limiting Test Results to Probable Cause Evidence Superseded — Proper Foundation for Use of Training Manual as Model for Screening Test: Harrington raised several objections concerning the use of results from a preliminary alcohol screening test (PAST) at trial, contending first that the PAST results should have been excluded because ARM 23.4.201(7)(b) (before 2002 amendment) allows PAST results to be considered as probable cause evidence only. The Supreme Court noted that the 1997 Legislature amended 61-8-404 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) to allow admission of a report of a blood or breath test if a breath test or PAST was performed by a person certified by the Forensic Sciences Division of the Department of Justice. The administrative rule was inconsistent with the statute, and the statute prevailed, so the PAST results could not be disallowed pursuant to the rule. Harrington also argued that a proper foundation was not laid for admission of the PAST results. The Supreme Court disagreed. The arresting officer testified that the specific make and model of equipment used for Harrington's PAST was on the approved list in the training manual distributed by the Department and that the equipment was field tested prior to use. It was within the trial court's discretion to consider the training manual pursuant to this rule in determining whether an adequate foundation existed for introduction of the PAST results. Columbus v. Harrington, 2001 MT 258, 307 M 215, 36 P3d 937 (2001).

“Were They Lying” Questions to Defendant Not Categorically Improper: Hart argued that the lower court erred in allowing the prosecutor to ask him if other witnesses had lied when they testified that Hart owned the cattle prod used in an alleged assault after he had testified that the prod belonged to the victim. The Supreme Court held that it was declining to follow the line of cases that held “were they lying” questions were always proper or the line of cases that held that they were always improper. The Supreme Court stated that the admissibility of “were they lying” questions was discretionary with the trial court. In the instant case, the questions were proper because the case came down to whether the jury believed the defendant or the victim and the other eyewitnesses. Therefore, the prosecutor’s asking Hart if the other witnesses lied helped focus the jury’s attention on the central issue of the case. St. v. Hart, 2000 MT 332, 303 M 71, 15 P3d 917, 57 St. Rep. 1398 (2000).

Error in Exclusion of Evidence of Stress-Provoking Event Other Than Accident in Determining Loss of Established Course of Life: Maurer was injured in a car accident, after which he was depressed. This depression led him to leave the family ranch and contributed to his “course of life” damages. Defendants should have been allowed to introduce evidence of another stress-provoking incident that occurred about the same time and could have contributed to Maurer’s depression. The incident involved the injury of Maurer’s girlfriend, criminal charges against Maurer, and his subsequent trial and acquittal on felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charges. The link between the incident and Maurer’s depression was self-evident, and the jury should have been allowed to consider evidence of the incident from a common sense viewpoint to determine to what degree, if any, the stress from the incident contributed to Maurer’s loss of established course of life. The probative value of evidence of the incident was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial nature. Maurer v. Clausen Distrib. Co., 275 M 229, 912 P2d 195, 53 St. Rep. 78 (1996).

Admissibility of Coconspirator’s Statements — Independent Evidence Required: Before statements of a coconspirator may be admitted, the existence of a conspiracy must be shown by a preponderance of the evidence, independent and exclusive of the coconspirator’s statement itself. The existence of a conspiracy can be shown by circumstantial evidence. Further, the admissibility determination must be made prior to the introduction of the alleged coconspirator’s statement. St. v. Stever, 225 M 336, 732 P2d 853, 44 St. Rep. 283 (1987).

Prima Facie Case Showing No Substantial Change in Evidence — Attack of Chain of Evidence at Trial: Defendant questioned whether evidence was properly admitted without the state’s establishing a proper chain of evidence. Extensive testimony chronicled the labeling, storing, securing, transferring of possession, and testing of each exhibit. The state made a prima facie case showing that there had been no substantial change in the evidence, and defendant failed to produce any evidence to show if actual or even potential tampering could have occurred. Additionally, defendant vigorously attacked the chain of evidence at trial; thus, the jury had an opportunity to weigh this evidence. The Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Consent to Search — Voluntariness — Totality of the Circumstances Test: Defendant voluntarily went to the Billings Police Department in connection with a homicide investigation. It later came out that defendant had serious mental and drug abuse problems. Defendant was interrogated by two police officers. He was kept incommunicado in a small room for several hours, the officers used the “mean cop-nice cop” interrogation technique, and the officers lied to defendant about how much was known of his involvement in the crime (guilt assumption technique). The officers told defendant his problems might be mental or medical rather than criminal. Defendant then gave written consent to search his house and van. The police then brought in a psychiatrist who administered sodium amytal to defendant. The next day defendant was convinced by the psychiatrist to confess. The District Court suppressed evidence found during the search, ruling that the consent was involuntarily given. The question of voluntariness largely depends upon the facts of each case, no single fact being dispositive. The determination of voluntariness, rather, depends upon the “totality of the circumstances”. The issue of voluntariness is a factual one addressed to the discretion of the trial court and will not be disturbed if supported by substantial credible evidence. The totality of the circumstances in the present case includes not only the police techniques employed, which were particularly coercive, but also the testimony presented by experts that defendant was a paranoid schizophrenic with severe drug problems. There can be no doubt that substantial evidence exists to support the suppression finding. St. v. Allies, 190 M 475, 621 P2d 1080, 37 St. Rep. 2089 (1980).

Evidence of Inseparably Related Crime Not Inadmissible Evidence of “Other Crimes”: A defendant appealed his conviction for theft of a truck. The sole issue on appeal was whether the trial court erred in denying the defendant's motion to prohibit reference at trial to his use of the truckowner's credit cards, which were stored in the truck. Use of "other crimes" evidence requires notice to the defendant. The reviewing court, however, said that the evidence of the defendant's possession and use of the credit cards was not "other crimes" evidence. Because the wallet with the credit cards was in the truck when the truck was stolen, the evidence of the defendant's possession and use of a credit card was inseparably related to the truck theft. The acts of misconduct were simultaneous. The use of the credit card evidence was not unfair surprise or an unrelated issue. So, although the general rule is that when a defendant is tried for one offense he should be convicted, if at all, by evidence which shows that he is guilty of that offense alone, the evidence of the possession of the victim's credit cards was not "wholly independent" or "other crimes" evidence. Accordingly, the evidence was admissible under the facts of this case, and no error was committed by the trial court. St. v. Trombley, 190 M 218, 620 P2d 367, 37 St. Rep. 1871 (1980).

Photographs Relevant as Demonstrative Evidence: In a wrongful death action in which the decedent's surviving spouse brought suit against the state and its contractor for negligently failing to warn the decedent of an abrupt edge at the shoulder of a highway construction project, the court abused its discretion in refusing to admit into evidence for demonstrative purposes photographs showing the proper use of an "abrupt edge" sign. The photographs were relevant as demonstrative evidence, as they illustrated an issue in the case and would not prejudice the jury. Workman v. McIntyre Constr. Co., 190 M 5, 617 P2d 1281, 37 St. Rep. 1637 (1980). See also Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 233 M 515, 761 P2d 401, 45 St. Rep. 1694 (1988).

Relevance and Admissibility of Testimony of Previously Acquitted Alleged Principal: The testimony of a previously acquitted alleged principal in a robbery was allowed in the trial of an alleged participant in the same robbery. The denial of any participation in the robbery provided the foundation for the admission of the witness' prior inconsistent statements in which he admitted his participation. There was additional evidence tending to establish that the witness and the defendant had planned the robbery with others. The witness' testimony was therefore relevant and clearly admissible. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113, 37 St. Rep. 45 (1980).

Statement by Deceased Agent of Defendant — Admissibility: The statement of a corporate agent made to plaintiff within the scope and term of the agency is admissible as testimony by plaintiff when offered against the defendant although the corporate agent died before trial. McNulty v. Bewley Corp., 182 M 260, 596 P2d 474, 36 St. Rep. 1110 (1979).

Admissibility Subject to Condition — Renewal of Objection: If a counsel's foundational objection to evidence is based on subsection (b) of this section, he should state why the proffered evidence should only have been conditionally admitted, and it would then be incumbent upon him, not the court, to renew the objection after the State rested its case by motion to strike. St. v. Sullivan, 182 M 66, 595 P2d 372, 36 St. Rep. 936 (1979).

Admissible Evidence: The test of admissibility of photographic evidence and oral testimony is whether its probative value is substantially outweighed by its prejudicial effect. St. v. Azure, 181 M 47, 591 P2d 1125, 36 St. Rep. 514 (1979).

AUDIO OR VIDEO EVIDENCE

No Error in Denial of Motion to Suppress Evidence Based on Failure to Record 9-1-1 Emergency Call and Promptly Provide Officer's Belt Recording: Saxton made a 9-1-1 emergency domestic violence call that ultimately resulted in officers entering Saxton's home and arresting her on drug charges. Saxton maintained that the evidence should be suppressed because the police improperly entered the home but failed to record the emergency call and promptly provide the audio recording from the belt recorder of the investigating officer, which might have provided exculpatory evidence. The Supreme Court found that entry into the home was not unlawful and affirmed. Although the state may not interfere with a defendant's right to gather exculpatory evidence, the state is not required to collect it. Here, there was no deliberate suppression of evidence by failing to record the 9-1-1 call, and Saxton was eventually allowed to review and enhance the belt recording, but it yielded no evidence that was material to Saxton's defense. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by failing to suppress the evidence under these circumstances. St. v. Saxton, 2003 MT 105, 315 M 315, 68 P3d 721 (2003), following St. v. Heth, 230 M 268, 750 P2d 103 (1988).

Involuntary Written Consent to Search — Suppression of Illegally Seized Evidence Under Exclusionary Rule: Olson was arrested when officers entered her home pursuant to a warrant for Olson's failure to appear at a Justice's Court hearing. While the arrest was taking place in the kitchen, an officer looked into the living room and observed drug paraphernalia. Officers then searched other rooms of the house and found drugs and paraphernalia in each room. An officer requested that Olson sign a form consenting to a further search of the residence, and Olson agreed. A further search revealed more drugs and paraphernalia. Olson later made a taped statement in jail. The District Court denied Olson's motion to suppress on grounds that the written consent was voluntary. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed. Although the knowing and voluntary consent by a citizen to a search is a recognized exception to warrant requirements, consent is not voluntary when it is given only after law enforcement officers have already conducted an illegal search because the consent flows directly from the unlawful intrusion. Further, the taped statement should have also been suppressed under the exclusionary rule, because the incriminating statement was gathered as a result of the unlawful search. St. v. Olson, 2002 MT 211, 311 M 270, 55 P3d 935 (2002).

Demonstrative Videotape: In a criminal trial resulting from a car accident, the District Court excluded from evidence a videotape prepared by a defense expert to illustrate the defendant's theory as to how the accident occurred. On appeal, the Supreme Court remanded the case for trial on other grounds and advised the court to specifically address factors discussed in Workman, Palmer, and Brown and to reconsider the question of whether the videotape may be admissible as demonstrative evidence. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998).

Questional Videotapes of Defendant Inadmissible to Show Poor Mental State: Santos appealed his murder convictions on the basis that the trial court should have admitted videotapes of him made by defense counsel shortly after his arrest because they were proof of his poor mental state. The Supreme Court held that the District Court properly excluded the tapes due to their questionable probative value because the defendant was not under oath at the time, there were no safeguards to ensure the tapes' integrity, and at best the tapes demonstrated the defendant's mental state several days after the crimes were committed. St. v. Santos, 273 M 125, 902 P2d 510, 52 St. Rep. 865 (1995).

Videotape With Blank Segment and Other Booking — Admissible: During the course of booking for a DUI arrest, the video camera was turned off for a short time to allow an independent investigator to obtain information from the defendant. Because of the interruption, the videotape contained a blank segment followed by a brief segment of a prior unrelated DUI booking. The defendant contended that the videotape was inadmissible because the interruption and the segment on the other booking constituted improper editing of the video. The Supreme Court held that proper foundation was made for the recording and that it was not abuse of discretion for the trial court judge to determine that the appropriate portions of the videotape were admissible. Missoula v. Forest, 236 M 129, 769 P2d 699, 46 St. Rep. 237 (1989).

Admissibility of Recording of Warrantless Face-to-Face Conversation by Police Use of Body Wire Transmitting Device: Warrantless consensual electronic monitoring of face-to-face conversations by the use of a body wire transmitting device, when performed by law enforcement officers while pursuing their official duties, does not violate the constitutional right to be free of unreasonable search and seizure or the right of privacy. Consent must be clearly obtained from at least one party to the conversation and must be freely made and without compulsion. As in telephone conversations, the consenting party may be an informant or police officer. Evidence obtained from such monitoring is admissible in a subsequent criminal trial. St. v. Brown, 232 M 1, 755 P2d 1364, 45 St. Rep. 818 (1988), overruling St. v. Brackman, 178 M 105, 582 P2d 1216 (1978). Brown was overruled in St. v. Goetz, 2008 MT 296, 345 M 421, 191 P3d 489 (2008).

Disclaimer in Videotape Made in Anticipation of Trial Inadmissible: A videotape that explained a fertilization program included a statement that the fertilizer was only a starter system, not a complete program. Plaintiffs contended the system was presented to them a year earlier as a complete program and that their reliance on it caused a partial crop failure. The Supreme Court affirmed a lower court ruling that because the tape was cumulative and was too likely made in anticipation of trial, it was inadmissible. Gurnsey v. Conklin Co., Inc., 230 M 42, 751 P2d 151, 45 St. Rep. 1 (1988).

Movie Admitted as Demonstrative Evidence: The court did not err in admitting a movie, offered as demonstrative evidence intended to illustrate plaintiff's testimony as to the cause of injury in a strict liability action, because the jury was cautioned the film was intended as demonstrative evidence only and was instructed in detail as to changes in conditions between the actual occurrence and demonstration. Brown v. N. Am. Mfg. Co., 176 M 98, 576 P2d 711 (1978), followed in Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 233 M 515, 761 P2d 401, 45 St. Rep. 1694 (1988).

Audio-Video Taping: The procedure of audio-video taping defendant arrested for driving while intoxicated was not violative of due process requirements, did not constitute an unreasonable search and seizure, and was held to be objective evidence outside the privilege against self-incrimination. St. v. Finley, 173 M 162, 566 P2d 1119 (1977).

CHAIN OF CUSTODY

Sufficient Chain of Custody for Admission of Latent Fingerprint: The defendant alleged the District Court abused its discretion by finding that a sufficient chain of custody existed for the admission of a latent fingerprint, even though the fingerprint cards used to collect the evidence were not stored in an evidence room and discrepancies existed regarding the date on which the fingerprints were collected. The Supreme Court held that the state made a prima facie showing of a continuous chain of possession and that the defendant failed to meet his burden to affirmatively show tampering with the evidence. St. v. McCoy, 2012 MT 293, 367 Mont. 357, 291 P.3d 568, following St. v. Weeks, 270 Mont. 63, 891 P.2d 477 (1995), and St. v. Bowser, 2005 MT 279, 329 Mont. 218, 123 P.3d 230.

Chain of Custody — Sufficiency of Evidence Demonstrating Chain — Faulty Laboratory Procedure: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon serological DNA evidence gained from blood samples taken from Weeks, the stepdaughter, and a child of the stepdaughter. Weeks challenged the admissibility of the samples because one of the samples was mistakenly sent to another laboratory before being forwarded to the correct laboratory and because when a sample of blood was taken from him, the person marking the sample did not follow the requirements of the laboratory manual. Citing St. v. Bradley, 262 M 194, 864 P2d 787 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the state's evidence as to the chain of custody was sufficient even though the blood sample was inadvertently sent to the wrong laboratory. The Supreme Court also held that although the laboratory manual was not complied with, there was sufficient evidence to prove that the sample of blood tested by the laboratory was the blood that was taken from Weeks. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995), followed in St. v. Bowser, 2005 MT 279, 329 M 218, 123 P3d 230 (2005).

Prima Facie Case Showing No Substantial Change in Evidence — Attack of Chain of Evidence at Trial: Defendant questioned whether evidence was properly admitted without the state's establishing a proper chain of evidence. Extensive testimony chronicled the labeling, storing, securing, transferring of possession, and testing of each exhibit. The state made a prima facie case showing that there had been no substantial change in the evidence, and defendant failed to produce any evidence to show if actual or even potential tampering could have occurred. Additionally, defendant vigorously attacked the chain of evidence at trial; thus, the jury had an opportunity to weigh this evidence. The Supreme Court found no abuse of discretion in admitting the evidence. St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986), followed in St. v. Evans, 247 M 218, 806 P2d 512, 48 St. Rep. 170 (1991).

Chain of Custody of Evidence: Rumley appealed his conviction for negligent homicide. He argued that the court erred in admitting the results of a blood alcohol test because of a break in the chain of possession of the blood sample. He argued that because the police officer did not see the blood sample being drawn, the chain of possession was broken. There was testimony that the police officer gave a vial to a nurse who testified that she drew the blood sample, placed it in the vial, and returned it to the police officer. In light of that testimony, Rumley's claim lacks merit. The State's burden in establishing the chain of custody requires only that the evidence be identified and to make a prima facie showing that there has been no substantial change. In this case, the State satisfied its burden. St. v. Rumley, 194 M 506, 634 P2d 446, 38 St. Rep. 1351A (1981).

Chain of Custody — Adequacy of Foundation Left to Discretion of District Court: Armstrong contends that the State must show a complete chain of custody from the time of the homicide until the introduction into evidence and that if a link in the chain is missing, the exhibit may not be admitted. On appeal, the Supreme Court said that the adequacy of the foundation for admission of such evidence is within the District Court's discretion, and the District Court's determination will not be reversed absent a clear abuse of discretion. The State established a complete chain of custody from the time the evidence was found until it was introduced, and that is sufficient. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341, 37 St. Rep. 1563 (1980).

DNA EVIDENCE

DNA Evidence — Conflicting Expert Testimony on Statistical Foundation for Test — Weight and Admissibility: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon DNA evidence gained from blood samples taken from Weeks, the stepdaughter, and a child of the stepdaughter. Weeks contended that because of conflicting expert testimony as to the size of the statistical basis necessary to apply the results to a population of 100 million, the DNA results should not be admitted. Citing Barmeyer v. Mont. Power Co., 202 M 185, 657 P2d 594 (1983), the Supreme Court held that the conflicting evidence was a matter for the jury to consider in deciding the weight of the evidence. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995).

DNA Evidence — Lack of Industry Standard No Preclusion of Admissibility: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon DNA evidence gained from blood samples taken from Weeks, the stepdaughter, and a child of the stepdaughter. Weeks contended that lack of one industrywide standard for DNA testing laboratory procedures precluded admissibility of the DNA evidence. An expert witness testified that membership in the American Association of Blood Banks (AABB) resulted in the application of a de facto standard for all testing. Citing St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457 (1994), the Supreme Court held that the methodology of DNA testing could not be seriously questioned and that because the laboratory was a member of the AABB and because Weeks failed to point out any errors in the laboratory procedures, the DNA evidence was properly admitted. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995).

EXPERTS

Visual Identification of Dangerous Drug by Expert Witness Held Sufficient — Daubert Hearing Held Unnecessary: Clark was convicted of criminal possession of dangerous drugs after OxyContin and other prescription drugs for which Clark didn't have a prescription were found in the back seat of his vehicle. Clark contended that the method of identification of the drugs by the state's expert, using the unique coding on the drug containers and a visual inspection, was insufficient, that a chemical analysis should have been done, and that a Daubert hearing (see Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 US 579 (1993)) should have been held at which the analysis and the state's expert testimony would be offered for evidence. Citing St. v. Damon, 205 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005), the Supreme Court held that a Daubert hearing was necessary only for assessing expert testimony on novel scientific evidence but that there was nothing novel about the method used by the state's expert to identify the dangerous drugs in Clark's possession. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Expert Testimony on Evidence of Microscopic Hair Comparison Admissible: When considering whether expert evidence from microscopic hair comparison is admissible, the Supreme Court found that microscopic hair comparison is not novel scientific evidence; therefore, it was not error for the District Court to fail to consider the factors in Daubert v. Merrell Dow Pharmaceuticals, Inc., 509 US 579, 125 L Ed 2d 469, 113 S Ct 2786 (1993), in determining if the expert's testimony was admissible. Nevertheless, when considering admissibility of microscopic hair comparison evidence, the District Court must conduct a conventional Rule 702, M.R.Ev., analysis. Applying Hulse v. Dept. of Justice, 1998 MT 108, 289 M 1, 961 P2d 75 (1998), the court held that microscopic hair comparison, like the horizontal gaze nystagmus test in Hulse, is beyond the range of ordinary training or intelligence and is thus a subject on which an expert may testify. Here the state established an adequate foundation for the expert's testimony, including education, training, and knowledge, and the District Court did not err in allowing it. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999), in accord with U.S. v. Matta-Ballesteros, 71 F3d 754 (9th Cir. 1995). See also St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

DNA Evidence — Conflicting Expert Testimony on Statistical Foundation for Test — Weight and Admissibility: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. Weeks contended that because of conflicting expert testimony as to the size of the statistical basis necessary to apply the results to a population of 100 million, the DNA results should not be admitted. Weeks*, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995).

Opinion Testimony Beyond Scope of Expert's Employment: The defendant argued that the trial court erred in allowing testimony by the plaintiff's expert on subject matter that was beyond the scope of the expert's employment. The Supreme Court ruled that the testimony could not have come as a surprise to the defendant because the expert's deposition indicated that he was going to testify on the subject matter in question. Davis v. Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints, 244 M 61, 796 P2d 181, 47 St. Rep. 1302 (1990).

FOUNDATION

Product Liability — Showing of Substantial Similarity of Other Incidents Required for Admittance: In a product liability case concerning a Ford Explorer's rollover during an accident, the District Court properly excluded evidence of 3,000 other rollover cases because the plaintiff failed to show that the circumstances in the other rollovers were substantially similar to the accident at issue. Stokes v. Ford Motor Co., 2013 MT 29, 368 Mont. 365, 300 P.3d 648, following Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 Mont. 266, 783 P.2d 1340 (1989).

Admissibility of Intoxilyzer Certification Documents — District Court to Determine Adequate Foundation Regardless of Hearsay Rules — White Overruled: The defendant was charged with felony DUI after a breath test revealed his blood alcohol content exceeded the legal limit. At trial, in the course of the charging police officer's testimony, the state offered into evidence two field certification documents for the Intoxilyzer 8000. The defendant objected to the documents, claiming that because the officer was not the author or custodian of the documents, they were inadmissible hearsay under Rule 803(6), M.R.Ev. The District Court admitted the documents and the defendant appealed his subsequent conviction. The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the admissibility of certification documents is also subject to Rule 104(a), M.R.Ev. This rule allows a court to determine whether there is an adequate foundation for a document without regard to whether it is hearsay. In so ruling, the Supreme Court overruled St. v. White, 2009 MT 26, 349 Mont. 109, 201 P.3d 808, to the extent it is inconsistent with St. v. Delaney, 1999 MT 317, 297 Mont. 263, 991 P.2d 461. St. v. Jenkins, 2011 MT 287, 362 Mont. 481, 265 P.3d 643.

What Form of Compliance of Instrument Used in Breath Test Required as Foundation for Breath Test Results: ARM 23.4.214 requires that all breath analysis equipment be sent to the state Forensic Sciences Division annually for laboratory certification. A person charged with an alcohol-related offense is entitled to the procedural safeguards contained in the administrative rule, so in order for the results of a defendant's breath test to be admissible, the state must lay a proper foundation by establishing that the instrument complied with ARM 23.4.214. During pretrial discovery, Delaney requested documentation that the instrument used to test his breath had been certified, and the state provided a copy of the laboratory certification form. At trial, Delaney moved to dismiss the results of the breath test, contending that the form was inadmissible hearsay that could not be used to lay the requisite foundation, and also maintained that failure to call the custodian of the annual certification records violated Delaney's right to confront witnesses. The state contended that it was not required to have the form admitted in order to lay a foundation for admissibility and that, consequently, it did not matter that the document was hearsay, but rather that all that was necessary was to establish to the satisfaction of the court that the certification had been performed. The District Court sided with the state and admitted the breath test results. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that the determination of whether adequate foundation exists is within the discretion of the District Court and that that determination is made pursuant to subsection (a) of this rule, which authorizes the examination of any proffered evidence, regardless of its admissibility, in determining the admissibility of challenged evidence. Under the identical federal Rule of Evidence, federal courts have found that the plain language of the rule extends to consideration of hearsay and other evidence normally inadmissible at trial. (See Bourjaily v. U.S., 483 US 171, 97 L Ed 2d 144, 107 S Ct 1775 (1987), and its progeny.) Thus, the District Court was allowed to consider the certification form in determining whether an adequate foundation existed without regard to whether the form itself was hearsay, and consequently, the state was not required to call the records custodian to testify. St. v. Delaney, 1999 MT 317, 297 M 263, 991 P2d 461, 56 St. Rep. 1267 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Woods, 272 M 220, 900 P2d 320, 52 St. Rep. 762 (1995), and St. v. Clark, 1998 MT 221, 290 M 479, 964 P2d 766, 55 St. Rep. 919 (1998), and followed in St. v. White, 2009 MT 26, 349 M 109, 201 P3d 808 (2009), with regard to necessity of proper foundation for admission of results of alcohol concentration breath analysis. White was overruled, to the extent it is inconsistent with Delaney, in St. v. Jenkins, 2011 MT 287, 362 Mont. 481, 265 P.3d 643. See also St. v. Johnston, 2011 MT 184, 361 Mont. 301, 258 P.3d 417 (holding that a breath analysis instrument must be inspected and calibrated at least every 31 days pursuant to ARM 23.4.213, not every 7 days, or its results may be suppressed).

Introduction of Photograph of Exemplar Exhibit Proper as Necessary Foundational Requirement: At trial, plaintiff sought to introduce a photograph of an exemplar vehicle kingpin through an expert, asserting that the purpose for introducing the photograph was to show what the subject kingpin looked like before the accident and to show a kingpin with a properly designed radius. The only foundation laid for admitting the photograph was the expert's testimony that the exemplar kingpin was fundamentally the same design as the subject kingpin, except in terms of radius; however, the expert could not identify the date and source of manufacture of the exemplar kingpin and, without this information, there was no way to know whether the kingpins were in fact substantially the same. The District Court did not err in refusing admission of the photograph and allowing the expert to refer to previously admitted exhibits to illustrate his opinion concerning adequate radiusing. Baldauf v. Arrow Tank & Eng'r Co., Inc., 1999 MT 81, 294 M 107, 979 P2d 166, 56 St. Rep. 337 (1999), distinguishing Simonson v. White, 220 M 14, 713 P2d 983, 43 St. Rep. 133 (1986).

Photographs of Re-Creation of Accident — Substantial Similarity Required: If pictures taken of the re-creation of an accident are “substantially similar” to those at the time of the accident and the re-creation has been properly “foundationed” [sic], there is no abuse of discretion by the trial judge in admitting the evidence where, as here, the party assisting with the re-creation explained to the jury the dissimilarities between the re-creation and the actual incident. Simonson v. White, 220 M 14, 713 P2d 983, 43 St. Rep. 133 (1986), distinguished in Baldauf v. Arrow Tank & Eng'r Co., Inc., 1999 MT 81, 294 M 107, 979 P2d 166, 56 St. Rep. 337 (1999).

Tort Action — Admitted Use of Drugs Before Traffic Accident — Motion In Limine to Exclude Unless Foundation Established: Plaintiff admitted certain use of illegal drugs before the traffic accident, but it was not error for the District Court to grant a motion in limine excluding such evidence from the trial unless a foundation could be established showing that at the time of the accident he was under the influence and that his negligence was the proximate or controlling cause of injuries. Because evidence of drugs is very prejudicial, such conditional exclusion requires some link between it and the accident and a weighing of its probative value against its prejudicial effect. Simonson v. White, 220 M 14, 713 P2d 983, 43 St. Rep. 133 (1986).

Foundation Required for Admissibility of Blood Test Results: Defendant on a charge of driving under the influence of alcohol or drugs in violation of 61-8-401 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) is entitled to the procedural safeguards of the Administrative Rules of Montana. To admit evidence of blood alcohol content and a test report, the State must lay a foundation pursuant to 61-8-404 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) which incorporates ARM 23.3.931 (now repealed). The laboratory analysis must be done in a laboratory qualified under the rules of the Department of Justice. The report must be prepared in accordance with the rules of the Department. If a blood sample is taken, the person withdrawing the blood must be demonstrably qualified to do so. St. v. McDonald, 215 M 340, 697 P2d 1328, 42 St. Rep. 414 (1985).

Vague Testimony of Driver and Vehicle Remote From Scene of Accident — Prejudicial — Foundation Lacking: In a trial arising from an intersection collision between plaintiff's motorcycle and defendant's auto, testimony of defendant's proposed witness was properly excluded as having prejudicial effect outweighing any probative value. He would have testified regarding a motorcyclist he saw while closing his shop. He could not positively identify plaintiff as the motorcyclist, and his description of the cycle and its driver varied from that of other witnesses and from the actual cycle and driver. His view occurred 300 yards from the accident. He was vague as to the time. Other cycles could have passed him by unobserved. His testimony characterized the driver as a stereotypical biker driving fast. The testimony also lacked a sufficient foundation, because there was insufficient connection between the driver witness saw and plaintiff. Welnel v. Hall, 215 M 78, 694 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 195 (1985).

Admissibility Subject to Condition — Renewal of Objection: If a counsel's foundational objection to evidence is based on subsection (b) of this section, he should state why the proffered evidence should only have been conditionally admitted, and it would then be incumbent upon him, not the court, to renew the objection after the State rested its case by motion to strike. St. v. Sullivan, 182 M 66, 595 P2d 372, 36 St. Rep. 936 (1979).

Attempted Admission — Insufficient Foundation: The fact that State was unable to lay a proper foundation for the admission of items into evidence, which were not irrelevant or otherwise inadmissible in an essential way, did not require reversal of defendant's conviction on the ground their attempted admission was prejudicial. St. v. Larson, 175 M 395, 574 P2d 266 (1978).

SURPRISE

Exclusion of Evidence on Suretyship Defense on Grounds of Surprise — Adequate Opportunity to Raise Defense, yet No Notice Given: Challinors sought to introduce evidence concerning a “suretyship defense” for the first time at trial. Glacier National Bank (Glacier) repeatedly objected on the basis of surprise. The trial court gave Challinors ample opportunity to demonstrate that notice concerning this legal theory had been given to Glacier during discovery or at any other time. Upon finding that notice had not been given, the court considered possible prejudice to Glacier. The issue Challinors sought to raise would have changed the entire complexion of the lawsuit. In light of the lack of notice prior to trial of the intent to raise the issue and in light of Glacier's timely objections, it was not an abuse of the court's discretion in not allowing Challinors to present the evidence. Glacier Nat'l Bank v. Challinor, 253 M 412, 833 P2d 1046, 49 St. Rep. 503 (1992).

Allowing Witness Not Listed in Pretrial Order to Testify — Abuse of Discretion: Neither a scheduling order nor a pretrial order listed Goacher as a witness; rather, Stokes was listed as the witness who would provide foundation for the survey of an accident scene. One week before trial, defendant learned it was Goacher who had prepared the survey and would testify, but there was not time to depose Goacher prior to trial. At trial, defendant objected to Goacher's testimony on the grounds of surprise and prejudice. The objection was overruled, and defendant did not request a continuance. Failure to reveal the information regarding witness testimony in a timely fashion resulted in surprise and prejudice to defendant and constituted reversible error, notwithstanding defendant's failure to request a continuance. Bache v. Gilden, 252 M 178, 827 P2d 817, 49 St. Rep. 203 (1992), overruling Barrett v. ASARCO Inc., 234 M 229, 763 P2d 27 (1988), and Sikorski v. Olin & Rolin Mfg., 174 M 107, 568 P2d 571 (1977), to the extent that they held that failure to request a continuance at trial constituted a waiver of the right to claim error on appeal, and followed in Glacier Nat'l Bank v. Challinor, 253 M 412, 833 P2d 1046, 49 St. Rep. 503 (1992).

No Unfair Surprise — Testimony Admissible: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing an expert witness's testimony when there was disclosure of the testimony a month prior to the trial, the witness's depositions were available, there was actual opportunity to examine the witness prior to his testimony, and appellant had its own expert available at the trial to testify in rebuttal. Morning Star Enterprises, Inc. v. R.H. Grover, Inc., 247 M 105, 805 P2d 553, 48 St. Rep. 112 (1991).

Late Disclosure — Evidence Improperly Excluded: The District Court abused its discretion by excluding evidence on the basis of late disclosure of new witnesses by defendant, given the fact that defendant supplemented its interrogatory answers 24 days before trial, plaintiff refused to depose the new witnesses at defendant's expense, and plaintiff failed to request a continuance. Defendant's alleged knowledge of the witnesses before the discovery deadline also did not warrant exclusion, and plaintiff's claim of prejudice by the late discovery did not justify an exclusion that substantially affected defendant's rights. Barrett v. ASARCO Inc., 234 M 229, 763 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 1865 (1988), overruled in Bache v. Gilden, 252 M 178, 827 P2d 817, 49 St. Rep. 203 (1992), to the extent that Barrett held that failure to request a continuance at trial constituted a waiver of the right to claim error on appeal. Bache followed in Glacier Nat'l Bank v. Challinor, 253 M 412, 833 P2d 1046, 49 St. Rep. 503 (1992). Plaintiff's claim that defense attorneys defrauded the court by obtaining a reversal of this decision by representing that six named witnesses would testify to specific acts of misconduct was properly dismissed through summary judgment because plaintiff chose not to use the means available to him to investigate the truth of the representations made to him. Barrett v. Holland & Hart, 256 M 101, 845 P2d 714, 49 St. Rep. 1156 (1992), and 50 St. Rep. 63 (1993).

MISCELLANEOUS

Admissibility of Proof of Refusal to Take Sobriety Test Not Violative of Separation of Powers Doctrine: Robertson claimed that by enacting 61-8-404 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10), regarding admission of evidence of a person's refusal to take a sobriety test, the Legislature unconstitutionally infringed on the function of courts to determine the admissibility of evidence, in violation of the separation of powers doctrine. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that ultimately, the admissibility of evidence lies with the court pursuant to this rule. The Legislature routinely passes laws that determine whether certain kinds of evidence are admissible, without violating the separation of powers doctrine in the process. Further, "admissible" means that evidence may, but is not required, to be admitted. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000). See also St. v. Long, 778 P2d 1027 (Wash. 1989).

No Burden-Shifting in Statute Allowing Evidence of Refusal to Take DUI Test: Relying on St. v. Long, 778 P2d 1027 (Wash. 1989), Robertson argued that 61-8-404(2) (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10) allows the prosecution to argue that an inference of guilt could be drawn from the evidence of his refusal to take a Breathalyzer test, impermissibly shifting the burden of proof to him to establish that the refusal was not a reflection of guilt, in violation of 46-16-204. Although the Washington and Montana versions of 61-8-404(2) are virtually identical, the Montana Supreme Court distinguished Long, finding nothing in the statute that inferred a consciousness of guilt arising from the introduction of evidence of the proof of refusal to take the test. The state still must prove the offense of DUI beyond a reasonable doubt. Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000).

Exclusionary Rule Inapplicable to Civil Involuntary Commitment Hearing: L.B. was examined by a professional person and determined to suffer from a serious mental disorder that required treatment. Following presentation of the professional's testimony at a hearing for involuntary commitment, the District Court held that the testimony was too speculative and ordered L.B. released. After the hearing, L.B. was detained by the Sheriff's office for a short time in an attempt to find a place for him, rather than just sending him out onto the streets. During his detention, L.B. was examined by a second professional person who determined that L.B. should be involuntarily committed to the state hospital for immediate treatment, and a second petition for commitment was filed that same day. The District Court subsequently determined that L.B.'s mental illness deprived him of the ability to protect his life or health and transferred him to the state hospital for treatment. L.B. argued that all evidence obtained after the order for release should be suppressed under the exclusionary rule because such proceedings may result in a massive curtailment of liberty for the person committed. However, noting the civil nature of commitment proceedings, the Supreme Court declined to apply the criminal law exclusionary rule because to suppress relevant evidence would defeat the purpose of the proceeding, which is to secure the appropriate treatment for those who need it and are unable to obtain it because of their mental condition. In re Mental Health of L.C.B., 253 M 1, 830 P2d 1299, 49 St. Rep. 290 (1992).

Reference to List Given Witness and Referring to Inadmissible Evidence — No Mistrial: At the close of the state's direct examination of a forensic scientist, the prosecutor handed him a list of items the scientist had analyzed. The list included items as to which evidence was not admissible. The prosecutor told the judge that he was not going to offer the list and that the defense could ask questions regarding the list and could offer the list if the defense wished to. This was not an impermissible reference to inadmissible evidence. There was no indication that the jury saw the list, that the analysis of the inadmissible evidence was revealed to the jury, or that the jury was otherwise informed of the inadmissible evidence. St. v. Scheffelman, 225 M 408, 733 P2d 348, 44 St. Rep. 357 (1987).

Standard of Lawful Basis for Refusal to Decline Payment of Claim — Standard Not Met by Reliance on Inadmissible Evidence: An insurer must meet the standard of a lawful basis for refusal to decline payment of an insured's claim for an insured's loss. Reliance by the insurer on inadmissible evidence of arson by the insured in declining payment of an insured's loss does not meet the standard of a lawful basis for refusal of the insured's claim. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Demonstration of Stolen Item's Operability — No Objection — No Instruction: Defendant was convicted of felony theft of a jackhammer. At trial, the operability of the jackhammer was demonstrated in response to testimony that the jackhammer would have greater value if it worked. Defendant failed to object at trial that it was not operated "under a load". The court rejected defendant's attack on the validity of the demonstrative evidence and his complaint that there was no precautionary instruction to the jury about the demonstration. Defendant proposed no such instruction to the court as required by 46-16-401. St. v. Field, 215 M 361, 697 P2d 1339, 42 St. Rep. 431 (1985).

Admission of Drug Paraphernalia Found in Accident Victim's Car — Prejudicial Effect Outweighed by Probative Value: In a case involving negligence in an automobile accident, the prejudicial effect of allowing the introduction of drug paraphernalia found in the car in which the accident victim had been riding was outweighed by its probative value. Testimony of the driver and victim was that they had not smoked marijuana on the day of the accident, but because the vehicle had been owned only a short time, the existence of the paraphernalia would tend to show that the driver actively consumed marijuana within a few days of the accident, thus tending to impeach the testimony. Foreman v. Minnie, 211 M 441, 689 P2d 1210, 41 St. Rep. 1478 (1984).

Testimony of Psychologist on Suicide Victim's State of Mind — When Psychologist Never Interviewed Decedent: When a psychologist had performed a psychological autopsy on the decedent after his suicide, the Workers' Compensation Court admitted, over the employer's objection, the psychologist's testimony on the causal connection between decedent's injury and his suicide. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the fact that decedent had never been interviewed by the psychologist did not render the psychologist's testimony inadmissible. Campbell v. Federated Mut. Ins., 211 M 68, 684 P2d 1101, 41 St. Rep. 1218 (1984).

Admissibility of Confession to Civilian: The court did not err by not holding an evidentiary hearing to determine whether an admission by the defendant met constitutional requirements because the voluntariness of the statement was not an issue and Miranda warnings were not required for a noncustodial confession to a civilian. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

Rule 105. Limited admissibility.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 105. The Commission adopted the rule because [it] expresses longstanding practice and existing Montana law. The effect of the rule is to allow evidence to be admissible for a particular purpose even though that evidence may be inadmissible for another purpose. There is a danger that this evidence could be confusing or misleading to the jury or could prejudice a party. Therefore the court should exercise caution in admitting such evidence in light of the effectiveness of a limiting instruction. See Bruton v. United States, 391 U.S. 126, 137 (1968) holding that when a codefendant's confession inculcating Bruton was admitted, a limiting instruction was inadequate.

Montana cases have recognized this practice in situations unlike the one in Bruton, supra: Hester v. Western Life & Accident Co., 67 Mont. 286, 290, 215 P 508 (1923) allowing hearsay; Outlook Farmer's Elevator Co. v. American Surety Co., 70 Mont. 8, 25, 223 P 905 (1924) allowing declarations against interest against a surety; DeAtley v. Streit, 81 Mont. 382, 390, 263 P 967 (1928) allowing parol evidence; Edquest v. Tripp & Dragstedt Co., 93 Mont. 446, 454, 19 P2d 637 (1933) allowing exhibits that were potentially prejudicial; and Teesdale v. Anschutz Drilling Co., 138 Mont. 427, 439, 357 P2d 4 (1960) allowing evidence showing remedial measures.

Case Notes

Testimony Related to Abuse Two Decades Earlier Relevant — Motion in Limine Properly Denied: The defendant was charged with sexually abusing a child. During discovery, the state notified the defendant that it would call the defendant's sister to testify about his sexual abuse of her as a child, for which he was convicted in 1995. The defendant filed a motion in limine to exclude her testimony under Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. The state argued that the sister's testimony was relevant to prove the defendant's intent and absence of mistake. The defendant argued that the sister's assault was remote in time and not similar to the current crime. The District Court denied the motion, and the defendant was convicted of sexual assault. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the motion in limine, ruling that the sister's testimony was relevant and that its probative value was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice regardless of how long ago the abuse had occurred. St. v. Given, 2015 MT 273, 381 Mont. 115, 359 P.3d 90.

Railroad Employee Injury — Evidence of Supplemental Employment Income Very Prejudicial — District Court Abuse of Discretion: The plaintiff, an employee of a railroad, pursued a cause of action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) and the Locomotive Inspection Act (LIA) for a work-related injury that prevented him from working as a conductor for 6 months. In addition to working as a conductor, the employee had a lucrative consulting business before and after the date of injury. Before trial, the District Court denied the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude reference to money earned by him as a consultant. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the District Court abused its discretion by admitting into evidence the specific amount of income the plaintiff made from his nonrailroad employment, and the case was remanded for a new trial. The court reasoned that the evidence was very prejudicial and that it could have had an impact upon the jury's verdict on the issue of liability, as well as damages. Martin v. BNSF Ry. Co., 2015 MT 167, 379 Mont. 423, 352 P.3d 598.

No Requirement That All Uncharged Acts Be Similar or Near In Time to Charged Act: When a defendant raises a Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., objection, the court should analyze whether the evidence is relevant for a purpose that does not involve drawing an impermissible inference of action in conformity with a trait of character. St. v. 18th Judicial District Court, 2010 MT 263, 358 Mont. 325, 246 P.3d 415.

No Duty to Give Limiting Jury Instruction Absent Request to Limit Scope of Consideration of Testimony: White sued her doctor for alleged negligence in treatment. Prior to trial, the District Court made several rulings, including restricting defense counsel from arguing or attempting to shift the blame to White or her mother for any alleged lack of diligence in pursuing a diagnosis, although counsel was allowed to address and explain the standard of care. White subsequently asserted that during trial defense counsel repeatedly violated the pretrial orders, and she proposed a jury instruction that only the doctor's conduct was to be considered and that if the jury found that White had sustained damages, no consideration was to be given to whether the mother's conduct contributed to the damages. The District Court refused the instruction. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that White did not explicitly request the jury instruction based on Rule 105, M.R.Ev., and that the District Court had no duty to give the limiting instruction absent a request to limit the scope of the jury's consideration of the evidence. The District Court's denial of the limiting instruction was not an abuse of discretion. White v. Johnson, 2009 MT 254, 351 M 534, 215 P3d 11 (2009).

Use of Redacted Pretort Release to Establish Statutory Liability Shield Allowed: A pretort form indicating a prospective release from liability for negligence is illegal. However, it was not improper for a trial court to allow introduction of a redacted version of an illegal exculpatory agreement to show that an equine activity sponsor was statutorily protected from liability from unavoidable risks or from the inherent risks of equine activities of which the participant was or should have been aware. In the present case, plaintiff failed to cite authority or establish error by the trial court in admitting the redacted agreement, and the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's denial of plaintiff's motion for a new trial on grounds that the redacted agreement was improperly admitted in evidence. McDermott v. Carie, LLC, 2005 MT 293, 329 M 295, 124 P3d 168 (2005).

Defendant Acquitted of Murder — Evidence of Motive for Murder Admissible on Arson Charge — Evidence Admissible as to One Defendant Properly Introduced in Consolidated Trial: Link was acquitted by a jury of purposefully or knowingly causing Leonard's death. In a later trial on charges of arson and deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule, Link argued that evidence of his financial motive for wanting Leonard's death was inadmissible on the arson charge because he had already been acquitted of accountability for Leonard's death. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was properly admitted because it was not made irrelevant by the fact that Link could collect only if Leonard actually died as a result of the fire. Link also argued that evidence that Enright, a codefendant with whom Link's trial had been consolidated, also committed similar crimes against Leonard was not admissible because it did not pertain to him. The Supreme Court held that the evidence against Enright was admissible because the jury was capable of considering the evidence only as it pertained to Enright and had been instructed by the District Court to do so. St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000).

Inadmissibility of Evidence of Receipt of Workers' Compensation Benefits — Reversible Error: Mickelson was injured when the fire truck that he was driving was struck by a Montana Rail Link (MRL) train and sought damages. Prior to trial, Mickelson filed a motion in limine to preclude MRL from mentioning or arguing at trial that Mickelson was receiving workers' compensation benefits as a result of the injuries. The District Court denied the motion, concluding that MRL should be allowed to show that Mickelson did not take reasonable steps to mitigate the damages by accepting a retraining employment position because of fear of losing the workers' compensation benefits. At trial, evidence of Mickelson's workers' compensation benefits was allowed throughout the proceedings, and the jury decided for MRL. On appeal, MRL argued that the evidence had significant probative value as to why Mickelson had not returned to work, perhaps even indicating that Mickelson was malingering by not accepting a supported employment position. The Supreme Court noted the District Court's broad discretion in determining the relevance and admissibility of evidence, but recited several prior holdings that evidence of receipt of workers' compensation benefits or other collateral source benefits constitutes prejudicial and reversible error requiring a new trial. Despite MRL's argument to the contrary, introduction of the evidence could not be considered harmless because the evidence could have an impact on the jury's verdict on the issue of liability as well as damages. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a new trial. Mickelson v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2000 MT 111, 299 M 348, 999 P2d 985, 57 St. Rep. 446 (2000), following Mydlarz v. Palmer/Duncan Constr. Co., 209 M 325, 682 P2d 695, 41 St. Rep. 738 (1984). See also Goggans v. Winkley, 159 M 85, 495 P2d 594 (1972), Allers v. Willis, 197 M 499, 643 P2d 592, 39 St. Rep. 745 (1982), and Thomsen v. St., 253 M 460, 833 P2d 1076, 49 St. Rep. 533 (1992).

Collateral Source Evidence Inadmissible — Possible Impact on Issue of Liability as Well as on Damages: The state contended that the introduction of collateral source evidence was harmless because the jury found that the state's negligence was not the proximate cause of plaintiff's injuries. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded the case on the basis that collateral source evidence can have an impact on the jury's verdict on the issue of liability as well as on damages. Thomsen v. St., 253 M 460, 833 P2d 1076, 49 St. Rep. 533 (1992).

Introduction of Insurance for Issue Other Than Showing Negligence or Liability — Joint Prosecution With Tort for Failure of Duty to Settle: This rule is not violated when an action against defendant is jointly prosecuted with an action against defendant's insurance company for failure of duty to settle under 33-18-201 because the issues of the actions are separate and because in prosecuting failure of duty to settle, insurance is introduced for purposes other than to show negligence or liability. Klaudt v. Flink, 202 M 247, 658 P2d 1065, 40 St. Rep. 64 (1983).

Instruction — Request Required: The plaintiff allegedly assaulted and threatened a witness with death if he did not testify favorably to the plaintiff's case. Testimony concerning the assault was admitted to show that the witness had a motive to testify falsely. The plaintiff was entitled to an instruction limiting the scope of the jury's consideration of the evidence to the specific purpose for which it was relevant. However, the trial judge has no duty to give a limiting instruction absent a request at trial from a party wishing to limit the scope of the consideration of the testimony. Cissel v. W. Plumbing & Heating, 188 M 149, 612 P2d 206, 37 St. Rep. 966 (1980).

Other Crime — Prejudice — Limited Use of Evidence: Testimony concerning another crime in the chain of events with the crime of which the defendant is accused, when used for impeachment purposes, may be admissible in a proper case. Since a stipulation stating the nature of the crime committed and the disposition of other prosecutions stemming from the crime had been read to the jury and since the defendant did not carry his burden of affirmatively showing prejudice, this was such a case. St. v. Holliday, 183 M 251, 598 P2d 1132, 36 St. Rep. 1535 (1979).

Rule 106. Remainder of or related acts, writings, or statements.

Commission Comments

Subdivision (a). This subdivision incorporates Federal Rule 106 with Section 93-401-11, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and case law developed under it. The Commission intends that this combination will preserve Montana's completeness rule; adopt the Federal Rule allowing the whole of a writing or recorded statement to be admitted, if fairness requires it, when part of the writing or recorded statement is introduced; and, result in a rule of completeness that codifies all of Montana case law so that scattered fragments of the rule of completeness do not have to be searched for when the rule is to be applied. Therefore the Commission believes that this incorporation of the Federal Rule and Montana law is a more accurate statement of the rule of completeness.

The subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 106 with these exceptions: "When part of an act, declaration, conversation, writing or recorded statement or series thereof" is substituted for "When a writing or recorded statement or part thereof" in the first clause; "(1)" is added and "of such item or series thereof" is substituted for "any other writing or recorded statement" and "at that time" is substituted for "contemporaneously with it" in paragraph (1); and paragraph (2) is added.

The subdivision begins with an expanded list of matters to be covered by the rule. Section 93-401-11, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], covers acts, declarations, conversations, and writings; Federal Rule 106 covers only writings and recorded statements. Therefore the rule adds the items from Montana law to the Federal Rule and the rule adds recorded statements to Montana law. This addition is consistent with the policy of Section 93-401-11, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], whose title reads: "When part of the transaction proved, the whole is admissible", and with the items listed in that section; the addition is intended to be a modernization of that section. The list includes not only part of such items, but also a series of such items which is a codification of the Montana practice. Northwestern Electric Equipment Co. v. Leighton, 66 Mont. 529, 536, 213 P 1094 (1923).

Paragraph (1) is a statement of the operational part of Federal Rule 106 which allows the adverse party the right to require the immediate introduction of all items of evidence which ought to be considered with part of the item of evidence being offered by the proponent of such evidence. The reason for this rule is that a mistaken impression gained by out of context evidence is hard to correct when the whole of the matter is not presented until later. Advisory Committee Note to Federal Rule 106, 46 F.R.D. 161, 194. A similar provision has already been adopted in Montana in [former] Rules 26(d)(4), M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded], allowing immediate introduction of all relevant parts of a deposition when a part is introduced; the same provision applies to interrogatories under [former] Rule 33, M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded] and use of depositions in criminal trials under Section 95-1802(c), R.C.M. 1947 [46-15-202].

Paragraph (2) is a statement of the operation of Montana law under Section 93-401-11, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and case law construing it which allows the adverse party the right to inquire into other evidence necessary to make the proponent's evidence understood at any time. The evidence needed to make the part introduced understood is not normally admitted until the adverse party presents his case. McGonigle v. Prudential Life Ins. Co., 100 Mont. 203, 223, 46 P2d 687 (1935) and Rasmussen v. Lee, 104 Mont. 278, 282, 66 P2d 119 (1937). The Montana completeness rule allows evidence which would ordinarily be inadmissible on its own to be admitted. McConnell v. Combination M & M Co., 30 Mont. 239, 263, 76 P 14 (1904) and Hulse v. N. Pac. Ry., 47 Mont. 59, 63, 130 P 415 (1913).

The two paragraphs follow the normal sequence of trial in that paragraph (1) allows the adverse party to immediately require that the remainder of evidence be admitted at the same time that the proponent's evidence is admitted when fairness requires. Paragraph (2) allows an inquiry by the adverse party at any time, but also gives him the right to introduce such evidence as part of his own case if paragraph (1) was not used. Failure to demand introduction under paragraph (1) would not waive the right to introduce this evidence later.

Therefore, this proposed rule expresses existing Montana law as well as expanding the completeness rule to include recorded statements and allows immediate introduction of the remainder of evidence to gain a complete impression, which is an expansion of [former] Rules 26(d)(4) and 33, M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded] and Section 95-1802(c), R.C.M. 1947 [46-15-202].

It should be noted that the trial court makes the final determination of how much evidence is needed to make a fair impression under this rule and to prevent abuses of the rule. The authority of the court to make such rulings is Rule 403, allowing exclusion of relevant evidence on the grounds of prejudice, confusion of issues, or misleading the jury and waste of time or undue delay; and Rule 611 allowing the court the authority to conduct trial.

Subdivision (b). This subdivision is original and therefore entirely different than Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 106. The Advisory Committee Note to Federal Rule 106, 46 F.R.D. 161, 194 states the same principle as this subdivision. The commission feels that the guarantee of the right of any party to cross-examine or further develop as part of his case matters covered by this rule is important enough to be stated in the rule. [Former] Rule 26(d)(4) and Rule 33 (by reference) M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded] and Section 95-1802(c), R.C.M. 1947 [46-15-202], state the same principle contained in Federal Rule 106 and proposed rule 106(a)(1) as applied to depositions and interrogatories and then conclude by giving any party the right to introduce any other part. There is no other Montana law specifically on this point, and therefore this would be new Montana law.

COMMISSION COMMENT TO JUNE 1990 AMENDMENT

The revision establishes gender neutral format only. No substantive change.

Compiler's Comments

1990 Amendment: Substituted gender neutral language for gender specific language. Amendment effective June 7, 1990.

Case Notes

Applicability of Completeness Doctrine to Supplementary Evidence: The prosecution conducted a 125-page interview with an expert witness. At trial, the state asked the expert about certain statements made during the interview. Defendant sought to have the entire transcript given to the jury because the state was taking the statements out of context. The trial court declined to admit the entire pretrial interview, holding that defendant could bring other relevant portions of the interview to the jury's attention, which defendant did not do. Pursuant to this rule, the doctrine of completeness permits examination of the balance or portions of the same document, correspondence, or conversation only when the portions, on balance, are relevant and throw light on the parts already admitted or that bear on the same subject. However, the rationale behind the inclusion of supplementary evidence is that it is allowed if it is needed to make the primary evidence understandable. Defendant failed to show which specific portions of the interview were relevant, so failure to allow admission of the entire interview transcript was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Whitlow, 285 M 430, 949 P2d 239, 54 St. Rep. 1227 (1997).

Nonself Inculpatory Statements Not Admissible: Portions of a statement that tend to subject the declarant to criminal liability are properly admitted under Rule 804(b)(3), M.R.Ev., as an exception to the hearsay rule. The District Court erred in admitting those portions of the statement that tended to implicate the defendant. This rule is separate and distinct from the hearsay rule and does not make admissible statements that would otherwise be inadmissible. St. v. Castle, 285 M 363, 948 P2d 688, 54 St. Rep. 1194 (1997).

Parol Evidence: Buechler entered into a contract with Payne, granting him the right to sell Buechler's property. Payne's copy of the contract stated that the listing was exclusive. Buechler offered parol evidence that Payne had written "nonexclusive" on her copy of the contract. Her copy was destroyed and therefore was not introduced. The court held that the parol evidence was inadmissible under the parol evidence rule and that Rule 106, M.R.Ev. and former Rule 32(a)(4), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), cannot render this otherwise inadmissible parol evidence admissible. Payne v. Buechler, 192 M 311, 628 P2d 646, 38 St. Rep. 799 (1981).

Variation of Terms of Written Contract Held Improper — Evidentiary Rule as Procedural Rule Only: In an action to collect the amount due under a promissory note, the District Court erred in allowing the plaintiff to prove that the terms of a written contract concerning only the terms of sale of a bar also applied to a previous sale of another business. Rule 106, M.R.Ev., relied on by the District Court to vary the clear terms of the parties' written agreement, is a procedural rule concerning the introduction of only a portion of a whole agreement and cannot be used to affect the substance of the existing law of parol evidence. Spraggins v. Elvidge, 192 M 8, 625 P2d 1151, 38 St. Rep. 493 (1981).

No Error in Limiting Right of Cross-Examination — Ancillary Portions of Statements to Police: The omission of ancillary portions of defendant's statement to the police concerning defendant's willingness to cooperate with police did not constitute reversible error under Rule 106, M.R.Ev., which imposes an obligation to enter sufficient portions of testimony so as to not create a misleading impression. St. v. Sheriff, 190 M 131, 619 P2d 181, 37 St. Rep. 1793 (1980), followed in Cline v. Durden, 246 M 154, 803 P2d 1077, 47 St. Rep. 2306 (1990).

Withholding Statement Irrelevant: In a prosecution for failure to file proper tax returns, it was proper for the court to refuse to admit into evidence a tax withholding statement, although evidence of defendant's income was admitted. The payment of taxes by withholding was irrelevant to the issue of whether proper returns were filed and could have confused the jury. St. v. Poncelet, 187 M 528, 610 P2d 698, 37 St. Rep. 760 (1980).

"Completeness Doctrine" Distinct From Hearsay Rules: The Supreme Court rejected the State's argument that by questioning police officers as to an informant's name and involvement in burglaries, defense counsel "opened the door" to hearsay testimony regarding communications between police and the informant about defendant's participation in the burglaries. The issues were separate. The so-called "completeness doctrine" relied on by the State in this regard is a rule of evidence distinct from hearsay rules. St. v. Campbell, 178 M 15, 582 P2d 783, 35 St. Rep. 1080 (1978), followed in Simmons Oil Corp. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 1998 MT 129, 289 M 119, 960 P2d 291, 55 St. Rep. 508 (1998).

Article II Judicial Notice

Rule 201. Judicial notice of facts.

Commission Comments

This rule governs judicial notice of facts. See Rule 202 for judicial notice of law.

(a) Scope of rule. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 201(a) except that it does not use the term "adjudicative facts". The Commission believes that use of the terms "adjudicative" and "legislative" facts as is done with Federal Rule 201 is confusing and that they cannot be readily or easily applied to all factual situations. The Commission rejects the approach under the Federal Rule 201 of limiting judicial notice to adjudicative facts because this is a basis which is totally new, not clearly defined, and contrary to existing Montana practice. The confusion and litigation bound to result are clearly contrary to a rule which is meant to save time and expense.

Section 93-501-1, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], is the primary statute on judicial notice in Montana. It lists eight categories of fact, most of which relate to judicial notice of law, covered in Rule 202. However, the last of these categories gives the impression that this subdivision of the rule is consistent with existing Montana law: "the laws of nature, the measure of time, and the geographical divisions and political history of the world". In addition, Section 93-1101-8, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], has been construed as a judicial notice statute, Lynes v. N. Pac. Ry., 43 Mont. 317, 327, 117 P 81 (1911), and is consistent with this subdivision in allowing "historical works, books of science or art, and published maps or charts" to be judicially noticed as items of "general notoriety and interest".

Therefore, the Commission intends to preserve existing law in Montana and hopefully encourage the expansion of the use of judicial notice to expedite the trial process.

(b) Kinds of facts. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 201(b) with the exception of the phrase "a fact to be judicially noticed" which is substituted for "a judicially noticed fact". This change is only to clarify the language of the section, as the Commission prefers the present tense of the proposed rule rather than the past tense of the Federal and Uniform Rule.

The Commission feels that the courts should take notice of facts only if they are not subject to reasonable dispute. If a fact is disputable, evidence should be introduced to support or deny it, and the trier of fact should then decide its existence. If a fact is not subject to a reasonable dispute, the court can save time and expense for all by judicially noticing it.

Existing Montana statute and case law on judicial notice is consistent with this subdivision. Facts to be judicially noticed under subdivision (b)(1) which are "generally known" have been judicially noticed in many cases in Montana using slightly different terminology that [than?] these facts are "common knowledge". See State ex rel. Schultz-Lindsay v. Board of Equalization, 145 Mont. 380, 401, 403 P2d 635 (1965) and Clark v. Worrall, 146 Mont. 374, 380, 406 P2d 822 (1965) for recent examples. Facts to be judicially noticed under subdivision (b)(2) which are "capable of accurate and ready determination by resort to sources whose accuracy cannot be reasonably questioned" are not judicially noticed under Sections 93-501-1, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and 93-1101-8, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], discussed in the Commission Notes to Rule 201(a). See Holtz v. Babcock, 143 Mont. 341, 370, 372, 389 P2d 869 (1964) for a strict statement by the Montana Supreme Court as to what matters should be judicially noticed.

(c) and (d) When discretionary and when mandatory. These subdivisions are identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 201(c) and (d). As stated in the Advisory Committee's Note to the Federal Rules, 46 F.R.D. 161, 203, these rules are believed to reflect existing practice and are simple and workable.

The Montana statute on judicial notice (Section 93-501-1, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]), does not indicate when a court may or when it must take judicial notice. Cases in Montana do not address themselves to the question; therefore the rule is apparently consistent with existing Montana law and practice. These subdivisions allow the court full discretion, within the limitations of Rule 201(b), to take judicial notice except when a party requests notice be taken and supplies the necessary information; that is, the information needed to satisfy the court that the fact fits within the limitations of Rule 201(b).

(e) Opportunity to be heard. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 201(e). No elaborate procedural safeguards are provided because it is contemplated that usual practices of notifying parties that judicial notice has been requested or taken will be followed. The rule provides the right to be heard as to the propriety of taking judicial notice, whether advance notification is given or not. Often notification is not given because of nonrecognition that judicial notice has been taken. This rule was adopted on the assumption that the discretion of the judge and parties will dictate how elaborate a hearing will be held. The issue at the hearing will be whether the fact to be judicially noticed falls within the limitations of subdivisions (a) and (b) of the rule. It should be noted that judicial notice by a trial court is reviewable by appellate courts, and for the sake of clarity and convenience the fact that judicial notice has been taken and the source of information should be a part of the record.

Existing Montana statutes and case law on judicial notice do not provide for any notification or opportunity to be heard. Therefore this section is new Montana law.

(f) Time of taking notice. This section is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 201(f). It is in accord with the usual view, accepted in Montana case law but not provided for by statute, that either a trial or appellate court can take judicial notice. Therefore there is no change in Montana law.

(g) Instructing the jury. This subdivision is identical to Federal Rule 201(g). The first part of this subdivision, dealing with civil cases, is consistent with Section 93-2501-2, R.C.M. 1947 [25-7-102 and 26-1-201], providing that the jury is bound to accept facts judicially noticed. The second part of the subdivision, dealing with criminal cases, is inconsistent with Montana case law. Criminal cases in Montana which have dealt with judicial notice have not mentioned any different means of instructing the jury than in civil cases and so instructed the jury to accept facts judicially noticed: State v. Slothower, 56 Mont. 230, 236, 182 P 270 (1919) that the moon was out on a certain night; State v. Williams, 122 Mont. 279, 282, 202 P2d 245 (1949) that venue was established; State v. Wild, 130 Mont. 476, 491, 305 P2d 325 (1956) that vodka is an intoxicating liquor; and State v. Peters, 146 Mont. 188, 198, 405 P2d 642 (1965) that venue was established. It is highly unlikely that any different result will be obtained under the Rule 201(g) since 201(b) allows judicial notice of indisputable facts such as those judicially noticed in the above cited cases [and] the jury would very probably find in accordance such indisputable facts. The Commission feels that there is no strong reason to ignore the civil-criminal distinction of the Federal Rule while there are these reasons to adopt it: first, it will be uniform with the Federal Rule, and second, it insures that all facts necessary to prove each element of a crime will be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, not dictated to be found through judicial notice in instructing the jury. This view is consistent with the reason for Congressional changes in this subdivision to its present form because mandatory instructions in criminal cases are "contrary to the spirit of the Sixth Amendment right to a jury trial".

Case Notes

Judicial Notice of Father's Income Determination Under Separate Action — Refusal to Take Judicial Notice of Underlying Facts — No Abuse of Discretion: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it took judicial notice of the existence of a Child Support Enforcement Division determination of a father's income under Rule 202, M.R.Ev., or when it refused to take judicial notice of the underlying facts concerning the determination under Rule 201, M.R.Ev. Although the father argued that the District Court was required to accept the decision of an administrative law judge concerning his income in an unrelated action, the District Court was not required to take judicial notice of reasonably disputed facts concerning the father's income because the mother in the current case did not have standing to challenge the previous income determination. In re Marriage of Carter-Scanlon, 2014 MT 97, 374 Mont. 434, 322 P.3d 1033.

Evidence of Parent's Conviction for Sexual Abuse of Child Sufficient Basis for Termination of Parental Rights: The state petitioned to terminate C.T.'s parental rights on grounds that his child S.T. and the child's mother had lived with C.T. for 2 years, that C.T. was a convicted sex offender, and that both mother and child had been exposed to domestic violence. Without objection, the District Court took judicial notice of C.T.'s conviction for sexual intercourse with a minor and granted the state's petition. C.T. appealed on grounds that the court abused its discretion by terminating his parental rights on the basis of facts not alleged in the petition or supported by the evidence, asserting that even though the court took judicial notice of the conviction, that court never received the documents into evidence and therefore erred by relying on that evidence in entering its findings of fact. The Supreme Court declined to recognize a distinction between taking judicial notice and entering the noticed facts into evidence. In a civil proceeding, judicially noticed facts are accepted as conclusive, and once a fact is judicially noticed, the party offering the evidence is relieved of the duty to also move for its admission. Thus, C.T.'s conviction was not subject to reasonable dispute, and the District Court was entitled to rely on the conviction as clear and convincing evidence that C.T. had sexually abused a child and to rely on 41-3-423(2)(a) as a statutory basis for terminating C.T.'s parental rights. The District Court was affirmed. In re S.T., 2008 MT 19, 341 M 176, 176 P3d 1054 (2008).

Judicial Notice of Mother's Prior Termination Proceeding in Action to Terminate Father's Parental Rights — No Error: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after taking judicial notice of the sealed record of the mother's prior termination proceeding. The father asserted error because the court took notice of facts that were not known and could not be discovered by the father. The Supreme Court disagreed. Rule 202, M.R.Ev., and this rule allow the District Court to take judicial notice of certain facts of record. Although sealed, the record was not entirely inaccessible because the father could have petitioned for disclosure of the records under 41-3-205, but he did not, even though he was aware of the prior proceeding. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Examination on Motion to Dismiss Limited to Contents of Complaint — Notice Required for Consideration of Materials Outside Pleading: Plouffe sued the state for tortious conduct, malicious prosecution, and defamation. The state moved for dismissal based on res judicata, and the District Court granted the state's motion, so Plouffe appealed. In considering the dismissal motion, the District Court relied on exhibits and materials related to other issues than those cited in the complaint. Plouffe noted that the exhibits could have been examined by converting the motion to one for summary judgment but that Plouffe would have been entitled to proper notice of the court's intention to do so. The state contended that the District Court was allowed to take judicial notice of the extraneous materials under this rule without converting the motion to one for summary judgment. The Supreme Court decided for Plouffe. On a motion to dismiss, the District Court may examine only whether a claim has been adequately stated in the complaint, and the court's examination is limited to the content of the complaint. Whether Plouffe's complaint was barred by res judicata could not be determined from the allegations of the complaint. The District Court could have ignored the exhibits and decided the motion based on the rules pertaining to a motion to dismiss, or the court could have converted the motion to one for summary judgment, which would have allowed Plouffe to present all material pertinent to the motion and to avoid surprise. However, judicial notice cannot circumvent the notice requirement in former Rule 12(b), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded). Plouffe's complaint did not challenge or present a collateral attack on a prior judgment, so the complaint could not be dismissed without converting the motion to dismiss to one for summary judgment. The District Court's failure to do so, and to notify Plouffe of its intent to do so, was reversible error. Plouffe v. St., 2003 MT 62, 314 M 413, 66 P3d 316 (2003). See also Glickman v. Whitefish Credit Union Ass'n, 1998 MT 8, 287 M 161, 951 P2d 1388 (1998).

Evidence of Market Value Not Presented — Replacement Value Insufficient to Prove Elements of Felony Theft: When fleeing from a pursuing police officer, Martin shot the officer and stole his service revolver. He was convicted of felony theft for exerting unauthorized control over the weapon. At trial, the only evidence presented as to the value of the revolver was an estimate of the replacement value, but no evidence was given regarding the market value. To prove felony theft, the value of the stolen property must be shown to exceed $500. By definition, value means the market value of the property at the time and place of the crime. Replacement value is to be used only if market value cannot be satisfactorily ascertained. Here, the state relied solely on replacement value and presented no evidence of market value or evidence that market value could not be ascertained. Having failed to meet the burden of proof regarding value, the essential elements of felony theft were not shown and the conviction was reversed. St. v. Martin, 2001 MT 83, 305 M 123, 23 P3d 216 (2001).

Sale of Automobile Franchise — Error in Failure to Resolve Mootness as Threshold Issue Before Underlying Dispute Addressed: Ford Motor Company (Ford) notified franchisee Shamrock Motors (Shamrock) that it intended to terminate Shamrock's automobile dealer franchise because Shamrock had sold 80% of its stock without Ford's knowledge or consent, which violated their franchise agreement. The Motor Vehicle Division of the Department of Justice issued a ruling that Ford had good cause, so Shamrock filed for judicial review in the District Court. Ford then removed to federal court, where the ruling was reversed, so Ford appealed to the Ninth Circuit Court. Shamrock then sold the dealership, and the decision was vacated because of lack of jurisdiction. The case was remanded to state court, where Ford moved to dismiss for mootness. The District Court denied the motion without discussion and ruled for Shamrock, concluding that the franchise could not be terminated as a result of the sale of 80% of the franchise stock. Reversing on appeal, the Supreme Court cited Adkins v. Livingston, 121 M 528, 194 P2d 238 (1948), in holding that mootness is a threshold issue that must be dealt with before the underlying dispute may be addressed. A matter is moot when, because of an event or happening, the issue has ceased to exist and no longer presents an actual controversy. A question is moot when a court cannot grant effective relief. If the parties cannot be restored to their original position, an appeal becomes moot. When Shamrock chose to sell the franchise during the appellate process, the question of whether Ford had good cause to terminate the franchise in the first instance became academic and thus moot. The District Court erred when it did not resolve the issue of mootness before addressing the merits of the claim, not recognizing that once Shamrock sold the dealership and was no longer the franchisee, there was no effective relief that the court could fashion under Title 61, ch. 4, part 2, so the appeal from the Motor Vehicle Division's ruling should have been dismissed as moot. Shamrock Motors, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 1999 MT 21, 293 M 188, 974 P2d 1150, 56 St. Rep. 99 (1999), followed in Shamrock Motors, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., 1999 MT 39, 293 M 317, 974 P2d 1154, 56 St. Rep. 164 (1999).

Newspaper Articles Improperly Attached to Opening Brief Set Aside: Counsel for the Franks attached several irrelevant newspaper articles to an opening brief, contending that it was permissible to supplement the record on appeal with judicially recognizable material. The Supreme Court found that the articles were not judicially recognizable under this rule and were improperly attached to the brief. Affirming the District Court decision to set aside a default judgment, the Supreme Court cited Downs v. Smyk, 185 M 16, 604 P2d 307 (1979), in cautioning counsel against attempting to introduce extraneous evidence by the back door via attachment to briefs, a practice that is not tolerated. Frank v. Harding, 1998 MT 215, 290 M 448, 965 P2d 254, 55 St. Rep. 903 (1998), distinguishing In re Establishment & Organization of Ward Irrigation District, 216 M 315, 701 P2d 721, 42 St. Rep. 824 (1985).

General Objection to Judicial Notice Insufficient to Preserve Issue on Appeal: Loh was charged with criminal possession of a controlled substance and sought to have her confession suppressed. The District Court denied the motion to suppress, and Loh was tried on the charge. At the trial, the prosecution requested the District Court to take judicial notice of the testimony of several firefighters given at the suppression hearing. The District Court agreed, over Loh's objection, saying that judicial notice of that former testimony was the very purpose contemplated by this rule. The Supreme Court held that the general objection made by Loh's counsel at the suppression hearing was an insufficient objection. The Supreme Court also noted that if there was error, it was harmless error and that Loh failed to make a further objection as to the sufficiency of any evidence offered at trial. St. v. Loh, 275 M 460, 914 P2d 592, 53 St. Rep. 226 (1996).

Admissibility of Unsworn Medical Reports: Under the rationale of ARM 24.5.317, adopted in 1990, medical records based on an examination of the claimant and exchanged between the parties are admissible without the necessity of foundation testimony. Miller v. Frasure, 264 M 354, 871 P2d 1302, 51 St. Rep. 233 (1994), overruling Hert v. Lumberman Mut. Cas. Co., 178 M 355, 584 P2d 656 (1978).

Court Observations Beyond Scope of Judicial Notice in STAB Case: The District Court erred in reviewing a contested State Tax Appeal Board (now Montana Tax Appeal Board) case when its observations of the business-generating capability of a motel could only be verified by income statements of other area motels, data which was not generally known or capable of accurate and ready determination. Such empirical observations passed beyond the scope of judicial notice and bordered on judicial impression. O'Neill v. Dept. of Revenue, 227 M 226, 739 P2d 456, 44 St. Rep. 1037 (1987), followed in Leahy v. Dept. of Revenue, 266 M 94, 879 P2d 653, 51 St. Rep. 665 (1994).

Medical Community "Conspiracy of Silence": The so-called conspiracy of silence in the medical community does not fall within the category of the type of facts that can be judicially noticed. Clark v. Norris, 226 M 43, 734 P2d 182, 44 St. Rep. 444 (1987).

Incorrect Calculations Inappropriate for Judicial Notice — Harmless Error: The trial court took judicial notice of two calculations that proved incorrect. The inferences drawn from these figures were used to support the court's decision. The Supreme Court stated that the trial court erred by taking judicial notice of facts not appropriate for judicial notice, but the error was harmless since other evidence supported the court's decision. Rose v. Myers, 223 M 13, 724 P2d 176, 43 St. Rep. 1493 (1986).

Prejudice in Failure to Admit Documents Negated by Judicial Notice: The District Court refused to admit into evidence documents which might have suggested that the transfer of a ranch was invalid, holding that the documents were irrelevant. However, the court agreed to take judicial notice of a file containing the documents in a separate action brought against the copersonal representatives. The Supreme Court held that any prejudice caused by the District Court's failure to admit the documents into evidence was therefore negated. In re Estate of Mattila, 221 M 262, 718 P2d 343, 43 St. Rep. 797 (1986).

Judicial Notice of Maps and Descriptions on Appeal: In a dispute over control of an irrigation district's headgate, the Supreme Court permitted submission on appeal of government survey descriptions and maps that had not been introduced as evidence at trial. The court reasoned: first, that the commission comments to Rule 201, M.R.Ev., indicate that published maps or charts are included within the Rule's scope; and second, that maps and descriptions are acceptable articles of evidence by which to show a water right in the adjudication process. In re Establishment & Organization of Ward Irrigation District, 216 M 315, 701 P2d 721, 42 St. Rep. 824 (1985), distinguished in Frank v. Harding, 1998 MT 215, 290 M 448, 965 P2d 254, 55 St. Rep. 903 (1998).

Inflation Factor: In a petition to increase child support payments, the District Court used inflation as a factor to find an increased need for support. On appeal, the husband contended that this was error and that no evidence of inflation's effects on him had been presented. On appeal, the Supreme Court found no merit in the argument, saying, "Today inflation is not open to reasonable dispute." Reynolds v. Reynolds, 203 M 97, 660 P2d 90, 40 St. Rep. 321 (1983).

Judicial Notice of Aliases Properly Taken: In a prosecution for theft by accountability, there was sufficient evidence of the defendant's presence at the scene of the offense, as proved by her fingerprints on certain glassware, to uphold the conviction. The fact that the fingerprint card showed that the prints belonged to the defendant as identified by her maiden name rather than her married name is unimportant. The trial court may take judicial notice of the defendant's aliases to prove that the fingerprints were hers. St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21, 38 St. Rep. 133 (1981).

Theft by Accountability — Judicial Notice of Principals' Guilt Properly Taken: In a prosecution for theft by accountability the trial court did not err in taking judicial notice of the State's charges that two associates of the defendant actually committed the theft. There was ample direct evidence to show that the two women charged with the theft directly were associates of the defendant. The charges against the women qualified for judicial notice, and any taint resulting from the taking of judicial notice by the court was removed by the court's cautionary instruction to the jury that it was not bound by the decision of the court. St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21, 38 St. Rep. 133 (1981), followed in St. v. Oatman, 275 M 139, 911 P2d 213, 53 St. Rep. 74 (1996).

No Notice of Value — Essential Element of Felony Theft: Where the State failed to present any evidence that the value of the personalty allegedly taken by the defendant was greater than the minimum required by statute, defendant was not required to object prior to the entry of judgment, because value is an essential element of the crime of felony theft and such an error may be raised at any time. The Supreme Court refused to take judicial notice of the value of the property because it was an essential element of the crime charged and the jury was not properly instructed as to value. St. v. Sunday, 187 M 292, 609 P2d 1188, 37 St. Rep. 561 (1980).

Workers' Compensation Court: The rules of evidence are more relaxed in an administrative proceeding than in a court of law, but due process will not be disregarded. The right to cross-examination is a constitutionally protected fundamental right and not an evidentiary rule. Section 2-4-612(5) makes this right absolute. The Workers' Compensation Judge may only consider evidence which is offered at the hearing or of which he may take judicial notice. A judicially noticed fact must be one not subject to reasonable dispute. Disputed medical conclusions by doctors contained in medical reports cannot be judicially noticed. Hert v. Lumberman Mut. Cas. Co., 178 M 355, 584 P2d 656, 35 St. Rep. 1345 (1978), distinguishing Stevens v. Glacier Gen. Assurance Co., 176 M 61, 575 P2d 1326 (1978), and clarified and rehearing denied in Hert v. Lumberman Mut. Cas. Co., 179 M 160, 587 P2d 11 (1978). Hert was held to no longer be authority for admissibility of medical records, in light of the 1990 adoption of ARM 24.5.317, in Miller v. Frasure, 264 M 354, 871 P2d 1302, 51 St. Rep. 233 (1994).

Rule 202. Judicial notice of law.

Commission Comments

(a) Scope of rule. This section is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 201(a) except that changes are made to indicate that the rule governs judicial notice of law rather than fact. There is no Federal rule equivalent to this rule. The Advisory Committee Note to Federal Rule 201, 46 F.R.D. 161, 196, states that this area is a proper concern for rules of procedure; however, the Commission feels that rules facilitating proof of law are the proper concern of rules of evidence. Under [former] Rule 9(d) M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded] ordinances and statutes must be pled as special matters: the Commission Note to that rule states that it is "consistent with and complementary to" sections 93-501-2 to 93-501-8, R.C.M. 1947 [all superseded], the Uniform Judicial Notice of Foreign Law Act, which is what much of this rule is based upon. The same comment is applicable here. This rule is intended to expedite proving foreign law. For instance, procedures under Section 93-1001-1, et seq., R.C.M. 1947 [2-6-101 (now repealed), 2-6-102 (now repealed), 1-1-102 through 1-1-105], on public writings could be facilitated under this rule.

The existing Montana law on judicial notice of law is covered by R.C.M. 1947, Sections 82-4208 [2-4-505], judicial notice in the Administrative Procedure Act; 93-501-1(2) through (7) [superseded], the general judicial notice statute; 93-501-2 through 93-501-8 [all superseded], the Uniform Judicial Notice of Foreign Law Act; and [former] M.R.Civ.P. Rule 44.1 [now superseded], judicial notice of the law of foreign nations. These provisions do not adequately cover all law of all jurisdictions, nor do they cover all law in criminal cases. Rather than attempt to amend these provisions, the Commission adopts this rule in order to clarify and codify what it feels should be the rule on judicial notice of law. The rule serves to replace and is consistent with some of these provisions, but is inconsistent with some Montana case law detailed in the Commission Comments to Rule 202(b). (For a similar provision, see Nevada Revised Statutes, Section 47.140 and Wisconsin Rules of Evidence Sections 902.02 and 902.03.)

(b) Kinds of law. This subdivision is original and therefore entirely different than either the Federal or Uniform Rules of Evidence (1974) Rule 201(b). It was adopted because a series of Montana cases have limited judicial notice of law to a few areas. The Commission feels a broader approach is more in keeping with the goals of judicial notice: promoting convenience and expediting the administration of justice. To achieve these purposes, a broad list has been made, but it is not intended to be exclusive.

Paragraph (1) is taken from Section 93-501-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and therefore no change occurs as a result of its adoption.

Paragraph (2) is taken from the A.L.I. Model Code (1942) and is a change in Montana law. Although the Montana Supreme Court has judicially noticed city charters (Drew v. City of Butte, 44 Mont. 124, 125, 119 P 279 (1911)), it has refused to allow judicial notice of their ordinances. Carey v. Guest, 78 Mont. 415, 430, 258 P 236 (1927); Dineen v. City of Butte, 83 Mont. 370, 374, 272 P 243 (1928). Therefore this would be a change in the law but, the Commission feels, a sensible and convenient one.

Paragraph (3) is from the California Evidence Code covering judicial notice of acts of administrative agencies and is apparently not a change in Montana law. The court's first case on this subject allowed judicial notice of rules and regulations as acts of the executive department of the United States (U.S. v. Williams, 6 Mont. 379, 387, 12 P 851 (1887)) and as having the force and effect of Federal statutes (Johnson v. County of Lincoln, 50 Mont. 253, 256, 146 P 471 (1915)) and of the public and private official acts of the legislative and executive departments of the United States. Grosfield v. First National Bank of Miles City, 73 Mont. 219, 232, 236 P 250 (1925). However, the court refused to recognize administrative rules of Montana's Industrial Accident Board on the grounds that the board was quasi-judicial and judicial notice of rules of court was not allowed. Williams v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 96 Mont. 204, 211, 29 P2d 785 (1934). This decision was followed in other cases: State v. Andre, 101 Mont. 366, 368, 54 P2d 566 (1936); State ex rel. Magelo v. Industrial Accident Board, 102 Mont. 455, 461, 59 P2d 785 (1936). The court did, however, take judicial notice of the Montana Agriculture Commissioner's rules and regulations. Northern Montana Mustard Growers Co-op v. Britton, 128 Mont. 553, 567, 280 P2d 1078 (1955). Under Section 82-4208, R.C.M. 1947 [2-4-505], the Administrative Procedure Act, courts are to take judicial notice of rules and regulations.

Paragraph (4) is from the California Evidence Code. Montana law has a similar provision, Section 93-501-1(3) [superseded], and the Montana Supreme Court has taken notice of these acts in several cases. Therefore there is no change from present Montana law.

Paragraph (5) is taken from the Model Code and is recognized in Montana by case law. State ex rel. Goodman v. Stewart, 57 Mont. 144, 169, 187 P 641 (1920); Vaughn & Ragsdale v. State Board of Equalization, 109 Mont. 52, 56, 96 P2d 420 (1939). It represents no change from Montana law.

Paragraph (6) is from the California Evidence Code and in part may represent a change from Montana law. A long line of cases, the most recent being Sikora v. Sikora, 160 Mont. 27, 34, 499 P2d 808, 812 (1972), has held that courts may take judicial notice of records of the same case and any other cases; however, proceedings in courts of another state have not been allowed to be judicially noticed. In re Estate of Bruhns, 58 Mont. 526, 529, 193 P 1114 (1920). The Bruhns case is the only one that has followed this rule, and since the passage of the Uniform Judicial Notice of Foreign Law Act, it would seem proper to change it. Therefore, to the extent that records of any court of record of any state or the United States can be judicially noticed, this is a change in law.

Paragraph (7) is taken from the California Evidence Code and represents a change in existing Montana law. A line of cases, the most recent being Coleman v. District Court, 120 Mont. 372, 377, 186 P2d 91 (1947), has held that the local court rules will not be judicially noticed. However, the Commission feels that to adequately cover a rule on judicial notice of law, this area should be included, there being little reason for not changing the rule as the Supreme Court is promulgating rules of court and local court rules are available in any county courthouse.

Paragraph (8) is taken from the California Evidence Code, is in compliance with [former] Rule 44.1, M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded], and represents no change in existing Montana law.

Paragraphs (9) and (10) are original and would be new Montana law.

Paragraph (11) is taken from Section 93-501-1(4), (5), (6) and (7), R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]. It retains existing Montana law allowing the court to take judicial notice of a wide variety of seals of officials of government and seals of notaries public. This paragraph is intended to allow more expeditious use of Rules 902(1), (2), (3) and (4) dealing with authentication of documents and seals.

(c) and (d) When discretionary and when mandatory. These subdivisions are based on Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 201(c) and (d) with changes and additions from existing Montana R.C.M. 1947 Sections 93-501-2 and 93-501-3 [both superseded] to make the rule compatible with this rule on judicial notice of law.

The first sentence of subdivision (c) allows the court complete discretion in taking judicial notice of all law such as those laws listed in paragraphs (2) through (10) of Rule 202(b). Subdivision (d) requires judicial notice to be taken of the law listed in Rule 202(b)(1), as also required by Section 93-501-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and other law, when requested. Allowing the court to take judicial notice, whether requested or not, in subdivision (c) and making judicial notice mandatory when requested in subdivision (d) follows the Federal and Uniform Rules approach and is believed to be simple and workable, as well as current Montana practice.

Slight changes in language have been made from the present Section 93-501-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], which are only intended to make these statutes clearer, not to change their meaning. Therefore, there is no change from existing Montana law.

(e) Opportunity to be heard. This subdivision is identical to Federal Rule 201(e) except for the substitution of the word "law" for "matter" in the phrase "tenor of the law noticed". As stated in the Commission Comments to Rule 201(e) no elaborate procedure is outlined, for it is felt that none is needed. The issue to be presented at the hearing would be whether the proper law was judicially noticed. This section is new and represents no change in existing Montana law.

(f) Time of taking notice. Paragraph (1) of this subdivision is based upon Federal Rule 201(f) in that it allows judicial notice to be taken at any stage of the proceeding but only judicial notice of the law of this state and the United States. Paragraph (2) is based upon Section 93-501-5, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and requires that notice be given for judicial notice of other law. This notice requirement is also contained in [former] Rule 44.1 M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded]. H & J Gross, Inc. v. Fraser, 140 Mont. 95, 97, 368 P.2d 163 (1962) construed the statutory provision as putting the duty on the court to make an independent determination of the correct foreign law. In order that this may be done, paragraph (2) requires notification to be given: a reasonable amount of time can be allowed the court to properly examine and determine the foreign law. Both paragraphs are consistent with existing Montana law.

(g) Question for the court. This section is taken from Section 93-501-4, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and is not similar to any of the Federal Rules of Evidence. The phrase “except as otherwise provided by law” refers to unusual situations where the jury is directed by law to determine the law, as in The 1972 Constitution of the State of Montana, Article II, Section 7: “... In all suits and prosecutions for libel and slander the truth thereof may be given in evidence; and the jury, under the direction of the court, shall determine the law and facts”. In all other situations it is anticipated that taking judicial notice of the law will be a question for the court and not for the jury. This section is therefore consistent with existing Montana law.

Case Notes

Vexatious Litigant Status Declared During Appeal — Court Approval Required for Future Pro Se Litigation by Appellant: While an appeal was pending in the Supreme Court, the appellees filed a joint motion requesting an order declaring that the appellant was a vexatious litigant. After taking judicial notice of prior court filings by the appellant and finding that the applicable factors in Motta v. Granite County Comm’rs, 2013 MT 172, 370 Mont. 469, 304 P.3d 720, were satisfied, the Supreme Court concluded that the appellant was a vexatious litigant. However, given the broad range of litigation the appellant brought in multiple judicial districts, the Supreme Court could not determine how to effectively narrow a prefilng order to a particular type of claim. As such, the Supreme Court ordered that before the appellant could file any pleading pro se in a Montana District Court or the Supreme Court, he was required to obtain prefilng approval from the court in which he seeks to file. The order was sent to all Montana District Courts. Stokes v. First Am. Title Co. of Mont., Inc., 2017 MT 275, 389 Mont. 245, 406 P.3d 439. See also McCann v. McCann, 2018 MT 207, 392 Mont. 385, 425 P.3d 682, requiring that a former attorney deemed a vexatious litigant must gain court approval prior to filing.

Judicial Notice of Father’s Income Determination Under Separate Action — Refusal to Take Judicial Notice of Underlying Facts — No Abuse of Discretion: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it took judicial notice of the existence of a Child Support Enforcement Division determination of a father’s income under Rule 202, M.R.Ev., or when it refused to take judicial notice of the underlying facts concerning the determination under Rule 201, M.R.Ev. Although the father argued that the District Court was required to accept the decision of an administrative law judge concerning his income in an unrelated action, the District Court was not required to take judicial notice of reasonably disputed facts concerning the father’s income because the mother in the current case did not have standing to challenge the previous income determination. In re Marriage of Carter-Scanlon, 2014 MT 97, 374 Mont. 434, 322 P.3d 1033.

No Judicial Notice of Prior Testimony When Witness Unavailable to Testify at Criminal Trial — Prior Testimony Not Pertinent to Charges: The defendant was convicted of exploiting her elderly mother by convincing her to take out a reverse mortgage and using the proceeds to pay off the defendant’s own debts. Prior to trial, at a hearing regarding the mother’s competency, the District Court determined she was competent to testify at trial; however, the mother’s health deteriorated by the time of trial, and she was no longer able to testify. The defendant asked the trial court to take judicial notice of the transcript of her mother’s testimony at the competency hearing. The court refused to take notice and the defendant was convicted. The defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which affirmed the District Court’s conclusion that the mother’s testimony about her own competency was not pertinent to the charges against her daughter. St. v. Homer, 2014 MT 57, 374 Mont. 157, 321 P.3d 77.

District Court Assuming Subject Matter Jurisdiction Over Estate When Tribal Council Unequivocally Declined to Assert Subject Matter Jurisdiction — No Error: A court may take judicial notice of records of any court of this state or of any court of record of the United States or any court of record of any state of the United States. A tribal court order, though not expressly listed in the rule, is a record analogous to those listed in Rule 202(b)(6), M.R.Ev., and is thus law of which the Supreme Court may take judicial notice. In re Estate of Gopher, 2013 MT 264, 372 Mont. 9, 310 P.3d 521.

No Error in Failure of Trial Court to Take Judicial Notice of Evidence in Separate Trial: Fish requested that the court in his trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent take judicial notice of evidence in a separate, previous trial in which Fish was acquitted on a severed charge of sexual intercourse without consent. The court declined, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Judicial notice is confined to matters that are relevant to the issues at hand. Aside from Fish's status as defendant in both cases, nothing was presented that indicated that the two cases were related in any way, so it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to decline to take judicial notice of evidence from the prior trial. St. v. Fish, 2009 MT 47, 349 M 286, 204 P3d 681 (2009), following St. v. Ditton, 2006 MT 235, 333 M 483, 144 P3d 783 (2006).

No Improper Bifurcation of Adjudicatory and Dispositional Hearings Based on Noticed Testimony From Earlier Show Cause Hearing: A parent argued that adjudicatory and dispositional hearings were improperly bifurcated because the District Court took notice of and improperly relied upon expert testimony offered at an earlier show cause hearing. The state argued that a court may take notice of the records of any court in the state. The Supreme Court noted that the District Court allowed the parent to move for reconsideration at the hearing of its judicial notice of testimony from the previous hearing, but the parent did not move for reconsideration. Because the District Court also determined that there was sufficient evidence at the later hearing, without reliance on the noticed testimony, to sustain a finding of abuse and neglect and because the parent did not establish that use of the noticed testimony was a disadvantage, no error was demonstrated. In re S.C. & L.Z., 2005 MT 241, 328 M 476, 121 P3d 552 (2005).

Judicial Notice of Mother's Prior Termination Proceeding in Action to Terminate Father's Parental Rights — No Error: The District Court terminated a father's parental rights after taking judicial notice of the sealed record of the mother's prior termination proceeding. The father asserted error because the court took notice of facts that were not known and could not be discovered by the father. The Supreme Court disagreed. Rule 201, M.R.Ev. and this rule allow the District Court to take judicial notice of certain facts of record. Although sealed, the record was not entirely inaccessible because the father could have petitioned for disclosure of the records under 41-3-205, but he did not, even though he was aware of the prior proceeding. In re K.C.H., 2003 MT 125, 316 M 13, 68 P3d 788 (2003).

Judicial Notice of Prior Court Orders in Fraudulent Conveyance Case: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in basing a finding regarding a fraudulent conveyance action on the record submitted by plaintiffs referring to a default judgment in an earlier intentional interference and assault action, contending that judicial notice of the prior case amounted to impermissible hearsay and did not comport with the purpose for which judicial notice exists. The Supreme Court noted that this rule provides that a court may take judicial notice of records of any court of this state or any other U.S. or state court of record. The finding in question was supported by substantial credible evidence, was not clearly erroneous, and was thus affirmed. Farmers Plant Aid, Inc. v. Fedder, 2000 MT 87, 299 M 206, 999 P2d 315, 57 St. Rep. 375 (2000), followed in Estate of Kinnaman v. Mtn. W. Bank, 2016 MT 25, 382 Mont. 153, 365 P.3d 486.

Sale of Automobile Franchise — Error in Failure to Resolve Mootness as Threshold Issue Before Underlying Dispute Addressed: Ford Motor Company (Ford) notified franchisee Shamrock Motors (Shamrock) that it intended to terminate Shamrock's automobile dealer franchise because Shamrock had sold 80% of its stock without Ford's knowledge or consent, which violated their franchise agreement. The Motor Vehicle Division of the Department of Justice issued a ruling that Ford had good cause, so Shamrock filed for judicial review in the District Court. Ford then removed to federal court, where the ruling was reversed, so Ford appealed to the Ninth Circuit Court. Shamrock then sold the dealership, and the decision was vacated because of lack of jurisdiction. The case was remanded to state court, where Ford moved to dismiss for mootness. The District Court denied the motion without discussion and ruled for Shamrock, concluding that the franchise could not be terminated as a result of the sale of 80% of the franchise stock. Reversing on appeal, the Supreme Court cited Adkins v. Livingston, 121 M 528, 194 P2d 238 (1948), in holding that mootness is a threshold issue that must be dealt with before the underlying dispute may be addressed. A matter is moot when, because of an event or happening, the issue has ceased to exist and no longer presents an actual controversy. A question is moot when a court cannot grant effective relief. If the parties cannot be restored to their original position, an appeal becomes moot. When Shamrock chose to sell the franchise during the appellate process, the question of whether Ford had good cause to terminate the franchise in the first instance became academic and thus moot. The District Court erred when it did not resolve the issue of mootness before addressing the merits of the claim, not recognizing that once Shamrock sold the dealership and was no longer the franchisee, there was no effective relief that the court could fashion under Title 61, ch. 4, part 2, so the appeal from the Motor Vehicle Division's ruling should have been dismissed as moot. Shamrock Motors, Inc. v. Ford Motor Co., 1999 MT 21, 293 M 188, 974 P2d 1150, 56 St. Rep. 99 (1999), followed in Shamrock Motors, Inc. v. Chrysler Corp., 1999 MT 39, 293 M 317, 974 P2d 1154, 56 St. Rep. 164 (1999).

Attempted Assignment of Void Option Agreement — Judicial Notice: The District Court did not err in finding appellant was not entitled to exercise an option, which had been assigned to appellant, because the original option agreement between the respondent and the assignor was void. The District Court could take judicial notice of a separate action that had determined the invalidity of the option agreement at the time of the attempted assignment, and there was sufficient independent evidence that the option agreement was void. Berry v. Mann, 188 M 71, 610 P2d 1180, 37 St. Rep. 911 (1980).

Article III Presumptions

Rule 301. Presumptions in general.

Commission Comments

This rule governs all presumptions generally. See Rule 302 for presumptions controlled by Federal law.

(a) Definition of presumption. This subdivision is entirely different from both the Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 301. The rule is a complete departure from both of these rules which have the narrow objective of stating the effect of presumptions; therefore the rule is not comparable or equivalent to either of these rules. The Commission feels that all the law of evidence should be put in one place as much as possible; therefore a definition is placed in this subdivision and other basic concepts are contained in following subdivisions of the rule.

This definition in the rule is taken from West's Ann. Cal. Ev. Code, Section 600(a). Previously California defined presumptions in the exact language of the existing statutory definition, Section 93-1301-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], which provides: "A presumption is a deduction which the law expressly directs to be made from particular facts". The Comment to California Section 600(a) states that the new California definition is substantially the same as the old definition: the change apparently is made to clarify the wording. The Commission also intends the definition in the rule to be substantially the same as the existing statutory definition in Section 93-1301-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and that the changes are only for clarification.

The existing statutory definition, Section 93-1301-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], points out one distinguishing feature of a presumption: that the law directs it to be made. That is, once the facts giving rise to the presumption are established, the presumption must be found. However, the statute used the term "deduction" which implies that all presumptions result from some logical process. This is not true of all presumptions — some are based on public policy rather than logical deduction.

To incorporate both distinguishing features, the rule uses the terms "assumption of fact" rather than "deduction" and "that the law requires to be made" rather than "the law expressly directs to be made".

The present Montana rule that a presumption must be based on particular established facts and not on another presumption or inference is followed in this definition by the use of the phrase "from another fact or group of facts". See First National Bank of Glendive v. Sorenson, 65 Mont. 1, 13, 210 P 900 (1922); Kern v. Payne, 65 Mont. 325, 337, 211 P 767 (1922); Doran v. U.S. Bldg. and Loan Assoc. 94 Mont. 73, 76, 20 P2d 835 (1933); and Cavitt v. Seirson, 119 Mont. 437, 440, 175 P2d 67 (1946).

Finally, the phrase "found or otherwise established in the action or proceeding" makes clear that the facts giving rise to the presumption may be established by the pleadings, stipulation of the parties, or judicial notice, as well as by evidence.

(b) Classification and effect of presumptions. This subdivision is original and therefore entirely different from both Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 301; both state the effect, but neither contains a classification of presumptions. The effect given presumptions under the rule differs from either approach followed by the Federal or Uniform rule. The Federal rule gives presumptions the sole effect of shifting the burden of producing evidence to rebut or meet the presumption and does not shift the burden of persuasion. The Uniform rule gives presumptions the effect of shifting the burden of persuasion to rebut or meet the presumption.

The Commission rejects both of these rules because Montana has expressly rejected the approach contained in Federal Rule 301 (Lewis v. New York Life Ins. Co., 113 Mont. 151, 162, 124 P2d 579 (1942)) and goes further than the approach contained in Uniform Rule (1974) 301. The Commission adopts this subdivision to retain, codify, and clarify existing Montana law on the effect of presumptions.

Paragraph (1) contains the rule found in R.C.M. 1947, Sections 93-1301-5 [superseded], and 93-1301-6 [26-1-601] that conclusive presumptions are set out by statute and may not be controverted; it is therefore consistent with Montana law. The Commission does not intend to alter in any way the enumeration or effect of conclusive presumptions as declared by statute. (See Appendix, Table D for these presumptions [found at part compiler's comment, Title 26, ch. 1, part 6].)

Paragraph (2) contains the rules found in Section 93-1301-5, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], that all presumptions not declared conclusive are disputable and may be controverted; and that unless a presumption is overcome, the trier of fact is bound to find in accordance with it. The Montana Supreme Court has interpreted this section as well as R.C.M. 1947, Sections 93-1301-1 [superseded] (classifying presumptions as indirect evidence) and 93-2001-1(2) [26-1-303] (inferring that presumptions are to be weighed as evidence) to mean that presumptions have the effect of evidence.

The Commission believes the procedure and rule followed in Montana concerning presumptions is as follows: If evidence is introduced which gives rise to a presumption, and the presumption is not controverted or disputed, the trier of fact must find in accordance with the presumption. In order to avoid this and overcome a presumption, the rule necessarily requires that the burden of persuasion shift to the party against whom the presumption operates. See Holen v. Phelps, 131 Mont. 146, 152, 308 P2d 624 (1957) and cases cited therein. If evidence contrary to the presumption is introduced, the presumption is given the weight and effect of evidence and a question is raised for the trier of fact who may give the presumption such weight in the face of the contrary evidence as it thinks the presumption should have. See Lewis v. New York Life Ins. Co., supra; Williams v. Swords, 129 Mont. 165, 173, 284 P2d 674 (1955); Roseneau Foods Inc. v. Kohlman, 140 Mont. 572, 577, 374 P2d 87 (1962); Crissey v. State Highway Comm'n., 147 Mont. 374, 379, 413 P2d 308 (1966). An exception occurs when the contrary evidence is so overwhelmingly against the presumption as to lead to only one reasonable conclusion; then the matter becomes a question of law for the judge, not a question for the trier of fact. Welch v. All Persons, 85 Mont. 114, 134, 278 P 110 (1929); Nichols v. New York Life Ins. Co., 88 Mont. 132, 139, 292 P 203 (1930); Renland v. First Nat'l Bank, 90 Mont. 424, 4 P2d 488 (1931).

This subdivision may change existing Montana law by providing that a preponderance of evidence is required to overcome all disputable presumptions. Previously different amounts of evidence were apparently required to overcome different presumptions. For example: "slight proof", Sommers v. Gould, 53 Mont. 538, 545, 165 P 599 (1917); "substantial evidence", State ex rel. Rankin v. Martin, 68 Mont. 392, 404, 219 P 632 (1923); "preponderance of evidence", In re Wray's Estate, 93 Mont. 525, 535, 19 P2d 1051 (1933); "proof must be clear, satisfactory and convincing", In re Colbert's Estate, 31 Mont. 461, 468, 78 P 971 (1904); "conclusive evidence", Gardiner v. Eclipse Grocery, 72 Mont. 540, 550, 234 P 490 (1925); and "beyond a reasonable doubt", Spratt v. Helena Power Transmission Co., 37 Mont. 60, 79, 94 P 631 (1908). However, the Commission feels that in the interest of obtaining a simple, practical rule, one amount of evidence should be required and that amount should be a preponderance of the evidence.

With one exception the Commission does not intend to alter the enumeration or effect of the disputable presumptions declared by statute or common law. (See Appendix, Table D for these presumptions [found at part compiler's comments, Title 26, ch. 1, part 6].) The exception arises with Section 93-1301-7(34), R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-602(34), deleted from section by 1983 amendment], which deals with ancient documents. This presumption is changed slightly by two proposed rules: Rule 803(16), dealing with the hearsay aspect of ancient documents, and Rule 901(b)(8), dealing with the authentication aspects of these documents. (See the Commission Comments to those rules for further explanation.)

(c) Inconsistent presumptions. This subdivision is not included in the Federal Rules of Evidence, but was adopted by the Uniform Rules of Evidence (1974) Rule 301(b). The simplest solution to the problem arising when two or more presumptions conflict or arise from the same group of facts is to have the judge decide whether one of the presumptions is based on weightier considerations of public policy, but if none of the presumptions is weightier, to disregard all of the inconsistent presumptions. The rule that presumptions of weightier public policy overcome those of lesser weight is recognized in Montana. Burgess v. Lasby, 91 Mont. 481, 491, 9 P2d 164

(1932); McMahon v. Cooney, 95 Mont. 138, 144, 205 P2d 131 (1933); Platts v. Platts, 134 Mont. 474, 479, 344 P2d 722 (1959). The rule that if no presumption is of greater weight then all will be disregarded is not recognized and is therefore new to Montana law.

Case Notes

Presumption of Nonabandonment — 2005 Legislature's Amendments Procedural, Not Retroactive: In a water adjudication action, the community of Rimini argued that the city of Helena had abandoned a portion of its water claim to Ten Mile Creek. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the 2005 Legislature's amendments to 85-2-227, creating a presumption of nonabandonment for municipal use water rights, did not amount to a retroactive application of law because the effect of the 2005 amendments was procedural and not substantive. The Supreme Court additionally found that actions taken by Helena established a presumption of municipal nonabandonment, that the Water Court erred in determining that the city had abandoned a portion of its right, and that the city of Helena would have to notify the Attorney General under Rule 5.1 M.R.Civ.P. (Title 25, ch. 20) if it were to challenge the constitutionality of 85-2-234. In re Helena v. Community of Rimini, 2017 MT 145, 388 Mont. 1, 397 P.3d 1.

Determination That Marriage Irretrievably Broken Judicial Function, Not Conclusive Presumption: Before a court can enter a decree of dissolution, it must find that the marriage is irretrievably broken. The determination that a marriage is irretrievably broken is a judicial function, rather than a conclusive presumption arising from the parties' testimony or from the petition for dissolution. The finding of irretrievable breakdown must be supported by evidence that the parties have lived apart for more than 180 days prior to the filing of the petition for dissolution or that there is serious marital discord that adversely affects the attitude of one or both of the parties toward the marriage. If the court finds that the marriage is irretrievably broken and satisfies the other requirements of 40-4-104, the court shall enter a decree of dissolution. In re Marriage of Geror, 2000 MT 60, 299 M 33, 996 P2d 381, 57 St. Rep. 285 (2000), following In re Marriage of Kraut, 215 M 170, 696 P2d 981, 42 St. Rep. 268 (1985).

Sale of Lot Presumptively Including Access: It is a presumption, albeit disputable, that the complete use and enjoyment of a parcel of land includes access to that parcel. To overcome the presumption, the seller must offer evidence or some legal basis that would controvert the buyer's reliance on the presumption. Here, the Kesters sold the Erkers a house in Big Sky for approximately $310,000. The Kesters' attorney later discovered through the title company that a portion of the driveway, which provided sole access to the house, had not been conveyed by the deed to the lot and requested additional money for the deed to the driveway. There was no indication at the time of sale that any parcel was separate and distinct from the lot, nor did the Kesters reveal any intention to reserve the driveway from the purchase of the lot. Although the Erkers were charged with constructive notice of the contents of properly recorded instruments describing prior conveyances of the property, under Montana subdivision laws, the driveway was not an individual parcel of land at the time of purchase, so the Erkers could be charged only with knowledge that the purchase of the lot described in the common metes and bounds description included the driveway. Absent evidence to the contrary, the Erkers were entitled to the presumption that purchase of the lot included access to it and to summary judgment as a matter of law. Erker v. Kester, 1999 MT 231, 296 M 123, 988 P2d 1221, 56 St. Rep. 912 (1999), following Yellowstone Valley Co. v. Assoc. Mtg. Investors, Inc., 88 M 73, 290 P 255, 70 ALR 1002 (1930).

Existence of Promissory Notes Creating Rebuttable Presumption of Sufficient Consideration — Speculative Statements Insufficient to Demonstrate Genuine Issue of Material Fact: Defendant Moon contended that the District Court erred in granting summary judgment to plaintiff on promissory notes because there was a genuine issue of material fact regarding whether the notes were unenforceable for lack of consideration. However, 26-1-602 creates a rebuttable presumption arising from the fact of the promissory note itself that the note was given for sufficient consideration. Under subsection (b)(2) of this rule, Moon was required to show a preponderance of evidence contrary to the presumption in order to overcome it, otherwise the court was bound to find the assumed fact in accordance with the presumption. Moon's conclusory and speculative statements in the pleadings, briefs, and affidavits did not constitute sufficient factual evidence to demonstrate that a genuine issue of material fact existed contrary to the presumption of valid consideration, so the grant of summary judgment was proper. Envtl. Contractors, LLC v. Moon, 1999 MT 178, 295 M 268, 983 P2d 390, 56 St. Rep. 696 (1999).

Disputable Presumption Created of Employee Status — List of Presumptions Held Not Exclusive: Berg was sued by the State Fund in a civil action for the recovery of workers' compensation premium payments. Earlier, at the time of an audit, Berg was asked by a State Fund auditor to submit evidence that 23 persons working for him were independent contractors as Berg claimed and was told that if he did not submit any evidence, the State Fund would presume that the 23 people were employees and that premiums must be paid for those people. Berg submitted no evidence. The Supreme Court contrasted the language of 26-1-601 with the language of 26-1-602 regarding the exclusive or nonexclusive nature of the lists of presumptions in the two sections and, citing Werre v. David, 275 M 376, 913 P2d 625 (1996), stated that the language of 39-71-120 (now repealed) should be interpreted in its usual and ordinary meaning. The Supreme Court held that 39-71-120 (now repealed) creates a disputable presumption that a person is an employee and held that the fact that the presumption created by 39-71-120 (now repealed) is not contained in the list of disputable presumptions in 26-1-602 is not controlling. The Supreme Court noted that the compiler's comment to Title 26, ch. 1, part 6, makes clear that the listing of disputable presumptions is not intended to be exclusive. State ex rel. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund v. Berg, 279 M 161, 927 P2d 975, 53 St. Rep. 1098 (1996).

Proper Standard to Rebut Presumption — Preponderance of Evidence: Vanderburg argued that the trial court had erred in stating that the presumption created for forfeiture had to be rebutted by a preponderance of the evidence and also argued that regardless of the standard, he had rebutted the presumption favoring forfeiture. The Supreme Court held that this rule stands for the proposition that a disputable presumption must be overcome by a preponderance of the evidence and that in the present case, the trial court had correctly concluded that the presumption had not been rebutted. In re Seizure of $23,691.00, 273 M 474, 905 P2d 148, 52 St. Rep. 1063 (1995), following St. v. Flack, 260 M 181, 860 P2d 89 (1993), and distinguishing, as to overcoming a presumption, Magone v. Aul, 269 M 281, 887 P2d 1235 (1994).

Presumption of Adverse Use: Adverse use need not be proved independent and apart from the presumption of adverse use. Unless properly rebutted, the presumption stands. Parker v. Elder, 233 M 75, 758 P2d 292, 45 St. Rep. 1305 (1988), followed in Rappold v. Durocher, 257 M 329, 849 P2d 1017, 50 St. Rep. 293 (1993). See also Brown & Brown of MT, Inc. v. Raty, 2012 MT 264, 367 Mont. 67, 289 P.3d 156 (summary judgment is proper when a party fails to raise a genuine issue of material fact sufficient to rebut a presumption).

Jury Instructions — Oral Agreement for Lease: In trial involving oral agreement for lease of land for grazing purposes, when term of lease was in dispute and when there was no preponderance of evidence contrary to the presumption of a yearly lease, it was not error to refuse to instruct on a presumption of a month-to-month tenancy. Hill v. Turley, 218 M 511, 710 P2d 50, 42 St. Rep. 1783 (1985).

Parking Ordinance — Presumption That Owner Parked Vehicle — Unconstitutional Shifting of Burden: In striking down a parking ordinance, the Supreme Court held that to make the owner of a vehicle prima facie liable upon proof that his vehicle has been parked illegally is equivalent to a presumption that the owner parked the vehicle. The effect of the presumption is to violate constitutional due process requirements by shifting the burden of persuasion to defendant and contradicting the presumption of innocence. Missoula v. Shea, 202 M 286, 661 P2d 410, 40 St. Rep. 91 (1983).

Sandstrom Instruction — Not Harmless Error if Intent Disputed Issue at Trial: Hamilton appealed federal District Court's dismissal of his habeas corpus petition on grounds that Sandstrom instruction given in his homicide trial was not harmless error. The court of appeals held that the giving of a Sandstrom instruction cannot be held harmless error if intent is a disputed issue at trial. If a criminal defendant's intent is a disputed issue at trial, the reviewing court cannot rationally conclude beyond a reasonable doubt that an unconstitutional Sandstrom instruction given to a jury did not taint its verdict even if substantial evidence of intent exists. Petition of Hamilton, 721 F2d 1189 (9th Cir. 1983).

Theft — Burden on Defendant to Disprove Unlawful Possession or Prove Lawful Possession — Unconstitutional: Defendant was convicted of felony theft of an air compressor, which he contended he had rented from an unidentified party. On appeal, defendant contended that an instruction couched in the exact language of 45-6-304 (now repealed) was unconstitutional in that it created a rebuttable presumption which placed the burden of persuasion on the defendant as to the effect of possession and that it undermined the "beyond a reasonable doubt" standard of proof in that it contained no time constraints, nor was it limited to "exclusive possessions". The Supreme Court held 45-6-304 (now repealed) unconstitutional and held any instruction using the language of the statute to be prejudicial to a defendant. The court stated that the burden of proving every essential element of theft must always be on the state. Section 45-6-304 (now repealed) takes away the presumption of innocence and forces a defendant to testify by placing a burden on him to either disprove unlawful possession or prove lawful possession. The court set forth what it considered a proper instruction on the effect a jury may give to the unauthorized possession of stolen property. St. v. Kramp, 200 M 383, 651 P2d 614, 39 St. Rep. 1819 (1982).

Sandstrom Instruction — Harmless Error — Not Related to Disputed Issue: Because the victim was shot four times in the head at close range and the only disputed issue in the case was the identity of the perpetrator, error by the trial court in using the Sandstrom instruction was harmless. McGuinn v. Crist, 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981).

Sandstrom Instruction — Harmless Error Doctrine Correct Test — Plain Error Rule Not Applicable — Federal Habeas Corpus: In rejecting the state's contention that the giving of the Sandstrom instruction (Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979)) constituted harmless error, the court stated that in applying the "harmless constitutional error" doctrine as set out in Chapman v. Calif., 386 US 18, 17 L Ed 2d 705, 87 S Ct 824 (1967), it must be shown that the constitutional right affected is not a right basic to a fair trial and it must be found harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. For conviction the Due Process Clause requires that each element of a crime be proven beyond a reasonable doubt, this being basic to a fair trial. The Sandstrom instruction by shifting the burden of proof of intent, an element of the crime of homicide, to the defendant denies him due process, and thus the court cannot consider the instruction as harmless error. The "plain error" doctrine is not applicable because it only sets a standard of "highly probable" that the instruction error "materially affected the verdict", the wrong standard by which to measure the effect of constitutional error. McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478, 37 St. Rep. 1159 (D.C. Mont. 1980), reversed 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981).

Sandstrom Instruction — Viewing Instructions as a Whole — Assurance of Effect on Jury: Petition for Writ of Habeas Corpus was filed in U.S. District Court. When the Sandstrom instruction (Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979)) was given at a homicide trial, it may be that the defect can be cured by viewing all of the instructions as a whole; other instructions may be so "rhetorically inconsistent" (ibid. 518-519, n. 7) with the Sandstrom instruction that they overcome its presumptive effect. The court may not speculate on the curative effects of the other instructions on the jury; it must be assured that the jury did not find the defendant guilty on the grounds that he merely acted voluntarily, rather than finding the necessary criminal intent. In examining the instructions given, the court was not so assured and the petition for a Writ of Habeas Corpus was granted. McGuinn v. Crist, 492 F. Supp. 478, 37 St. Rep. 1159 (D.C. Mont. 1980), reversed 657 F2d 1107 (9th Cir. 1981).

Sandstrom Instructions — Harmless Constitutional Error — "Overwhelming Weight of the Evidence" Test Adopted: In the Sandstrom case, the jury was instructed, "The law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts." This instruction was held unconstitutional because the jury might have interpreted it in one of two ways: (1) as a conclusive presumption; or (2) as shifting the burden of persuasion to the defendant to disprove an element of the crime, viz., that defendant "knowingly or purposely" killed the victim. Either interpretation would have rendered the instruction unconstitutional. Here, the instructions included various clarification statements, including one that, unless otherwise instructed, all presumptions are rebuttable. The first Sandstrom objection was thus met. The second objection raises the question of whether the federal constitutional error was harmless beyond a reasonable doubt. The Montana Supreme Court adopted the test that measures the evidence as a whole and excludes the constitutional infirmity where overwhelming evidence supports the conviction. Here the evidence was undisputed, overwhelming, and uncontradicted and permitted only one rational conclusion, that the defendant had the requisite intent when he kidnapped and killed the victim. A reasonable juror could not have found otherwise. Therefore, the unconstitutional jury instructions were harmless beyond a reasonable doubt in the context of the undisputed evidence in the case, and the assigned error could not have contributed to the verdict. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428, 37 St. Rep. 325 (1980).

Sandstrom Jury Instruction — Presumption of Intentional Consequences of Acts — Harmless Error: Defendant, charged with mitigated deliberate homicide alleged as error the giving of the jury instruction, "The law presumes that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts." Under Montana law, causing the death of another becomes deliberate homicide only when it is committed purposely or knowingly. These elements are necessary to the proof of this particular crime and must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt by the prosecution. Intent is a difficult element to prove. The evidence normally must be in the nature of outward manifestations of the defendant's state of mind, but when a telephone line to the police station from the scene of the murder happens to be open and the defendant was overheard at length, the court knew what he was thinking from his own words; it is difficult to conceive of a better indication as to defendant's intent. Also, the officer heard the fight at the time these words were spoken and another officer found the defendant and the victim's body minutes later. The only contested element here was intent, and the evidence on it was overwhelming. Basing its holding on the probable impact of the instructions upon the minds of the average jury, in the light of the evidence, the impact of the instruction upon the jury could not reasonably have contributed to the verdict. The error in giving the contested instruction was harmless. St. v. Hamilton, 185 M 522, 605 P2d 1121, 37 St. Rep. 70 (1980), certiorari denied, 447 US 924, 65 L Ed 2d 117, 100 S Ct 3017 (1980); dismissal of federal District Court habeas corpus petition reversed on Sandstrom grounds, sub nom. Petition of Hamilton, 721 F2d 1189 (1983).

Jury Instructions — Intention of Consequences of Acts — Sandstrom Distinguished: Distinguishing Sandstrom, the court noted that the jury was not given a mandatory presumption, but it was told it could reasonably infer the defendant's intent for all the consequences which one acting in a like position would reasonably have expected. Nothing in the instruction lessened the duty of the State to prove every element of the crime charged beyond a reasonable doubt, nor did it affect the presumption of defendant's innocence. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113, 37 St. Rep. 45 (1980), distinguishing Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Presumption in Jury Instruction — Interpretation: The effect of a presumption in a jury instruction is determined by the way in which a reasonable juror would have interpreted it, not by a state court's interpretation of its legal import. Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Supreme Court as Final Authority: The Supreme Court of Montana is the final authority on the legal weight to be given a presumption instruction under Montana law, but it is not the final authority on the interpretation which a jury could have given to the instruction. Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Unconstitutional Presumption of Intent — Sandstrom Decision: Upon finding proof of one element of the crime of deliberate homicide and of facts insufficient to establish the second, the voluntariness and ordinary consequences of the defendant's action, the jurors could reasonably have concluded, in light of the instruction that a person intends the ordinary consequences of his voluntary acts, that they were directed to find against defendant on element of intent; the State was thus not forced to prove beyond a reasonable doubt every fact necessary to constitute the crime charged, and defendant was deprived of his constitutional rights. Sandstrom v. Mont., 442 US 510, 61 L Ed 2d 39, 99 S Ct 2450 (1979).

Rebuttable Presumption — Res Ipsa: Based on language in Sweeney v. Erving, 228 US 233, 240, (1913), the Montana Supreme Court held that a res ipsa case does not put the defendant in a position of having to prove an affirmative defense to escape liability. Helmke v. Goff, 182 M 494, 597 P2d 1131, 36 St. Rep. 1104 (1979).

Presumption — Effect on Due Process: In answer to defendant's contention that the presumption in former section 94-8-225, R.C.M. 1947 (since repealed), shifted the burden of proof of lack of intent to the defendant, the Supreme Court stated that if the existence of the proven fact would convince a rational juror of the existence of the inferred fact beyond a reasonable doubt, the statute comports with due process. St. v. McBenge, 175 M 362, 574 P2d 260 (1978).

Rule 302. Applicability of federal law in civil cases.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to the Uniform Rules of Evidence (1974) Rule 302 which in turn is identical to Federal Rule 302 with the exception of the word "federal" being substituted for "state". The comment to the Uniform Rule states the reasons this Commission adopted the rule:

Parallel jurisdiction in state and federal courts exists in many instances. The modification of Rule 302 is made in recognition of this situation. The rule prescribes that when a federally created right is litigated in a state court, any prescribed federal presumption shall be applied.

To this the Commission would add that not only should the prescribed federal presumption be applied but also given effect according to the Federal Rules.

Therefore it must first be determined whether there is a prescribed "federal" presumption. If it has been determined that a "federal" presumption should be applied, the effect it is given is determined by the Federal Rule 301. If a presumption does not deal with a substantive element of a claim or defense, it is not a "federal" presumption and the effect it is given is determined by proposed Montana Rule 301. This allows federal and state procedural effects to be applied to their respective substantive presumptions.

The current law in this area is generally uncertain. In Federal Employer's Liability Act cases, it seems clear that state courts may not apply their own procedural rules. Brown v. Western Ry.

of Alabama, 338 U.S. 294 (1949). Whether other types of federal litigation in state courts must follow the same rule is not certain; however, it is clear that Congress has the constitutional power to control the incidents of a state trial of a federal claim. Article IV Relevancy and Its Limits

Article Compiler's Comments

Rape Cases — Relevance of Victim's Past Behavior: Effective Nov. 28, 1978, Rule 412, Federal Rules of Evidence, was adopted for federal practice. Montana has not adopted this rule; similar provisions are located at 45-5-503 limiting the admissibility of the sexual conduct of a victim of sexual intercourse without consent.

Article Case Notes

District Court Determined That Defendant Opened Door to Evidence of Prior Allegations: At trial for a sexual crime against his children, a man testified that he had an awesome relationship with his children. The state sought to introduce evidence regarding a prior accusation against the man for a sexual crime against his children that resulted in a 2-year-long protective order. The District Court ruled that the man had opened the door to the testimony under Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed after discussing admissibility under Rules 401, 402, 404(a)(1), 404(b), and 607(a), M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). St. v. McGhee, 2021 MT 193, 405 Mont. 121, 492 P.3d 518.

Numerous Erroneous Rulings Amounting to Cumulative Error — Reversal Required: The defendant appealed his conviction for deliberate homicide, arguing that the District Court had made several erroneous rulings that required a new trial: (1) excluding as hearsay statements the victim had made to the defendant, which the defendant asserted showed his state of mind and the victim's and were relevant to his defense of justifiable use of force, and (2) preventing the defendant from impeaching the state's expert witness with evidence that the expert witness had mishandled other autopsies and testified falsely in other cases. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a new trial, concluding that the District Court had erred in excluding the victim's statements and preventing the defendant from impeaching the state's expert witness, and that, although the errors might not individually warrant reversal, the cumulative effect prejudiced the defendant's ability to present his justifiable use of force defense and denied him a fair trial. St. v. Cunningham, 2018 MT 56, 390 Mont. 408, 414 P.3d 289.

Defense Cross-Examination — Testimony About Victim's Reputation and Specific Instances of Conduct Prohibited: In a deliberate homicide trial in which the defendant asserted justifiable use of force, the District Court did not err in disallowing defense cross-examination of specific instances of the victim's violent conduct under Rule 405, M.R.Ev., when, during cross-examination, the defense had already elicited witness testimony about the victim's reputation for violence. Rule 405 prohibits further defense cross-examination about specific instances of the victim's conduct; however, cross-examination of specific acts of conduct by a party who is adverse to the witness's reputation or opinion testimony is allowed. St. v. Daniels, 2011 MT 278, 362 Mont. 426, 265 P.3d 623.

Broad Discretion of Court to Prevent Irrelevant Testimony: Hage was tried for deliberate homicide. During his trial, the prosecution inquired about the previous criminal records of two witnesses. When defense counsel attempted to elicit further testimony from the witnesses on that subject, the prosecution objected, claiming that the testimony was barred by Rule 608, M.R.Ev., and the District Court sustained the objection. Citing St. v. Sadowski, 247 M 63, 805 P2d 537 (1991), the Supreme Court held that the trial court has broad discretion to prohibit the introduction of irrelevant evidence and that absent a showing that the District Court abused its discretion, the Supreme Court would not overturn the District Court's determination of relevancy. St. v. Hage, 258 M 498, 853 P2d 1251, 50 St. Rep. 631 (1993).

Evidence of Lifestyle and Criminal History of Nonwitness Properly Excluded as Irrelevant: Hage was tried for deliberate homicide. During his trial, the prosecution sought to introduce testimony about the lifestyle and criminal history of Spindler, an associate of Hage, who had died prior to trial. The District Court excluded the testimony as irrelevant. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the testimony of the nonwitness. St. v. Hage, 258 M 498, 853 P2d 1251, 50 St. Rep. 631 (1993).

Court Discretion in Determining Admissibility and Relevance of Evidence — General Rule: It is well-established that the District Court has latitude of discretion in passing on the admissibility and relevance of evidence, and the determination of admissibility and relevance is subject to review only for abuse of discretion. St. v. Hall, 244 M 161, 797 P2d 183, 47 St. Rep. 1501 (1990), citing numerous cases.

Relevancy of Evidence — Test: In determining relevancy of evidence, the test, as set out in Derenberger v. Lutey, 207 M 1, 674 P2d 485 (1983), is whether an item of evidence will have any value, as determined by logic and experience, in proving the proposition for which it is offered. The standard used to measure this acceptable probative value is “any tendency to make the existence of any fact . . . more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence”. The standard is meant to allow wide admissibility of circumstantial evidence limited only by Rule 403 or other special relevancy rules in Article IV. St. v. Buckingham, 240 M 252, 783 P2d 1331, 46 St. Rep. 2102 (1989), followed in St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358, 55 St. Rep. 344 (1998).

Demonstrative Evidence — Admission Upheld: In a prosecution for deliberate homicide caused by blows struck with a pick handle inside an automobile, the court did not err in overruling the defendant’s objection to demonstrative evidence consisting of two pieces of a wooden handle and parts of an automobile. Allowing demonstrative evidence is within the discretion of the trial court and will not be reversed except upon a showing of manifest abuse of discretion. The record of the case shows no such abuse but shows that the witnesses, attorneys, and trial judge made it clear that the evidence admitted was demonstrative only and was not the actual items used in commission of the crime. Defendant offered no cautionary instruction on this issue and therefore cannot claim error on appeal because none was given. St. v. Close, 191 M 229, 623 P2d 940, 38 St. Rep. 177 (1981).

Relevance and Admissibility of Testimony of Previously Acquitted Alleged Principal: The testimony of a previously acquitted alleged principal in a robbery was allowed in the trial of an alleged participant in the same robbery. The denial of any participation in the robbery provided the foundation for the admission of the witness’s prior inconsistent statements in which he admitted his participation. There was additional evidence tending to establish that the witness and the defendant had planned the robbery with others. The witness’s testimony was therefore relevant and clearly admissible. St. v. Bad Horse, 185 M 507, 605 P2d 1113, 37 St. Rep. 45 (1980).

Rule 401. Definition of relevant evidence.

Commission Comments

The first sentence of this rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 401. The second sentence is based on a phrase from West’s Ann Cal. Ev. Code, Section 210, defining relevant evidence as “including evidence relevant to the credibility of a witness or hearsay declarant”.

The definition of relevant evidence given in the first sentence keeps the Federal definition intact. It has the effect of combining what has been labeled “materiality” with relevance. The ambiguous use of materiality in the past and the current trend in Montana to define relevance as including the concept associated with materiality (what is properly provable in the case as determined by pleadings, procedural rules and substantive law) makes abandoning the term simpler than having two distinct concepts. The inclusion of the phrase “fact that is of consequence to the determination of the action” makes materiality a part of relevance.

The test of relevance is whether an item of evidence will have any value, as determined by logic and experience, in proving the proposition for which it is offered. The standard used to measure this acceptable probative value is “any tendency to make the existence of any fact... more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence”. This standard rejects more stringent ones which call for evidence to make the fact or proposition for which it is offered more probable than any other. It is meant to allow wide admissibility of circumstantial evidence limited only by Rule 403 or other special relevancy rules in Article IV.

Existing Montana law is consistent with this definition of relevant evidence. One of the latest statements by the Montana Supreme Court in the area of relevance is: “any fact which makes probable the existence of another fact in controversy is relevant to prove the disputed fact”. Rhodes v. Weigand, 145 Mont. 542, 546, 404 P2d 588 (1965). See also Brion v. Brown, 135 Mont. 356, 363, 340 P2d 539, (1959) and State v. Sanders, 158 Mont. 113, 117, 489 P2d 371 (1971). Section 93-401-25, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], requires that “evidence must correspond with the substance of the material allegations, and be relevant to the questions in dispute”.

The second sentence of the rule is included to insure that Montana law on credibility of witnesses is retained. The Commission feels that it is possible to interpret the Federal and rule definition and that part of Federal Rule 402 providing “evidence which is not relevant is not admissible” to mean evidence used to attack or support credibility of witnesses may not be within the definition of relevant evidence and so would not be admissible. To avoid this problem the rule therefore includes as its definition of relevant evidence all evidence properly admitted as it relates to matters of credibility under other rules of evidence and does not leave to implication the admissibility of such evidence.

The definition of relevant evidence is also meant to include real and demonstrative evidence admitted as an aid to understanding, but which could not always be considered to directly relate to, facts of consequence to the action. Montana has always allowed such evidence under Sections 93-5102, R.C.M. 1947 [25-7-401], on jury views of property or premises and 93-1201-1, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], on material objects. These sections have been construed in Wolfe v. N. Pac. Ry., 147 Mont. 29, 44, 409 P2d 528 (1966) to allow the discretion of the trial court to admit such procedures and evidence if it is felt they are needed for the evidence as a whole "to be properly understood or that the jury would be aided thereby". There is substantial case law in this area. Two leading cases express what is pertinent; Ferris v. McNally, 45 Mont. 20, 31, 121 P 889 (1912) held that Section 93-5102, R.C.M. 1947 [25-7-401], "is to enable the jury to apply the testimony of the witnesses to the observed conditions about which they have spoken and also to determine the truth of the statements...". Fulton v. Chouteau County Farmer's Co., 98 Mont. 48, 61, 37 P2d 1025 (1934) held that posed photographs were admissible "for the purpose of explaining and applying the evidence and assisting the court and jury in understanding the case".

GENERAL

Unfair Trade Practices Act Standards — District Court Did Not Abuse Discretion for Refusal to Allow Evidence of Other Settlement Amounts Paid by Insurer — Reasonable Basis for Adjustor Disputing Causation and Severity of Injuries. Humes v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 2022 MT 148, 409 Mont. 295, 514 P.3d 417.

Admission of Sexually Explicit Photographs Taken When Victim Was Between 15 and 18 Years Of Age — Relevant and Admissible: There is no age element required for a conviction of incest; thus sexually explicit photographs taken when the victim was 18 were relevant and admissible because they tended to prove the defendant had a sexual relationship with the victim, who was his daughter. Additionally, because the photographs were admissible to prove a necessary element in the crime of incest, the defendant's argument that the photographs were inadmissible because they did not provide evidence for a sentence enhancement lacked merit. St. v. Stewart, 2012 MT 317, 367 Mont. 503, 291 P.3d 1187.

Jury Permitted to Determine Whether Plaintiff's Health Problems Were Caused by Carbon Monoxide Exposure or Alcohol Abuse — No Unfair Prejudice: An employee claimed that he suffered long-term physical and emotional injuries from carbon monoxide and propane exposure at his place of employment. The employee died prior to trial, and the District Court denied the estate's motion in limine to prohibit evidence or argument regarding the cause of death. On appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the District Court's ruling and determined that evidence of alcohol abuse was relevant in allowing the jury to make factual determinations regarding causation and damages. Moreover, the probative value of admitting the evidence of alcohol abuse was not unfairly prejudicial, since the exclusion of all evidence regarding the death could have led the jury to improperly speculate on the link between exposure to carbon monoxide and the employee's death. Alexander v. Bozeman Motors, Inc., 2012 MT 301, 367 Mont. 401, 291 P.3d 1120.

Collateral Nature of Evidence in Determining Admissibility of Contradiction Evidence: The Supreme Court cited federal courts and the Commission Comments to Rule 607, M.R.Ev., and concluded that while the collateral or noncollateral nature of evidence may be a factor to consider, the admissibility and use of contradiction evidence, whether extrinsic or the actual testimony of the witness, is to be governed by Rules 401 and 403, M.R.Ev., and any other applicable rules of evidence. Rule 403 identifies the factors pertinent to determining the admissibility of contradiction evidence. A trial court must carefully apply those factors in deciding whether and to what extent contradiction evidence may be introduced, and the trial court has broad discretion to exclude evidence under Rule 403. St. v. Passmore, 2010 MT 34, 355 Mont. 187, 225 P.3d 1229.

No Error in Allowing Jury to Hear Evidence Regarding Missing Murder Weapon: Meredith contended that the jury should not have been allowed to hear evidence regarding a knife that was used during a homicide, even though the weapon was never recovered and the evidence was thus circumstantial. The Supreme Court concluded that the evidence was relevant because a weapon similar to that described had been used during the murder, and the court further concluded that the evidence was not unfairly prejudicial to Meredith, inasmuch as the jury could have properly inferred, without arousing any hostility toward Meredith, that the knife was used to kill the victim. Therefore, the trial court did not err in allowing the jury to hear the evidence. St. v. Meredith, 2010 MT 27, 355 Mont. 148, 226 P.3d 571.

Relevance of Criminal and Character Evidence in Wrongful Discharge: Dean's employment as an administrative assistant to the Board of County Commissioners was terminated following the discovery of Dean's involvement in a marijuana business and subsequent arrest. Dean subsequently sued the county for its negligent hiring of the officer who was involved in the drug investigation, for unlawful arrest and imprisonment, for wrongful discharge, and for malicious prosecution. A jury found for the county on all claims, and Dean appealed. The Supreme Court considered the evidence related to each claim and affirmed. The county's actions in hiring the officer who was involved in the investigation were irrelevant as to whether Dean was falsely arrested, and evidence related to the hiring was properly excluded. Likewise, evidence gathered after Dean's arrest concerning Dean's personal drug use, although not admissible as evidence of false arrest, was relevant to a determination of whether Dean was wrongfully discharged or terminated for good cause and was properly admitted. Evidence in the record was substantial that probable cause existed to arrest Dean, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of Dean's drug use and connection to persons involved in the marijuana business. Dean v. Sanders County, 2009 MT 88, 350 M 8, 204 P3d 722 (2009).

Evidence of Clean Urinalysis Six Days After Arrest Held Irrelevant to Charge of Criminal Possession of Dangerous Drugs: Clark was charged with criminal possession of a dangerous drug. Six days after his arrest, the results of a urinalysis showed no presence of the drugs in Clark's body. The District Court excluded the results of the urinalysis, and Clark appealed. The Supreme Court held that the results of the urinalysis were properly excluded from Clark's trial because the results were not relevant to the charge of his possession of the drugs. St. v. Clark, 2008 MT 419, 347 M 354, 198 P3d 809 (2008).

Admissibility of Evidence From Prior Suit — Distinct Causes of Action and Different Instances of Alleged Wrongdoing: Plaintiffs sued defendant insurer for breach of contract for failing to cover medical expenses, even though coverage had been provided for similar medical costs in the past and the insurance policy remained the same. The District Court held that evidence from prior settled disputes could not be used in the present suit and granted the insurer's motion for summary judgment on grounds of res judicata and collateral estoppel. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Although the medical issue was similar to the prior settled coverage, the instant action alleged wrongdoing by the insurer after the prior coverage dispute was settled and alleged a distinct cause of action arising from a different instance of alleged wrongdoing, so plaintiffs' use of evidence that was relevant in the previous dispute did not constitute relitigation of the prior dispute that would be barred by res judicata and collateral estoppel, and the District Court erred in so holding. The prior evidence was admissible to provide a context for the instant claims by revealing the history of plaintiffs' relationship with the insurer. Lorang v. Fortis Ins. Co., 2008 MT 252, 345 M 12, 192 P3d 186 (2008). See also Berlin v. Boedecker, 268 M 444, 887 P2d 1180 (1994).

No Prejudice in Allowing Evidence Regarding Prior Accidents and Subsequent Mitigation Efforts in Slip and Fall Case When Verdict in Plaintiff's Favor: After falling on ice outside her office and breaking her ankle, Seeley sued the owner of the building for negligence for defective design and failing to remove ice and snow from the walkway. The jury found that the owner was negligent, but determined that the negligence did not cause Seeley's fall and injuries. Seeley asserted that the District Court erred by allowing evidence of the absence of prior accidents on the property because it failed to disprove negligent conduct. Seeley also ascribed error to the admission of evidence concerning the owner's remedial measures after the fall on grounds that the evidence was irrelevant and improperly influenced the jury. The Supreme Court reviewed the evidentiary ruling to determine whether the trial court abused its discretion, noting that an abuse of discretion does not warrant reversal absent prejudice. In this case, the court did not reach the issue of abuse of discretion because the evidence did not prejudice Seeley. Seeley could not assert that the evidence improperly influenced the jury when the negligence verdict was returned in her favor. Seeley v. Kreitzberg Rentals, LLC, 2007 MT 97, 337 M 91, 157 P3d 676 (2007).

Consideration of Irrelevant Information at Trial Violative of Fair Trial Guarantee — Failure to Request Exclusion of Irrelevant Information or Object at Trial — Review of Issue for First Time on Appeal Precluding Review: Prior to trial, defendant requested review of a state case file containing information concerning a witness. The trial court reviewed the file in camera, determined that there was nothing relevant to the defense, and denied defendant's request for review. At trial, the court mentioned the file to the witness and questioned the witness regarding the contents of the file. Defendant did not object to the reference at trial, but later appealed on grounds that the court committed reversible error after finding the file irrelevant and refusing defendant access to it when it contained information on the witness that might have led defendant to formulate a different defense. The Supreme Court held that the trial court's actions indeed denied defendant a fair trial. However, because defendant did not specifically request that the file be excluded at trial and failed to object when the trial court referred to the file, defendant was not allowed to raise the issue for the first time on appeal. St. v. Ramsey, 2007 MT 31, 336 M 44, 152 P3d 710 (2007).

Annual Intoxilyzer Calibration Requirement: Under ARM 23.4.214, all breath analysis instruments must be laboratory-certified on an annual basis. The plain meaning of "annual" means once every 365 days. The Supreme Court reversed a DUOS conviction based on a breath test conducted on an Intoxilyzer 5000 that had not been certified during the previous 13 months. St. v. Frac, 2006 MT 122, 332 M 255, 136 P3d 558 (2006).

Admission of Evidence Regarding Language on Defendant's Vehicle and Clothing — Relationship to Crime of Assault With Weapon: Cesnik was charged with assaulting a fellow gun club member with a weapon. The trial court admitted evidence regarding phrases on Cesnik's vehicle and clothing. Cesnik contended that the evidence was unrelated to the assault charge and should not have been admitted. The Supreme Court held that the evidence provided further context regarding the animosity between the men and explained why the club member wanted Cesnik removed from the gun club—an issue that Cesnik's counsel broached on direct examination. The evidence was relevant and admissible. St. v. Cesnik, 2005 MT 257, 329 M 63, 122 P3d 456 (2005).

Admissibility of DUI Suspect's Spontaneous Statements: An officer stopped Damon for investigatory purposes, but the officer failed to recite the advisories for investigative stops. Damon answered several questions and then spontaneously said "Just give me a DUI" and "I'm already drunk." Damon contended that all of his statements should be disallowed because the officer failed to give the advisories. The District Court disallowed all of Damon's statements that were given in response to the officer's questions, but allowed Damon's spontaneous statements. The Supreme Court noted that under St. v. Nelson, 2004 MT 310, 323 M 510, 101 P3d 261 (2004), it is an officer's questioning that triggers the advisories. Damon's spontaneous utterances were not in response to specific questioning and were therefore admissible. St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 M 276, 119 P3d 1194 (2005).

Photographs of Nonvictim Children Not Considered Prejudicial or Character Evidence — Probative Value Warranting Admissibility: In Bar-Jonah's aggravated kidnapping, sexual assault, and assault with a weapon trial, the trial court allowed the admission of hundreds of photographs of children seized during a search of Bar-Jonah's residence. Bar-Jonah contended that the photographs were: (1) improperly admitted because only a few were images of the victims; and (2) unfairly prejudicial and tended to erroneously reflect on Bar-Jonah's character. The Supreme Court disagreed. The photographs were relevant by linking them to Bar-Jonah's motive for befriending the victims, for enhancing the credibility of the victims, and to rebut Bar-Jonah's asserted defenses. Even if the photographs could be construed to reflect on Bar-Jonah's character, they were not introduced for that purpose, but rather to prove motive. Any prejudice to Bar-Jonah through introduction of the photographs was outweighed by their probative value, which did not present evidence of other crimes or acts. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Generalized Expert Testimony Regarding Sexual Abuse and Religious Manipulation and Control Properly Admitted in Sexual Intercourse Without Consent, Incest, and Witness Tampering Case: In Sandrock's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, incest, and witness tampering, an expert testified regarding sexual abuse and religious manipulation and control based on experiences in a Christian sect. Sandrock moved for mistrial on grounds that the testimony was irrelevant and tended to supplant the state's need to prove Sandrock's mental state. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The expert did not provide any testimony specific to Sandrock, but rather provided the jury a context within which to understand the intricacies of religious groups in general, so the court concluded that the testimony was relevant. Further, the testimony did not prejudice Sandrock because Sandrock himself admitted to controlling his wife and daughters, and the expert never stated that Sandrock exhibited or performed the beliefs that were typical of the religious groups about which the expert testified in general. The mistrial motion was properly denied. St. v. Sandrock, 2004 MT 195, 322 M 231, 95 P3d 153 (2004).

Standard of Review of Evidentiary Rulings: The Supreme Court reviews a District Court's evidentiary rulings for an abuse of the lower court's broad discretion, and absent a showing of an abuse of discretion, the lower court will not be overruled. Sufficiency of evidence to support a jury verdict is reviewed to determine whether, after viewing the evidence in the light most favorable to the prosecution, any rational trier of fact could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Runs Above, 2003 MT 181, 316 M 421, 73 P3d 161 (2003). See also St. v. Stevens, 2002 MT 181, 311 M 52, 53 P3d 356 (2002), St. v. Bingham, 2002 MT 350, 313 M 376, 61 P3d 153 (2002), and St. v. Shields, 2005 MT 249, 328 M 509, 122 P3d 421 (2005).

Supreme Court Reduction of Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent to Sexual Assault — Relevance of Testimony of Victims Regarding Belief That Massage Therapist's Actions Were Criminal: Stevens was convicted of two counts of sexual intercourse without consent after having sexual contact with two female patients at his massage clinic. The Supreme Court determined that there was insufficient proof that the offenses were committed without consent and, without addressing whether sexual assault was a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent, reduced the offenses to sexual assault. Even though Stevens was not specifically charged with sexual assault, there was no question that he was reasonably apprised of the sexual assault charges against him. Stevens offered a jury instruction, which was given without objection, stating that sexual intercourse without consent necessarily included the offense of sexual assault. Evidence clearly showed that Stevens had sexual contact with the victims, and testimony from the victims regarding whether they considered sexual contact by a massage professional to be criminal was relevant and admissible, tending to make the existence of a material element of the crime, namely whether the crime was committed without consent, more likely than without the evidence. St. v. Stevens, 2002 MT 181, 311 M 52, 53 P3d 356 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Black, 270 M 329, 891 P2d 1162 (1995).

Use of Evidence to Rebut Claim of Justifiable Use of Force: Pursuant to 45-3-102, a person is justified in the use of force or threat to use force against another when and to the extent that the person reasonably believes that such conduct is necessary to defend against the imminent use of unlawful force. Under St. v. Daniels, 210 M 1, 682 P2d 173, 41 St. Rep. 880 (1984), that person alleging that force was justified has the burden of producing sufficient evidence on the issue to raise a reasonable doubt of guilt. Ultimately, whether the use of force was justified will be determined by the jury based on evidence of what the person reasonably believed when confronted with the imminent use of unlawful force. Thus, evidence of the person's postincident actions is immaterial in determining whether the use of force was justified and would in no sense tend to make the person's reasonable belief at the time of the attack more or less probable under this rule. State ex rel. Kuntz v. District Court, 2000 MT 22, 298 M 146, 995 P2d 951, 57 St. Rep. 111 (2000). See also People v. Fowler, 174 P 892 (Calif. 1918), and St. v. Barrack, 267 M 154, 882 P2d 1028, 51 St. Rep. 983 (1994).

Stipulation Precluding Need to Bring Evidence of Insurance Settlement Before Jury: Dill suffered damages after being hit as a pedestrian by a vehicle operated by Jardine. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company (State Farm) provided both liability insurance for Jardine and underinsured motorist coverage for Dill. Dill maintained that State Farm's settlement of the underlying liability claim against Jardine was admissible as relevant under Rule 402, M.R.Ev., and this rule and as impeachment evidence pursuant to Rules 607 and 801(d)(2), M.R.Ev. However, it was not necessary to bring evidence of the settlement before the jury in light of the fact that State Farm stipulated that it had paid Dill the liability policy limit on behalf of Jardine and would pay any jury verdict that exceeded that amount up to the policy limit under the underinsured motorist policy. Simple knowledge that the policy limits were paid was sufficient. Dill v. District Court, 1999 MT 85, 294 M 134, 979 P2d 188, 56 St. Rep. 350 (1999).

Measure of Loss as Jury Question: Alternative approaches to measure loss are within the meaning of this rule, and it is up to the jury to decide which approach is more or less probable as a measure of loss. It was not error for the trial court to deny plaintiff's motion in limine to preclude a defense expert witness from testifying as to an alternate measure of loss. Simmons Oil Corp. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 1998 MT 129, 289 M 119, 960 P2d 291, 55 St. Rep. 508 (1998).

Lawyer's Letter to Veterans Administration Claiming Plaintiff's Death Caused by Preexisting Condition Not Admissible to Show Hospital Not Liable for Plaintiff's Death: Columbus Hospital argued that the lower court had erred in refusing to admit a letter written by the plaintiffs lawyer to the Veterans Benefits Administration stating that Busta's death was due to a preexisting condition incurred when he was in the service. The hospital alleged that the letter should have been admitted because it had a tendency to make more probable the hospital's claim that Busta had died due to a preexisting condition. The Supreme Court held that an attorney is not qualified to express a medical opinion that is admissible in court and that even if relevant, the letter presented substantial potential for confusing or misleading the jury and therefore had been properly excluded. Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122, 53 St. Rep. 428 (1996).

Judicial Notice of Facts Against Codefendants — Admissibility of Codefendants' Guilty Pleas Offered to Assess Credibility of Witnesses at Trial: Evidence of a codefendant's guilty plea is generally inadmissible. An exception is when evidence of a codefendant's guilty plea is offered to aid the jury in assessing the credibility of a codefendant who testifies at the defendant's trial. In this case, Oatman's defense to robbery charges was that the employees at the restaurant that was robbed had misidentified him as one of the robbers. The employees' credibility was thus placed at issue, and the correct identification of the codefendants as two of the robbers bolstered the employees' credibility. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in deciding that the probative value of informing the jury that the court had taken judicial notice of the codefendants' guilty pleas outweighed the prejudicial potential of that information. Taking judicial notice of proceedings against a codefendant does not taint the fairness of a defendant's trial if the court instructs the jury that it has the prerogative to accept or reject the judicially noticed facts as evidence. St. v. Oatman, 275 M 139, 911 P2d 213, 53 St. Rep. 74 (1996). See also U.S. v. Halbert, 640 F2d 1000 (9th Cir. 1981).

Evidence of Monetary Settlement in Later Accident Inadmissible in Trial of Earlier Accident: Plaintiff was injured in an automobile accident in 1983 and filed a lawsuit that was contested. He was involved in another automobile accident in 1986 and filed a lawsuit that was settled. The District Court erred in allowing evidence of the monetary value of the 1986 settlement when considering damages for the 1983 accident because the evidence had no bearing on the injuries sustained in 1983. Those damages could be established through medical and testimonial evidence, and evidence related to the 1986 accident served only to interject immaterial, prejudicial information into the trial. The nature and extent of injury sustained in a subsequent accident is often relevant to a determination of damages; however, evidence of the value of a previous settlement generally is not. Beil v. Mayer, 242 M 204, 789 P2d 1229, 47 St. Rep. 661 (1990).

Relevancy of Evidence — Test: In determining relevancy of evidence, the test, as set out in Derenberger v. Lutey, 207 M 1, 674 P2d 485 (1983), is whether an item of evidence will have any value, as determined by logic and experience, in proving the proposition for which it is offered. The standard used to measure this acceptable probative value is "any tendency to make the existence of any fact . . . more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence". The standard is meant to allow wide admissibility of circumstantial evidence limited only by Rule 403 or other special relevancy rules in Article IV. St. v. Buckingham, 240 M 252, 783 P2d 1331, 46 St. Rep. 2102 (1989), followed in St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358, 55 St. Rep. 344 (1998).

Circumstantial Evidence Sufficient to Sustain Conviction — Test: Circumstantial evidence is sufficient to sustain a conviction if it is of such quality and quantity to legally justify a jury in determining guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. St. v. Pambrun, 240 M 62, 783 P2d 374, 46 St. Rep. 1944 (1989).

Exclusion of Witness's Statement That He Heard Nondefendants Discussing Committing Crime Similar to Crime Charged to Defendants: The defendant sought to introduce evidence that a witness had overheard two men discussing a crime they had committed so similar in time and circumstance that it could have been the crime attributed to the defendant. The evidence was excluded as irrelevant on the basis that unknown factors of the proposed evidence, including what crime was committed, when and by whom, and upon whom, far outweighed the alleged similarity of the two occurrences. St. v. Rudolph, 238 M 135, 777 P2d 296, 46 St. Rep. 1150 (1989).

Communications to Parole Officer Not Privileged: After his arrest for burglary, the defendant called his parole officer and told him of the crime. The defendant's motion to suppress the parole officer's testimony was denied on the basis that the parole officer was not an elected officer or director and therefore communications made to him were not subject to a statutory privilege. The Supreme Court also held that the probative value of the evidence outweighed the relatively slight prejudicial impact the evidence carried in showing the jury that the defendant had been convicted of a prior crime. St. v. Higareda, 238 M 130, 777 P2d 302, 46 St. Rep. 1146 (1989).

Admissibility of Testimony of Nontreating Physician: The lower court denied the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude the testimony of a physician who did not treat the plaintiff and who examined the patient only one time, for approximately 15 minutes. The ruling was affirmed on appeal on the grounds that the testimony went to the credibility of the plaintiff and her witnesses and that the testimony was not so unfairly prejudicial that it substantially outweighed its probative value. Feller v. Fox, 237 M 150, 772 P2d 842, 46 St. Rep. 694 (1989).

Offer to Drop Charges for Money — Not Relevant to Assault Incident: It was within the District Court's discretion to exclude testimony on the victim's offer to drop charges in return for money because such testimony was not relevant to the assault incident and had limited probative value regarding the victim's credibility. Sloan v. St., 236 M 100, 768 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 214 (1989).

Exclusion of Evidence of Victim's Later Crimes Proper — Balance of Prejudice and Probative Value: The District Court properly excluded evidence, under Rules 608 and 609, M.R.Ev., of pending or resolved criminal charges against the victim of an assault unless the state alluded to the victim's good character, truthfulness, or veracity. As noted in Cooper v. Rosston, 232 M 186, 756 P2d 1125, 45 St. Rep. 978 (1988), evidence bearing on the issue of the credibility of a witness, in order to be admissible, must be more probative than prejudicial, and the District Court must balance prejudice and probative value pursuant to Rules 401 and 403, M.R.Ev. St. v. Hammer, 233 M 101, 759 P2d 979, 45 St. Rep. 1326 (1988).

Evidence of Witness's Misrepresentations and Omissions Improperly Excluded — "Collateral Matters" Rule Incorrectly Applied: The District Court excluded evidence of a witness's misrepresentations and omissions after holding that the evidence constituted impeachment on collateral matters. The Supreme Court found the exclusion of evidence improper on two issues: the issue of the credibility of the witness and the issue of punitive damages. Further, the Supreme Court noted that the rule on collateral matters was abolished in favor of the relevancy approach contained in Rule 607, M.R.Ev. Cooper v. Rosston, 232 M 186, 756 P2d 1125, 45 St. Rep. 978 (1988), followed in St. v. Kowalski, 252 M 166, 827 P2d 1253, 49 St. Rep. 197 (1992), and McEwen v. MCR, LLC, 2012 MT 319, 368 Mont. 38, 291 P.3d 1253, in which the Supreme Court concluded that evidence of the defendant's bid on state trust land, for which it had no use, was properly admitted to prove the plaintiffs' punitive damages claim as it was relevant to whether the defendant was acting maliciously toward the plaintiffs.

Additional Circumstantial Evidence of Burglary Properly Admitted: State's evidence that on the day following the theft of guns a person matching defendant's description and driving an automobile matching the description of defendant's vehicle attempted to pawn guns of the same general description as those stolen, although circumstantial, naturally or logically established an additional fact implicating defendant's guilt of burglary and was properly admitted. St. v. Oliver, 228 M 322, 742 P2d 999, 44 St. Rep. 1567 (1987).

Expert Testimony — Best Available Evidence in Absence of Actual Figures: A herbicide manufacturer argued that expert testimony should not have been admitted because the expert who testified as to the potential crop yield of a 495-acre field based his estimate on a small area of the field. Rule 401 provides that evidence is relevant if it has a tendency to make the existence of any fact more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence, and the Supreme Court found the expert's testimony had the tendency to cause the amount of crop loss claimed by plaintiff to be more probable. Given the absence of actual crop yield figures on the 495 acres, the expert testimony appeared to be the best available evidence and was properly admitted. Vandalia Ranch, Inc. v. Farmers Union Oil & Supply Co., 221 M 253, 718 P2d 647, 43 St. Rep. 790 (1986).

Standard of Lawful Basis for Refusal to Decline Payment of Claim — Standard Not Met by Reliance on Inadmissible Evidence: An insurer must meet the standard of a lawful basis for refusal to decline payment of an insured's claim for an insured's loss. Reliance by the insurer on inadmissible evidence of arson by the insured in declining payment of an insured's loss does not meet the standard of a lawful basis for refusal of the insured's claim. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986).

Imprecision of Expert Opinion — Relates to Weight of Evidence, Not Admissibility: An expert witness testified that shoe prints found at the scene of a crime were exactly like the defendant's shoes, but that he could not positively identify the defendant's shoes as making the shoe prints. The Supreme Court dismissed the defendant's contention that unless the expert could positively identify the prints to a degree of scientific certainty, the testimony should be inadmissible. The Supreme Court said that relevance means having a tendency to make a fact more or less probable than it would have been without the testimony, and this testimony linked the defendant to the scene of the crime. Any imprecision of expert opinion goes to the weight of evidence, not admissibility. St. v. Smith, 220 M 364, 715 P2d 1301, 43 St. Rep. 449 (1986).

Other Accident Evidence — Identical Circumstances Not Required: Plaintiff lost a foot in compression feed rollers during the operation of a large round hay baler. Part of the plaintiff's presentation of the case was to show that the design of feed rollers was defective and dangerous. The manufacturer in interrogatories mentioned 72 accidents involving operators and the rollers. The court admitted evidence relating to 30 of them, setting specific admission requirements relating to the fact that tractor's power takeoff was running and the injured person engaged in an intentional act at the time of the accident. The Supreme Court held that all such accidents were admissible because the issues involved not specific conduct of the operators but the injuries to operators in area of the compression feed rollers which was relevant to their design and relevant to the defendant's foreseeability of operator conduct. Tacke v. Vermeer Mfg. Co., 220 M 1, 713 P2d 527, 43 St. Rep. 123 (1986).

Admissibility of Evidence From Earlier Related Lawsuit in Mandamus Proceeding: In a proceeding for a Writ of Mandamus compelling county officers to accept for recording a deed and certificate of survey, it was proper for the trial court to admit into evidence exhibits and testimony from an earlier lawsuit concerning similar issues and the same property. The applicant's conduct is a proper consideration in a mandamus action. Further, the evidence is relevant under Rule 401. M.R.Ev. Withers v. Beaverhead County, 218 M 447, 710 P2d 1339, 42 St. Rep. 1730 (1985).

Evidence Relevant — Inadmissible as Unfair Prejudice: In a tort action, on the issue of the causation of damages, the trial court abused its discretion in allowing testimony concerning the plaintiff's home environment and whether her father's alleged drinking and fighting caused her symptoms rather than an earlier vehicular accident. The questioned testimony had a tendency to make the alleged cause of the symptoms more or less probable than it would have been without the testimony. The testimony therefore was relevant but not admissible as its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Kimes v. Herrin, 217 M 330, 705 P2d 108, 42 St. Rep. 1231 (1985), followed in Newville v. St., 267 M 237, 883 P2d 793, 51 St. Rep. 758 (1994), Werre v. David, 275 M 376, 913 P2d 625, 53 St. Rep. 187 (1996), and Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004). However, see Peterson-Tuell v. First Student Transp., LLC, 2014 MT 307, 377 Mont. 113, 339 P.3d 16, in which the court ruled that testimony referencing sexual abuse suffered by the plaintiff's daughter was both relevant and admissible on the issue of causation of her injuries from a car accident.

Vague Testimony of Driver and Vehicle Remote From Scene of Accident — Prejudicial — Foundation Lacking: In a trial arising from an intersection collision between plaintiff's motorcycle and defendant's auto, testimony of defendant's proposed witness was properly excluded as having prejudicial effect outweighing any probative value. He would have testified regarding a motorcyclist he saw while closing his shop. He could not positively identify plaintiff as the motorcyclist, and his description of the cycle and its driver varied from that of other witnesses and from the actual cycle and driver. His view occurred 300 yards from the accident. He was vague as to the time. Other cycles could have passed him by unobserved. His testimony characterized the driver as a stereotypical biker driving fast. The testimony also lacked a sufficient foundation, because there was insufficient connection between the driver witness saw and plaintiff. Wenel v. Hall, 215 M 78, 694 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 195 (1985).

Prejudice Stemming From Evidence Held Inadmissible as Irrelevant: In a tort action relating to the explosive failure of a Goodyear K-type split tire rim where the Supreme Court held inadmissible as irrelevant testimony regarding political bribery during Watergate by the defendant Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, the failure of the trial court to exclude such evidence was prejudicial to the defendant and permitted the jury to indulge in improper speculation and guesswork. Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 207 M 37, 673 P2d 1208, 40 St. Rep. 1861 (1983).

Relevancy of "Other Accidents" Evidence — Substantial Similarity Required: In order to prevent the jury from being misled, the party offering "other accidents" evidence bears the burden of showing that the circumstances surrounding the product involved in the other accidents were substantially the same or similar to the accident at issue. Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 207 M 37, 673 P2d 1208, 40 St. Rep. 1861 (1983), followed in Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989), and Preston v. District Court, 282 M 200, 936 P2d 814, 54 St. Rep. 312 (1997).

Circumstances of Case and Discretion of Judge: A trial court is not guided by fixed rules in determining whether evidence is too remote in time to be relevant. The nature of the evidence and the circumstances of the case control. For this reason the determination is left in great part to the discretion of the judge and is subject to review only in the event of manifest abuse. Preston v. McDonnell, 203 M 64, 659 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 297 (1983), followed in Safeco Ins. Co.

v. Ellinghouse, 223 M 239, 725 P2d 217, 43 St. Rep. 1689 (1986), In re Marriage of Cole, 224 M 207, 729 P2d 1276, 43 St. Rep. 2136 (1986), and in In re Marriage of Starks, 259 M 138, 855 P2d 527, 50 St. Rep. 719 (1993). See also Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993).

Illustrative Exhibits: In reviewing the trial court's ruling on admission of illustrative exhibits, the Supreme Court must give great deference to the trial court's discretion. Barmeyer v. Mont. Power Co., 202 M 185, 657 P2d 594, 40 St. Rep. 23 (1983).

Speed of Vehicle — Relevancy of Prior Behavior: While making a left turn, the plaintiff's car was struck by a passing vehicle. The plaintiff testified that several miles before the accident he had seen the passing vehicle parked alongside the road with its occupants relieving themselves. Such evidence was relevant as it showed the speed of the passing vehicle in that it caught up with the plaintiff's car. Goodnough v. St., 199 M 9, 647 P2d 364, 39 St. Rep. 1170 (1982).

Admission of Bullets and Ski Mask That Appear to Have Been Used in Commission of Crime: A spent .45 caliber shell casing and a ski mask discovered in a search of a coconspirator's automobile 2 months after the crime was committed were relevant when prior to the admission of these articles the State had produced evidence: (1) placing the defendant in the car on the night of the crime; (2) that the defendant had a .45 caliber handgun and a ski mask while sitting in the car at the scene of the crime; and (3) that the defendant had shot a hole in the automobile's windshield with the gun. The articles had been linked to the defendant and to the commission of the crime and had the tendency to make the existence of those facts more probable. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343, 37 St. Rep. 194 (1980).

Test of Relevance: The test of relevance is whether an item of evidence will have any value, as determined by logic and experience, in proving the proposition for which it is offered. The standard used to measure this acceptable probative value is "any tendency to make the existence of any fact . . . more probable or less probable than it would be without the evidence". This standard rejects more stringent ones which call for evidence to make the fact or proposition for which it is offered more probable than any other. It is meant to allow wide admissibility of circumstantial evidence limited only by Rule 403 or other special relevancy rules in Art. IV, M.R.Ev. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343, 37 St. Rep. 194 (1980).

OTHER CRIMES OR ACTS

Evidence of Other Slip and Falls Not Admissible — Not Substantially Similar: The District Court did not err when it did not allow plaintiffs to introduce evidence of other falls on the defendant's clinic campus. A District Court has broad discretion to determine whether evidence is relevant and admissible. Evidence of other falls is not admissible to prove negligence. The evidence is admissible to show the existence of danger, defect, or knowledge. A prior accident must be "substantially similar to" and "not too remote from the accident in question" to qualify for admission. As applied, the District Court properly concluded that evidence of other falls was not similar to the plaintiffs' as the other falls occurred in parking lots rather than on sidewalks or at sister facilities not on the defendant's main hospital campus. Nolan v. Billings Clinic, 2020 MT 167, 400 Mont. 326, 467 P.3d 545.

Admitting Irrelevant Testimony Harmless if No Reasonable Probability That Testimony Contributed to Conviction and There Was an Abundance of Admissible Testimony to Substantiate Conviction: The District Court erred in admitting testimony regarding a Child Protective Services worker's decision to remove the children from the defendant's care. The testimony was not based on personal knowledge of the facts giving rise to the defendant's charged offense of aggravated assault and is irrelevant under Rule 401, M.R.Ev., in a criminal prosecution in which the standard of proof is that the defendant committed aggravated assault beyond a reasonable doubt. Because there is no reasonable probability that the Child Protective Services worker's testimony contributed to the defendant's conviction and because the record demonstrates an abundance of admissible evidence from which the jury could find that the defendant injured the victim, the District Court's error in admitting the testimony was harmless. St. v. Santillan, 2017 MT 314, 390 Mont. 25, 408 P.3d 130.

Deceptive Practices — Proper Introduction of Evidence of Prior Convictions to Show Lack of Mistake and Intent to Deceive: The defendant was charged with felony deceptive practices for cashing several thousand dollars in dishonored checks. At trial, the prosecution introduced evidence of the defendant's two prior convictions for fraudulent deceptive practices over her objection. She argued that the evidence did not show that she knew she had acted fraudulently or deceptively; however, the state successfully maintained that the evidence demonstrated her history of victimization. Following her conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing evidence of her prior convictions. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that evidence of her prior convictions was relevant to knowledge, intent, and absence of mistake under Rule 401, M.R.Ev. St. v. Reopelle, 2017 MT 196, 388 Mont. 271, 399 P.3d 903.

Attempted Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — Evidence of Conversations Leading up to Violation Properly Excluded — Photos of Other Women Sent by Victim to Defendant Irrelevant and Prejudicial: After the defendant was convicted of attempted sexual intercourse without consent, he claimed that his due process rights were violated based on the District Court's exclusion of evidence that included alleged sexual conversations between the defendant and the victim in the days leading up to the violation and photos of semiclothed women that were allegedly sent from the victim's cell phone to the defendant. The Supreme Court determined that the rape shield law exception in 45-5-511 does not extend to alleged conversations leading up to the date of the violation. Moreover, the Supreme Court held that the exclusions were proper on the basis that the alleged conversations and photos were irrelevant or more prejudicial than probative under Rules 401 through 403, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10). The District Court struck the appropriate balance between the defendant's right to develop his case and the rules of evidence. St. v. Bishop, 2012 MT 259, 367 Mont. 10, 291 P.3d 538.

Evidence of Pot Parties, Pipe, or Paraphernalia Unrelated to Alleged Sex Crime — State Failed to Show No Reasonable Possibility Evidence Contributed to Conviction: Evidence of marijuana use and drug paraphernalia did not prove an element of sexual intercourse without consent or sexual assault, and the state was unable to demonstrate qualitatively that there was no reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to the defendant's conviction. When evaluating the impact of tainted evidence, the qualitative impact of the tainted evidence is the proper focus in determining whether trial error was harmless. St. v. Sage, 2010 MT 156, 357 Mont. 99, 235 P.3d 1284.

Expert Testimony Regarding Grooming of Victims for Sexual Abuse Properly Allowed: The court in Berosik's incest trial allowed the state's witness to describe the characteristics of the grooming of potential child victims of sexual abuse and then allowed the complaining witnesses and others to testify about Berosik's prior acts that occurred with the victims over several years. The court ruled that the prior acts were evidence that Berosik was grooming his victims and thus were part of the transactions the state sought to prove. On appeal, Berosik asserted that the expert testimony on grooming was irrelevant and highly prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Expert testimony explaining the complexities of child sexual abuse is admissible, and the evidence of prior sexual activity occurring before the charged offenses was admissible under the transaction rule because the activity formed part of the transaction that was the fact in dispute and was explanatory of the charged offense. St. v. Berosik, 2009 MT 260, 352 M 16, 214 P3d 776 (2009). See also St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 M 114, 201 P3d 811 (2009), and St. v. Crosley, 2009 MT 126, 350 M 223, 206 P3d 932 (2009).

Evidence of Purchase of Medication With Day-Care Funds Relevant to Question of Whether Medicine Endangered or Caused Death of Children in Day Care: Bieber was charged with the death of one child and endangerment of other children in her day-care center by administering an over-the-counter sedative medication to the children without their parents' permission and in violation of administrative rules pertaining to the use of drugs at day-care centers. The state offered evidence that Bieber purchased 63 12-ounce bottles of the medication during the 2 years prior to the child's death, 45 bottles in the year prior to the child's death, and 6 bottles within a month of the death and showed that the majority of the purchases were made with day-care funds. Bieber objected to the evidence on grounds that the evidence was irrelevant and highly prejudicial. The evidence was admitted, and Bieber appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. The evidence of Bieber's long-term purchases with day-care funds was relevant to the questions of whether Bieber caused the child's death and endangered the other children by administering the medication to them. The evidence was probative and not unfairly prejudicial. Likewise, the evidence of administrative violations was admissible under the transaction rule. St. v. Bieber, 2007 MT 262, 339 M 309, 170 P3d 444 (2007).

Violation of Motion In Limine in First Trial Not Grounds for Double Jeopardy Dismissal in Second Trial: Mallak contended that the state goaded him into moving for a mistrial by purposely violating a motion in limine prohibiting testimony of Mallak's prior violent conduct and that under Oreg. v. Kennedy, 456 US 667 (1982), and St. v. Laster, 223 M 152, 724 P2d 721 (1986), a second trial was a violation of double jeopardy. The Supreme Court disagreed. The part of the testimony that Mallak objected to was a product of the prosecutor's inadvertence, not intention, and did not inevitably lead to a violation of the motion in limine, unlike the inherently violative questioning in Laster. Thus, double jeopardy did not apply, and the trial court did not err in denying Mallak's motion to dismiss the charges. St. v. Mallak, 2005 MT 49, 326 M 165, 109 P3d 209 (2005), followed in Billings v. Mouat, 2008 MT 66, 342 M 79, 180 P3d 1121 (2008), regarding the principle that when a mistrial is declared on a defendant's motion, double jeopardy does not bar a subsequent trial unless the governmental conduct in question was intended to goad defendant into moving for a mistrial. Mallak was followed in Helena v. Whittinghill, 2009 MT 343, 353 M 131, 219 P3d 1244 (2009), to the extent that it is insufficient to bar a retrial absent intent on the part of the prosecutor to subvert the protections afforded by the double jeopardy clause, even when the prosecutor's conduct prompting the mistrial motion constitutes harassment or overreaching.

Objectionable Testimony Elicited by Defendant's Own Actions — Right to Allege Error on Appeal Waived: Smith was charged with stealing his mother's credit card and using the card to withdraw money from her bank account and charge items for his personal use. Pretrial, Smith moved in limine to preclude witnesses at trial from testifying regarding Smith's prior criminal convictions, and the motion was granted. When his mother testified, Smith's counsel asked what efforts she made to locate Smith after discovering that her credit card was gone, and the mother responded that she had checked with Smith's parole officer to see if the officer knew where Smith was. Smith immediately moved for a mistrial, asserting that the comment violated the motion in limine, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the objectionable testimony was elicited by Smith's own actions, he waived the right to allege error on appeal because he actively participated in creating the error. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 18, 325 M 374, 106 P3d 553 (2005), following St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Defendant's Testimony Regarding Law-Abiding Nature Opening Door to Cross-Examination Regarding Belligerent Conduct When Arrested: Dobson testified at trial that he would have cooperated with law enforcement officers if they would have had a warrant, implying that he was peaceful and law-abiding by nature, so the state attempted to elicit testimony regarding the fact that during his arrest, Dobson was belligerent and hostile. Dobson objected on grounds that the testimony was irrelevant to the charge of sexual intercourse without consent. On a stand-alone basis, Dobson's cross-examination testimony about the details of his arrest did not tend to make the existence of any fact that he committed sexual intercourse without consent more or less probable; however, Dobson did not have a right to offer an unnecessary, self-serving statement, intended to place him in a better light with the jury, without laying the statement open to cross-examination. The state created a sufficient nexus between Dobson's direct testimony and his behavior during arrest, and Dobson opened the door through which the state was entitled to walk. Dobson had an adequate opportunity to rehabilitate himself and countermand any prejudice resulting from the cross-examination, so the testimony was relevant and properly admitted. St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001), following St. v. Kinney, 230 M 281, 750 P2d 436 (1988), and distinguishing St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358 (1998).

Evidence of Conduct of Child Abuse Victim Prior to Assault Irrelevant but Not Prejudicial — Conviction Affirmed: The District Court allowed testimony by two counselors who observed a suspected child abuse victim in the family home. The child exhibited inappropriate sexual conduct and made several sexual comments that ultimately led to the removal of the child from the home and charges against and conviction of Thompson for sexual assault of his child. On appeal, Thompson contended that the testimony was erroneously admitted because it pertained to events that occurred before the assault that he was accused of and was therefore not probative of any fact in issue and was irrelevant. The Supreme Court agreed. Neither witness offered an opinion of who might have been responsible for the child's behavior, and there was no evidence that it was caused by Thompson, so the testimony was irrelevant to the issue being tried. However, the objectionable inference from the evidence was that the child had been sexually abused, a fact that Thompson himself conceded through his own witnesses. The testimony was cumulative and merely illustrated a fact that was not in dispute and thus did not affect Thompson's substantial rights or provide grounds for reversal. St. v. Thompson, 2001 MT 119, 305 M 342, 28 P3d 1068 (2001).

Victim Psychological Autopsy Not Relevant to Defendant's Mental State: Defendant, convicted of deliberate homicide and sexual assault, appealed the District Court's denial of his motion for a psychological autopsy of the victim, alleging that the court's actions prevented him from presenting mitigating evidence by juxtaposing his mental capacity against the victim's confrontational nature. In affirming the District Court's denial, the Supreme Court held that the focus of the mitigated deliberate homicide statute is on the defendant's mental state at the time of the offense. The request for a psychological profile of the victim was not directly related to the defendant's attempt to establish the existence of extreme mental or emotional stress in conjunction with a mitigated deliberate homicide defense. St. v. Hill, 2000 MT 308, 302 M 415, 14 P3d 1237, 57 St. Rep. 1301 (2000).

Clarification of General Requirement of Substantially Similar Circumstances as Precedent to Admission of Evidence of Prior Accident: Evidence of prior accidents, although inadmissible to prove negligence, may be admitted for other purposes, such as to show: (1) the existence of a particular physical condition or defect; (2) the dangerousness of the condition or defect; (3) the possibility that the condition or defect might cause an accident or injury of the type alleged; (4) cause in fact; and (5) knowledge of the condition or defect. (See Modern Evidence: Doctrine and Practice, Mueller & Kirkpatrick, § 4.8 at 281, 282 (1995), and McCormick on Evidence § 200 at 844-847, 4th Ed. (1992).) Regarding the degree of identity of circumstances required when offering prior accident evidence for the sole purpose of notice or knowledge, the general requirement of substantially similar circumstances is relaxed or less strict when the evidence is proffered to show notice rather than dangerousness or causation, and a lack of exact similarity of conditions will not preclude admission under these circumstances if the accident was of a kind that should have served to warn defendant. In proving notice, there may be dissimilarities between the accidents; however, the differences affect the weight of the evidence, but not necessarily the admissibility. Here, Kissock slipped and fell in defendant's parking lot. The District Court excluded proffered evidence of a fall by another person in the same parking lot days earlier because it occurred at a different time of day under different physical circumstances. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed, holding that the minor spatial and temporal differences existing between the two slip-and-fall accidents went to the weight rather than admissibility of the evidence in supporting an inference that defendant had notice or knowledge of the icy conditions. The circumstances surrounding the prior accident were not so remote or dissimilar from Kissock's accident that the probative value was substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice to defendant. Kissock v. Butte Convalescent Center, 1999 MT 322, 297 M 307, 992 P2d 1271, 56 St. Rep. 1288 (1999). See also Runkle v. Burlington N., Inc., 188 M 286, 613 P2d 982, 37 St. Rep. 995 (1980), *Bailey v. S. Pac. Cross-Examination Regarding Unrelated Incidents of Prior Sexual Abuse Properly Limited: The District Court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of his ex-wife regarding two unrelated prior incidents of sexual abuse, one involving the ex-wife and the other involving her infant daughter. Defendant was allowed to present closing arguments concerning the ex-wife's motive, bias, or prejudice, based on evidence in the record. However, allowing cross-examination regarding the two prior unrelated incidents would have created unfair prejudice against the ex-wife and confused the issues for the jury. St. v. MacKinnon, 1998 MT 78, 288 M 329, 957 P2d 23, 55 St. Rep. 331 (1998).

Evidence That Insurance Agent Who Had Premiums Paid With Loans Against Policy Without Plaintiffs' Knowledge Did Same Thing to Other Insureds: An insurance agent testified that forms that he filled out authorizing loans against plaintiffs' policies to pay premiums must have been authorized by plaintiffs because he would not otherwise have filled them out and sent them in. Plaintiffs testified that they did not authorize, sign, or see the forms. Testimony of other persons to whom the agent sold policies that this also happened to them and that they did not authorize the forms made the agent's statements in this case less credible and was relevant and admissible. Cartwright v. Equitable Life Assurance Soc'y, 276 M 1, 914 P2d 976, 53 St. Rep. 268 (1996).

Defendant's Defiance of Officers — Tends to Show Willingness to Participate in Riot: During a prison riot, Langford refused to follow the orders of officers retaking a cell block until a warning shot was fired. During his trial for burglary and deliberate homicide related to the prison riot, Langford argued that the shooting incident was inadmissible because it was not relevant. The Supreme Court held that the incident was relevant because Langford's defiance of the officers' orders tended to show his willingness to disturb the peace and participate in the riot. St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490, 51 St. Rep. 962 (1994).

Cross-Examination of Witness Regarding Civil Action Against Defendant Allowed: In a case of first impression, the Supreme Court adopted the majority view from other jurisdictions that the proper approach to the question of whether a defendant may cross-examine a witness regarding a contemplated civil action against the defendant is to allow the cross-examination. Nevertheless, in the present case, the evidence of aggravated assault by defendant was so overwhelming that the failure of the trial court to allow cross-examination regarding a contemplated civil action would not have materially affected the jury's verdict and was thus harmless error. St. v. Arlington, 265

M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994). See also St. v. Underwood, 281 NW 2d 337 (1979), St. v. Ferguson, 450 NE 2d 265 (1983), and Wooten v. St., 464 S 2d 640 (1985).

Evidence of Use of Illegal Weapon Admissible in Deliberate Homicide Case — Just Warning Not Required: Defendant in a deliberate homicide case contended that the court erroneously allowed the state to present evidence that the shotgun used in the shootings had been illegally altered, without providing a Just notice or modified Just notice. However, the state was entitled to introduce evidence of the act of owning an illegal shotgun because it was inextricably related to the crime. A Just notice was not required because the evidence was part of the corpus delicti. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993).

Evidence Irrelevant and Inadmissible Regarding Drug-Related Activities Beyond Scope of Offense: Facts relevant to the charge of criminal sale (now criminal distribution) of dangerous drugs were whether defendant was in a certain place at a certain time and whether he sold drugs at that time and place. Evidence of matters not pertaining to those facts was irrelevant and inadmissible. The District Court erred in admitting testimony regarding defendant's associates and their drug-related activities, the presence of juveniles at an unrelated drug sale, and places at which defendant may have spent time on occasion, such as bars known to be drug hangouts. A defendant on trial for one offense should be convicted, if at all, by evidence that shows he is guilty of that offense alone. St. v. Webb, 252 M 248, 828 P2d 1351, 49 St. Rep. 236 (1992).

Evidence of Employee Misconduct Improperly Excluded for Remoteness: The District Court excluded offered evidence of instances of employee misconduct on the grounds that the acts were too remote in time to be relevant. The employer sought to introduce evidence of alleged employee dishonesty and theft that occurred within 3 years of termination. Given the relatively short time between the occurrences and the trial, the eyewitness nature of the evidence, and the importance of the evidence to the employer's defense of termination for dishonesty, it was error to exclude the evidence on the basis of remoteness in time. Barrett v. ASARCO Inc., 234 M 229, 763 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 1865 (1988).

Exclusion of Evidence of Victim's Later Crimes Proper — Balance of Prejudice and Probative Value: The District Court properly excluded evidence, under Rules 608 and 609, M.R.Ev., of pending or resolved criminal charges against the victim of an assault unless the state alluded to the victim's good character, truthfulness, or veracity. As noted in Cooper v. Rosston, 232 M 186, 756 P2d 1125, 45 St. Rep. 978 (1988), evidence bearing on the issue of the credibility of a witness, in order to be admissible, must be more probative than prejudicial, and the District Court must balance prejudice and probative value pursuant to Rules 401 and 403, M.R.Ev. St. v. Hammer, 233 M 101, 759 P2d 979, 45 St. Rep. 1326 (1988).

Additional Circumstantial Evidence of Burglary Properly Admitted: State's evidence that on the day following the theft of guns a person matching defendant's description and driving an automobile matching the description of defendant's vehicle attempted to pawn guns of the same general description as those stolen, although circumstantial, naturally or logically established an additional fact implicating defendant's guilt of burglary and was properly admitted. St. v. Oliver, 228 M 322, 742 P2d 999, 44 St. Rep. 1567 (1987).

Attempt by Prosecutor to Provoke Defense Motion for Mistrial — Double Jeopardy: When a defendant moves for a mistrial and the motion is granted, the "manifest necessity" standard allowing a court to lift the double jeopardy bar to a second trial does not apply (U.S. v. Tateo, 377 US 463, 12 L Ed 2d 448, 84 S Ct 1587 (1964)). The Montana Supreme Court recognized a narrow exception to this rule, as outlined in Oreg. v. Kennedy, 456 US 667, 72 L Ed 2d 416, 102 S Ct 2083 (1982), holding that the circumstances under which a defendant may invoke the bar of double jeopardy are limited to cases "in which the conduct giving rise to the successful motion for a mistrial was intended to provoke the defendant into moving for a mistrial". In the case at bar, the District Court held and the Supreme Court affirmed that the prosecutor attempted, through a series of overreaching questions, to shift the focus of the trial from a charge of criminal sale of drugs for which there was only weak evidence to sexual crimes initially reported but later denied on cross-examination. The court found that the questions were so prejudicial that the defendant had little choice but to move for a mistrial to avoid a conviction for crimes with which he had not been charged. St. v. Laster, 223 M 152, 724 P2d 721, 43 St. Rep. 1614 (1986).

Denial of Evidence Relating to Prior Fires — No Error: The Supreme Court found no error in the denial by the District Court Judge of evidence or testimony relating to prior fires from which the insured may have received insurance proceeds. The court held that the proffered evidence did not naturally and logically tend to establish a fact in issue and did not meet the test of relevancy, in that it did not make probable that the insured had committed arson either from the viewpoint of motive, intent, or the deed itself. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St.

Rep. 641 (1986), followed, as to the application of Rule 404, M.R.Ev., in St. v. Enright, 1998 MT 322, 292 M 204, 974 P2d 1118, 55 St. Rep. 1308 (1998), and also followed in St. v. Link, 1999 MT 4, 293 M 23, 974 P2d 1124, 56 St. Rep. 13 (1999). See also Phil-Co Feeds, Inc. v. First Nat'l Bank in Havre, 238 M 414, 777 P2d 1306, 46 St. Rep. 1380 (1989), and St. v. Link, 1999 MT 4, 293 M 23, 974 P2d 1124, 56 St. Rep. 13 (1999).

Tort Action — Admitted Use of Drugs Before Traffic Accident — Motion In Limine to Exclude Unless Foundation Established: Plaintiff admitted certain use of illegal drugs before the traffic accident, but it was not error for the District Court to grant a motion in limine excluding such evidence from the trial unless a foundation could be established showing that at the time of the accident he was under the influence and that his negligence was the proximate or controlling cause of injuries. Because evidence of drugs is very prejudicial, such conditional exclusion requires some link between it and the accident and a weighing of its probative value against its prejudicial effect. Simonson v. White, 220 M 14, 713 P2d 983, 43 St. Rep. 133 (1986).

Evidence of Past Violent Behavior — Admissible in Commitment Proceeding: It was not error, in an involuntary commitment proceeding, to admit evidence of violent behavior by respondent even though the behavior had occurred several years before this proceeding and the incidents were not set forth as allegations in the petition. In re D.B., 218 M 467, 709 P2d 161, 42 St. Rep. 1747 (1985).

Dismissal of Police Officer — Records of Other Disciplinary Proceedings Not Relevant — Protective Order Proper: In a police commission proceeding for dismissal of a police officer, defendant police officer was denied, under former Rule 26(c), M.R.Civ.P. (now superseded), access to records of other police disciplinary proceedings which he planned to introduce in support of his defense of "discriminatory law enforcement". The evidence was not relevant to the proceeding, and the protective order was properly granted. In re Raynes, 215 M 484, 698 P2d 856, 42 St. Rep. 569 (1985).

Prior Guilty Plea — Irrelevant to Misconduct or Punitive Damages: Defendant and plaintiff, who was 16, were drinking and driving at a high rate of speed in Anaconda. Defendant was driving plaintiff's car when he lost control and hit a house. Plaintiff was severely injured. At a trial for damages based on negligence, plaintiff's counsel sought to introduce evidence of defendant's having pleaded guilty to two prior incidents of supplying intoxicating beverages to minors. Defendant's attorney moved for a motion in limine, which was denied. The jury awarded compensatory and punitive damages. On appeal the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the evidence of appellant's prior guilty pleas did not have the tendency to make the existence of his alleged willful and wanton misconduct on the night in question more or less probable. The evidence was irrelevant to establishing misconduct on the night in question or for establishing a basis for punitive damages. The fact that defendant had purchased alcohol for minors did not go toward establishing his operation of the vehicle in a reckless fashion, the act complained of. Therefore the evidence was also irrelevant toward showing a basis for punitive damages. Derenberger v. Lutey, 207 M 1, 674 P2d 485, 40 St. Rep. 902 (1983).

Criminal Mischief for Damage to One's Own Property to Defraud Insurer — Relevance of Pictures of Property: Defendant was charged with criminal mischief in that he purposely drove his pickup over a steep bank to wreck it so he could collect from his insurance company. Later the pickup was vandalized. Pictures of the pickup taken after the vandalism were properly admitted as proof of defendant's motive, and their probative value was substantial and was not outweighed by prejudice to defendant, who claimed that they should not have been admitted because they were evidence of other crimes as well as the one with which he was charged and that he had not been charged with vandalism. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

Parole Status of Defendant — Prosecution Questions Eliciting: On the first day of trial, the prosecutor agreed to caution his witnesses to avoid mention of defendant's parole status. The prosecutor breached his promise by twice asking one of his witnesses a question eliciting the answer that defendant was on parole. The court cautioned the jury to disregard the testimony. As a matter of law, the Supreme Court could not hold that failure to grant motion for mistrial was an abuse of discretion. Prejudice would not be presumed. Defendant failed to show that a substantial right was denied and that there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to his conviction. The evidence supporting conviction was substantial, if not overwhelming, and defendant's version of the events was simply incredible. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

Health Permit Requirements — Relevance of Prior Licensing: An action was brought by purchasers to rescind contract for bakery. After Department of Health notified purchasers of deficiencies needing correction, they closed the bakery and gave the keys to seller. The seller had stated in the contract that to his knowledge he had complied with government regulations. Seller fixed the deficiencies, received a health license, and opened the bakery, which he had operated for almost 17 years prior to the sale to purchasers. It was not error for the judge to refuse admission of conditional health licenses granted seller in 1968 and 1969 on the ground that they were so remote in time as to have little if any probative value and were therefore not relevant to issue whether seller knew at time of sale that the bakery would not meet health standards. Preston v. McDonnell, 203 M 64, 659 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 297 (1983).

Prior Compromise Settlements on Similar Injuries Properly Excluded: Plaintiff injured his back when the seat in the locomotive he was operating broke and threw him backward. Plaintiff had had two prior back injuries that had been successfully treated. The District Court excluded evidence relating to plaintiff's previous settlement of claims with defendant. Defendant contended that since the jury heard evidence regarding the previous injuries, it should have been informed of the settlements. The Supreme Court held that compromise settlements for previous injuries do not necessarily reflect the seriousness of the injuries and may confuse the jury. Any probative value was outweighed by possible prejudice. Callihan v. Burlington N., Inc., 201 M 350, 654 P2d 972, 39 St. Rep. 2158 (1982).

Evidence of Other Crimes Relevant and Therefore Admissible — Shoplifting Coat to Replace Bloodsoaked Coat: Armstrong was caught shoplifting a coat similar to his own bloodsoaked coat. In his trial for deliberate homicide, Armstrong objected to the shoplifting evidence. The Supreme Court said that the shoplifting evidence tended to show the destruction or suppression of evidence by Armstrong and tended to show his guilt and was therefore relevant and clearly admissible. If evidence tends to prove the commission of the crime charged, it is not rendered inadmissible because it also tends to prove the commission of another crime. The test is whether the evidence tends to prove facts material to an issue in the cause before the court. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341, 37 St. Rep. 1563 (1980).

Testimony That Defendant Smoked Marijuana With County Attorney — Other Offense — Inadmissible: The State moved to exclude defendant's testimony that he had smoked marijuana with the County Attorney the night before the offense (deliberate homicide and obstructing justice). The trial court in excluding the offered evidence reasoned that it was not relevant, or if relevant, that its probative value was outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. St. v. Beachman, 189 M 400, 616 P2d 337, 37 St. Rep. 1558 (1980).

Admission of Evidence of Prior Relationship Between the Defendant and the Victim's Girlfriend and Threats by Defendant Against Her: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case claimed on appeal that the trial court erred in admitting into evidence acts and statements of the defendant which occurred prior to the shooting. The evidence concerned the former romantic relationship of the victim's girlfriend with the accused, the ill feelings of the defendant toward the victim that developed after the defendant's relationship with the woman was replaced with the victim's relationship with her, and the ensuing threats made by the defendant toward the woman. Because the State had to prove that the defendant purposely or knowingly caused the victim's death, the evidence of the defendant's intent was relevant in general and specifically because the defendant here alleged that he shot the victim in self-defense. Although threats against a person other than the victim are not admissible generally, when the circumstances are such that the threat tends to show hostility toward the deceased, they are relevant. Although evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith, it may be admissible for other purposes such as proof of motive or intent or where such evidence forms a part of a single chain of facts so intimately connected that the whole must be considered in order to interpret its several parts. Further, the challenged testimony was crucial to prove defendant's mental state at the time of the shooting, and as a result, the probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470, 37 St. Rep. 1098 (1980).

Evidence of Prior Accidents: Evidence of prior accidents, while inadmissible for the purpose of proving negligence, is nevertheless admissible for the purpose of showing the existence of a danger or defect and notice thereof. Such evidence of prior accidents, however, must show situations substantially similar to or not too remote from the accident in question, although absolute identity of circumstances is not necessary. Here, where there was no offer of proof as to what the prior accidents would have shown, the Supreme Court could not determine admissibility, and therefore no reversible error was committed. Runkle v. Burlington N., 188 M 286, 613 P2d 982, 37 St. Rep. 995 (1980). See also Kissock v. Butte Convalescent Center, 1999 MT 322, 297 M 307, 992 P2d 1271, 56 St. Rep. 1288 (1999).

Testimony Accusing Defendant of Other Crimes — Part of Connected or Continuous Transaction: The court did not err in allowing testimony by a doctor that he had not prepared or signed certain medical reports submitted by defendant on workers' compensation claims even though the defendant argued that such testimony was irrelevant as amounting to an accusation that the defendant had committed crimes other than the ones charged. The evidence tended to show that the defendant submitted fraudulent medical reports and was part of a connected or continuous transaction on the part of the defendant. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974, 36 St. Rep. 1037 (1979).

Other Crime — Prejudice — Limited Use of Evidence: Testimony concerning another crime in the chain of events with the crime of which the defendant is accused, when used for impeachment purposes, may be admissible in a proper case. Since a stipulation stating the nature of the crime committed and the disposition of other prosecutions stemming from the crime had been read to the jury and since the defendant did not carry his burden of affirmatively showing prejudice, this was such a case. St. v. Holliday, 183 M 251, 598 P2d 1132, 36 St. Rep. 1535 (1979).

WRONGFUL DEATH

Evidence of Defendant's Conduct Prior to Accident Not Considered Irrelevant or Character Evidence — Failure of Counsel to Object Not Ineffective Assistance: Defendant contended that defense counsel erred by failing to object to evidence that defendant was driving erratically and aggressively for 10 miles prior to a fatal accident, asserting that the evidence was improper character evidence and irrelevant to and separate from the collision. The Supreme Court disagreed. The events preceding the accident were clearly relevant and closely related to the charged offenses of negligent homicide and criminal endangerment. An objection on grounds of improper character evidence and relevance would have been groundless, and defense counsel did not render ineffective assistance in failing to object. St. v. Tennell, 2007 MT 266, 339 M 381, 170 P3d 965 (2007).

Internal Department Memoranda — Relevant to Road Condition: In a wrongful death action plaintiff attempted to introduce into evidence internal Highway Department (now Department of Transportation) memoranda containing evaluations of specific stretches of road within the state, including the location of the accident involved. Plaintiff had a state employee explain the documents and laid a foundation for their admission. The State, a codefendant, contended the documents were irrelevant, confusing, prejudicial, and erroneous. The trial court excluded the evidence. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the exhibits were relevant. They tended to show the general condition of the highway which was a material issue in the plaintiff's case against the State. The contention that the exhibits would confuse or mislead the jury showed a lack of confidence in the intelligence and common sense of the jury. It was error to exclude the exhibits; however, in light of all the evidence admitted concerning the road conditions, the error was harmless. Lindberg v. Leatham Bros., Inc., 215 M 11, 693 P2d 1234, 42 St. Rep. 137 (1985).

Admission of Evidence of Surviving Spouse's Remarriage as Prejudicial Error in Wrongful Death Action: In an action for the wrongful death of the plaintiff's wife, the court granted the plaintiff's motion to prohibit the defendant's counsel from informing the jury of the plaintiff's subsequent remarriage. Under these circumstances it was prejudicial and reversible error for the court to allow the defendant's lawyer to ask the jury panel on voir dire if any of the panel knew the plaintiff's present wife. Evidence of a surviving spouse's remarriage is irrelevant, and the introduction of the evidence cannot be cured by an admonition by the court. Workman v. McIntyre Constr. Co., 190 M 5, 617 P2d 1281, 37 St. Rep. 1637 (1980).

Relevant Photographs as Demonstrative Evidence: In a wrongful death action in which the decedent's surviving spouse brought suit against the state and its contractor for negligently failing to warn the decedent of an abrupt edge at the shoulder of a highway construction project, the court abused its discretion in refusing to admit into evidence for demonstrative purposes photographs showing the proper use of an "abrupt edge" sign. The photographs were relevant as demonstrative evidence, as they illustrated an issue in the case and would not prejudice the jury. Workman v. McIntyre Constr. Co., 190 M 5, 617 P2d 1281, 37 St. Rep. 1637 (1980). See also Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989).

Wrongful Death Action — Exclusion of Construction Contract Terms Upheld: In a wrongful death action in which the decedent's surviving spouse brought suit against the state and its contractor for negligently failing to warn the decedent of an abrupt edge at the shoulder of a highway construction project, the court properly excluded certain provisions in the contract between the state and the contractor regarding certain traffic control devices mentioned in a payment schedule. Because the question in the case was whether certain devices should have been used, the contract provisions allowing their use were of no probative value and were irrelevant. Workman v. McIntyre Constr. Co., 190 M 5, 617 P2d 1281, 37 St. Rep. 1637 (1980). See also Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 233 M 515, 761 P2d 401, 45 St. Rep. 1694 (1988).

TAMPERING WITH WITNESS OR EVIDENCE

Condition or Chain of Evidence — Bicycle Ridden by Motor Vehicle Homicide Victims: Defendant purposely hit and killed, with auto he was driving, two persons riding a bicycle. Testimony indicated that investigating officer picked up the bicycle at the scene and that it appeared to be in reasonably the same condition at trial as it was in when he picked it up. There was no indication at trial that it had been tampered with or was in worse condition than when officer picked it up. It was properly admitted in evidence over objection that there was insufficient evidence that it was in the same condition at trial as it was at the scene of the incident and that no chain of evidence establishing to whom it belonged and its condition prior to and after the incident was shown. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Chain of Custody — Evidence Tampering — Burden of Proof: Testimony established prima facie that no one tampered with the evidence while it was in police custody. Once this was shown, the burden of proving tampering shifted to the defendant. The fact that the FBI found no blood on the boots when they were initially examined does not mean that there was no blood on them. It merely means that the FBI did not find the blood in the first instance. This is not proof of tampering while in police custody. St. v. Armstrong, 189 M 407, 616 P2d 341, 37 St. Rep. 1563 (1980).

Duress Upon Official: The District Court erred in excluding the testimony of a former city councilman and railroad employee regarding the railroad's reaction to his motion to reduce the speed of trains at the crossing. If the railroad in fact utilized its position as employer to exert a form of duress upon its employee acting in an official capacity, such evidence might have a bearing in the mind of the jury to demonstrate wantonness or oppressiveness sufficient to establish a basis for punitive damages. Runkle v. Burlington N., 188 M 286, 613 P2d 982, 37 St. Rep. 995 (1980).

Credibility of Witnesses — Threat to Kill as Motive to Testify Falsely: The plaintiff allegedly assaulted and threatened to kill the witness if he did not testify favorably to plaintiff's case at trial. Testimony concerning the assault was admitted over the objection that it was irrelevant. The Supreme Court stated that although the evidence is irrelevant to the issue in dispute at trial it is admissible if it is otherwise relevant to the credibility of the witness. The fear of plaintiff carrying out the threat could provide a motive for the witness to give false testimony, and therefore evidence of the assault was relevant and properly admitted to show a motive to testify falsely. Cissel v. W. Plumbing & Heating, 188 M 149, 612 P2d 206, 37 St. Rep. 966 (1980).

MISCELLANEOUS

Evidence of Discovery Dispute Not Relevant, Unfairly Prejudicial, Prohibited by Court Order: The District Court did not err by granting the state's motion in limine to exclude the defendant from arguing that the state had not fulfilled its discovery obligations to him. The District Court also did not err by disallowing the defendant's discussion of the subject of the motion in limine in his closing argument. A court has the inherent power to grant or deny a motion in limine to ensure a fair trial. The defendant sought to admit, and subsequently mentioned in his closing argument, documents from the state crime lab unrelated to his case or to any of the crime lab personnel involved in his case in an effort to prove the prosecutor failed to produce evidence. This evidence did not pertain to the defendant's case and likely did not have a tendency to make the existence of any fact related to his guilt more or less probable. Nonetheless, even if the evidence was relevant to an attack on the prosecution's efforts, the evidence was unfairly prejudicial to the state because it was premised on an assertion that the prosecution had violated its discovery obligations, about which the District Court had already ruled to the contrary. Further, admitting the evidence could well have confused or misled the jury regarding the issues to be determined. St. v. Hudon, 2019 MT 31, 394 Mont. 226, 434 P.3d 273.

Railroad Employee Injury — Evidence of Supplemental Employment Income Very Prejudicial — District Court Abuse of Discretion: The plaintiff, an employee of a railroad, pursued a cause of action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) and the Locomotive Inspection Act (LIA) for a work-related injury that prevented him from working as a conductor for 6 months. In addition to working as a conductor, the employee had a lucrative consulting business before and after the date of injury. Before trial, the District Court denied the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude reference to money earned by him as a consultant. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the District Court abused its discretion by admitting into evidence the specific amount of income the plaintiff made from his nonrailroad employment, and the case was remanded for a new trial. The court reasoned that the evidence was very prejudicial and that it could have had an impact upon the jury's verdict on the issue of liability, as well as damages. Martin v. BNSF Ry. Co., 2015 MT 167, 379 Mont. 423, 352 P.3d 598.

Improper Admissibility of Evidence Concerning Defendant's Sexual Relationship in Obstruction Case — Reversible Error — Relevant Evidence Admissible: Miller was convicted in Justice's Court of obstructing a police officer. Following a call to Kalispell police regarding the welfare of her partner, Miller, a probation officer, had called the Kalispell police to report that her partner was with her at the bar and that the call was a prank, when in fact the partner had left the bar and was subsequently involved in an auto accident. During trial, the court allowed multiple references to Miller's lesbian relationship and allowed evidence related to the accident. Miller appealed on grounds that the references to her sexual orientation were unrelated to the charge, irrelevant, and highly prejudicial. Miller also asserted that evidence of the accident was an abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court reversed the admission of references to Miller's sexual orientation. Society does not view homosexuality or bisexuality in the same manner as it views heterosexuality, so there was a strong potential that a juror would be prejudiced against a homosexual or bisexual person, so it was prejudicial to allow references to Miller's relationship because it was not probative or relevant to the crime with which Miller was charged. However, evidence of the accident was relevant to Miller's crime because it proved that Miller provided untruthful information to the police, so the court affirmed admission of the accident evidence. A new trial was ordered with directions to exclude references to Miller's homosexuality. Kalispell v. Miller, 2010 MT 62, 355 Mont. 379, 230 P.3d 792. See also St. v. Ford, 278 Mont. 353, 929 P.2d 245 (1996).

No Error in Denial of Assignment of Liability as Sanction for Alleged Violation of Pretrial Rulings: White sued her doctor for alleged negligence in treatment. Prior to trial, the District Court made several rulings, including restricting defense counsel from arguing or attempting to shift the blame to White or her mother for any alleged lack of diligence in pursuing a diagnosis, although counsel was allowed to address and explain the standard of care. White subsequently asserted that during trial defense counsel repeatedly violated the pretrial orders, and she requested that liability be assigned to defendant as a sanction. The District Court denied sanctions and White appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Once White's mother testified that she had expressed concern about White's height and development, the door was opened to challenge this assertion, and as long as counsel did not directly blame the mother for any delayed diagnosis, defense counsel was allowed to present evidence to challenge the mother's credibility. Inquiry for this purpose was properly allowed in the effort to present a defense. White v. Johnson, 2009 MT 254, 351 M 534, 215 P3d 11 (2009).

Evidence of Victim's Possession of Pornography Properly Excluded as Irrelevant: Johnson asserted a defense of justifiable use of force in the assault of Heltne. Johnson contended that Heltne invited Johnson into his bedroom, began showing Johnson a pornographic movie, and tried to touch Johnson, but Johnson refused Heltne's advances. Heltne allegedly offered Johnson money and tried to touch Johnson again, at which point Johnson punched Heltne repeatedly and fled the house. Johnson was later arrested and charged with aggravated assault. The trial court refused to allow Johnson to introduce evidence of Heltne's pornography, and on appeal, Johnson asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The physical evidence that Johnson sought to introduce did not relate in any way to the reasonableness of force used by Johnson and was thus irrelevant, while the potential prejudice to Heltne had the evidence been allowed was massive. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in disallowing the irrelevant, prejudicial pornographic evidence. St. v. Johnson, 2008 MT 227, 344 M 313, 187 P3d 662 (2008).

Proof of Taking Access From One Parcel of Land Irrelevant to Access Question Related to Different Parcel: Plaintiffs sued the state for inverse condemnation and taking for constructing a highway improvement project that allegedly impaired access by large trucks to plaintiffs' business on a main street in Dillon. Plaintiffs sought to introduce right-of-way agreements showing that the state compensated three other similar businesses in the reconstruction zone, that plaintiffs' property was similarly affected, and that the state recognized that the project impaired access to other businesses. The trial court disallowed the agreements into evidence as irrelevant. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed with the trial court that proof of taking of access from one parcel does not prove a taking of access from a separate distinct parcel and that the question of whether reasonable access has been denied for a specific parcel must be based on the merits of that parcel and not on differently situated parcels. The three property owners entered right-of-way agreements that were negotiated based on the uniqueness of their parcels, and their agreements were irrelevant to plaintiffs' property, so the trial court did not abuse its discretion in disallowing evidence of the agreements. Williams Feed, Inc. v. St., 2007 MT 79, 336 M 493, 155 P3d 1228 (2007).

Use of Redacted Pretort Release to Establish Statutory Liability Shield Allowed: A pretort form indicating a prospective release from liability for negligence is illegal. However, it was not improper for a trial court to allow introduction of a redacted version of an illegal exculpatory agreement to show that an equine activity sponsor was statutorily protected from liability from unavoidable risks or from the inherent risks of equine activities of which the participant was or should have been aware. In the present case, plaintiff failed to cite authority or establish error by the trial court in admitting the redacted agreement, and the Supreme Court affirmed the trial court's denial of plaintiff's motion for a new trial on grounds that the redacted agreement was improperly admitted in evidence. McDermott v. Carie, LLC, 2005 MT 293, 329 M 295, 124 P3d 168 (2005).

Preclusion of Evidence of Duty of Care to Supervise Ranch Help — Summary Judgment Proper: Elizabeth sued her husband, Robert, for damages that she received while helping perform chores on Robert's ranch, including being accidentally injected with sheep serum by Robert's father. However, Elizabeth failed to produce any evidence that Robert had any duty to supervise his father, so the trial court granted Robert's motion in limine, precluding any evidence or testimony regarding the accidental injection, including evidence by Elizabeth's expert regarding the cause of her injuries, and ultimately granted summary judgment to Robert. Elizabeth appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. In order to recover for personal injuries, Elizabeth was required to establish a legal duty, a breach of that duty, and damages proximately caused by the breach. Elizabeth did not establish a legal duty, so partial summary judgment for Robert was proper. Absent a legal duty, the evidence regarding the accidental injection and the expert's opinion concerning Elizabeth's injury was irrelevant and properly excluded. Without expert testimony, Elizabeth was unable to present evidence regarding causation and could not prevail on the negligence claim, so summary judgment for Robert was proper. Nelson v. Nelson, 2005 MT 263, 329 M 85, 122 P3d 1196 (2005).

Irrelevant Evidence Unrelated to Employee's Ineligibility for Unemployment Benefits Based on Misconduct Properly Denied: Wiman, a dispatcher at the Fallon County jail, allowed an unauthorized person to enter a convicted felon's cell to give the prisoner a haircut. Wiman's deliberate action violated county security policy, and Wiman was suspended without pay for 60 days, during which time Wiman sought unemployment benefits, but the benefits were denied. Wiman contended that the hearings officer improperly denied her the right to introduce evidence that went to the heart of the misconduct issue, such as evidence regarding the inmate's mental state, whether Wiman or another employee had previously provided items to inmates, and whether Wiman's breach of security policy was adequately investigated. However, the question before the hearings officer was the denial of unemployment benefits during the time that Wiman was suspended for allowing an unauthorized person into the cell—conduct which Wiman admitted—so the evidence related to Wiman's misconduct issue was irrelevant and inadmissible. Wiman v. Mont. Dept. of Labor and Industry, 2004 MT 208, 322 M 332, 96 P3d 710 (2004).

Motion to Introduce Letter Unrelated to Payment for Work Hours Properly Denied: Struble was charged with falsifying work records at the state prison where he was employed. Struble made a motion in limine to introduce a letter from the County Attorney to the Department of Corrections outlining the County Attorney's concern that there was insufficient evidence to prosecute six other employees on similar charges. The motion was denied, and Struble appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The letter did not directly concern Struble, was unrelated to the charges against him, was irrelevant to the state's case against Struble, and thus was properly not admitted into evidence. St. v. Struble, 2004 MT 107, 321 M 89, 90 P3d 971 (2004).

Misleading Testimony of Arresting Officer Not Material to DUI Verdict — No Due Process Violation: At Gratzner's DUI trial, he argued that he could not have been in actual control of a vehicle because he had no ignition key for it. The arresting officer testified that he once owned a similar vehicle and needed no key to operate it. Gratzner filed for postconviction relief after discovering that the officer never actually owned a similar vehicle, but relief was denied. Gratzner appealed, contending that the officer's false testimony violated his due process rights. The Supreme Court noted that under Gollehon v. St., 1999 MT 210, 296 M 6, 986 P2d 395 (1999), it must be shown that false testimony was material to the verdict to prevail on a due process claim. Gratzner argued that Gollehon applied because the officer's testimony was material to the conviction inasmuch as it supported one of the elements of the crime. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although the officer may have been misleading in saying that he had owned a similar vehicle when in fact the vehicle was a county-owned car that was issued to him, ownership of the vehicle was irrelevant to the question of whether the vehicle would start without a key and was not material to the verdict. Further, testimony that the officer saw Gratzner drive and exit the vehicle was sufficient in itself for the trier of fact to determine that Gratzner was driving or in actual physical control of the vehicle. The District Court was affirmed. Gratzner v. St., 2003 MT 169, 316 M 335, 71 P3d 1221 (2003).

Error in Not Excluding Results of Independent Blood Alcohol Test Taken After DUI Arrestee Released From Custody: When Krause was picked up for DUI, he refused to take a Breathalyzer test and his license was revoked. After booking, Krause was released from custody, went to the hospital, and requested a blood alcohol test. The state subsequently obtained the results of the blood test by investigative subpoena, and the District Court allowed admission of the test results at Krause's trial over his objection. Krause appealed on grounds that the test results should not have been admitted because they were not relevant to any issue in the case. Krause pointed out that the decision as to the validity of an arrest must be based on information that the officer had at the time and cannot be justified bolstered by information obtained after the fact. The state argued that the evidence of the blood test was introduced to substantiate the credibility of the arresting officer's observations and opinion, not to retrospectively validate the officer's belief that Krause had been driving under the influence. The Supreme Court agreed with Krause. The officer's character for truthfulness was not attacked, nor did evidence of Krause's blood test refer to the officer's character for truthfulness. Thus, there was no legitimate purpose for the introduction of the blood test evidence, and the District Court should have excluded it. St. v. Krause, 2002 MT 63, 309 M 174, 44 P3d 493 (2002).

Irrelevant Testimony Improperly Admitted but Not Prejudicial — Conviction Affirmed: The trial court improperly admitted witness testimony that was unrelated to the crime and clearly irrelevant. However, after evaluating the testimony under the totality of the circumstances in the context of the trial record, the Supreme Court concluded that admitting the testimony did not constitute undue prejudicial error and affirmed the conviction. St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358, 55 St. Rep. 344 (1998), followed in St. v. Gustafson, 2000 MT 364, 303 M 386, 15 P3d 944, 57 St. Rep. 1554 (2000).

Admissibility of Evidence of Intoxication in Trial for Negligent Endangerment: Larson contended that it was error to allow the prosecution's introduction of evidence comparing his alcohol consumption with the level that the scientific community has determined will impair a person's ability to drive a motor vehicle, even though the incident was not a DUI-related case. Noting that there is no longer a presumption of intoxication under Montana law, the District Court properly admitted as relevant evidence Larson's blood alcohol level, which allowed the jury to apply its experience and logic to determine whether Larson's alcohol consumption clouded his judgment and impaired his reactions. St. v. Larson, 255 M 451, 843 P2d 777, 49 St. Rep. 1077 (1992), distinguishing St. v. Morgan, 198 M 391, 646 P2d 1177 (1982), and St. v. Leverett, 245 M 124, 799 P2d 119 (1990).

Water Rights Inconsequential to Determination of Interference With Ditch Use: Evidence of the nature, priority, and extent of water rights is of no consequence to the determination of whether construction of a pond interfered with use of a ditch and was properly excluded as irrelevant. Boylan v. Van Dyke, 247 M 259, 806 P2d 1024, 48 St. Rep. 188 (1991).

Photograph of Forest Fire Scene Conflicting With Other Evidence — Weight of Evidence: In an action against the state for negligence in suppressing a forest fire that later flared up, a photograph of the fire area before the flare-up was admitted into evidence. The photograph showed no smoke even though that conflicted with radio logs; if taken from another angle, it may have shown smoke. The court ruled that it was not error to admit the photograph because such matters affect the weight accorded the photograph and do not make the photo so lack probity or so inaccurate that it is prejudicial. Jacobsen v. St., 236 M 91, 769 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 207 (1989).

State Map Depicting Forest Fires — Relevant to Show Use of Firefighting Resources and Effect of Weather Conditions: In an action against the state for negligence in suppressing a forest fire, the use of a state map marked to represent the fires burning during the times involved was relevant to the issues of the prioritization of firefighting resources and the large number of fires resulting from the dry, windy weather occurring at that time. The map showed a larger area than was required by the scope of the issues, but that did not affect its relevancy. Jacobsen v. St., 236 M 91, 769 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 207 (1989).

Opposition to New Bank Relevant to State of Mind in Wrongful Attachment Case: Testimony showed that one defendant, an officer in debtor's bank, was opposed to the opening of a new bank. The evidence was relevant to defendant's state of mind, proof of which was required to show the oppression, fraud, or malice necessary for punitive damages. Stensvad v. Towe, 232 M 378, 759 P2d 138, 45 St. Rep. 1129 (1988).

Admission of Magazines in Rape Case — Relevant to Victim's Credibility: Where a child rape victim testified that she had been shown "dirty" magazines prior to the rape and such magazines were found in defendant's apartment, the magazines were relevant because they tended to buttress the victim's credibility. Although she never testified the magazines in evidence were the same ones defendant showed her, defendant's admission that the magazines in evidence were the same present in his room on the date in question provided a sufficient foundation supporting admissibility. St. v. Laird, 225 M 306, 732 P2d 417, 44 St. Rep. 254 (1987).

Blood Alcohol Test Admissible When Good Medical Practice Followed: In a negligence action against the state brought by the guardian of a person who was incapacitated in a motorcycle accident, the trial court admitted into evidence the results of a blood alcohol test performed on the motorcycle operator after the accident. The primary issue raised by the plaintiff on appeal concerns whether an adequate foundation was established for admittance of the test results. In a 4-to-3 decision, the Supreme Court held the results were admissible, as the testing procedure comported with good medical practice for admissibility in a civil case. The court rejected the more stringent rule which requires that each of a list of facts be established as foundation for admissibility of blood alcohol test results. The three dissenting justices found that a proper foundation would include, at a minimum, evidence that the persons engaged in the test were qualified, the machine and its components were in proper condition, and the test was properly conducted. Bartel v. St., 217 M 380, 704 P2d 1067, 42 St. Rep. 1266 (1985).

Suit for Wrongfully Honoring Checks — Plaintiff's Tax Returns and Financial Statements Irrelevant: Depositor sued his bank for negligently issuing to depositor's partner a card allowing partner to withdraw funds from the partnership account without depositor's cosignature when a prior card required both signatures and for wrongfully honoring the partner's checks. The court properly excluded depositor's tax returns and financial statements relating to sale of a ranch and the gain from the sale and later repossession of the ranch, because the returns and statements had no relation to the lawsuit or the events giving rise to the suit and could not be used to diminish the damages otherwise recoverable from the bank. Tribby v. NW. Bank of Great Falls, 217 M 196, 704 P2d 409, 42 St. Rep. 1133 (1985).

Suit for Wrongfully Honoring Checks — Relevance of Evidence and Claims: Plaintiff depositor's partner induced bank to disregard account signature card requiring signature of each partner on a check and to issue a card allowing the partner to make withdrawals on his signature alone. The partner did so, and the depositor sued the bank. The court should not have excluded bank's offered evidence that the partner told bank he had authority to change the card, testimony of the partner, a letter from partner to the bank on this point, and that portion of the partnership agreement authorizing the partner to write checks. However, the court properly refused to dismiss the complaint on the asserted ground that the partnership agreement authorized the bank's action, because a jury could find the bank unauthorized to act as it did. The court also properly refused to dismiss on the asserted ground that the cause of action was a partnership asset, because depositor could show it was not, particularly when the account was opened and the original signature card issued prior to the formation of the partnership. Tribby v. NW. Bank of Great Falls, 217 M 196, 704 P2d 409, 42 St. Rep. 1133 (1985).

Prostitution at Nude Dancing and Body Painting Business — Relevance of Condom and Photo Album: When an individual openly advertises mutual nude dancing and body painting for a price, displays a photo album containing a photo of a prostrate nude male with erection and genitals painted with body paint, advertises edible body paint and edible bikinis, takes money from another for the services to be performed, escorts the customer to a private room, clothes are removed, massage of the genitals results, sexual arousal occurs, sexual intercourse is imminent, and the individuals are found in a compromising position, there is substantial evidence supporting a jury verdict that the individual committed the crime of prostitution in that she agreed to have sexual intercourse for compensation paid. A photo album and packaged condom seized on the premises under a search warrant were relevant to the question of whether prostitution was the business regularly conducted on the premises and were thus properly admitted in evidence. St. v. Baldwin, 217 M 189, 703 P2d 858, 42 St. Rep. 1126 (1985).

Irrelevant Alibi — No Time Correlation: The defense did not, as required by 46-15-301, give the prosecution pretrial notice of the identity of and intent to call an alibi witness. The judge therefore struck the witness' testimony. Defendant claimed error on appeal. The witness was not an alibi witness, because he testified he was with defendant from about 7:30 to 8:10, and both defendant and the victim testified defendant arrived at the scene of the crime at about 8:10. It was within the court's discretion to strike the testimony, because it was not relevant. St. v. Berg, 215 M 431, 697 P2d 1365, 42 St. Rep. 518 (1985).

Letter Relating to Terms of Lease Found Material: In reviewing the trial court's interpretation of the heating cost provisions of a 5-year lease, the Supreme Court held that a letter containing a payment schedule and testimony relating to the schedule had the tendency to make the reason for the payment schedule more or less probable, and the court dismissed appellant's contention that the letter was immaterial. Martin v. Laurel Cable TV, Inc., 215 M 229, 696 P2d 454, 42 St. Rep. 314 (1985).

Sex Crime Complaint Amendment to Lesser Offense — Admissibility on Issue of Victim's Credibility: Defendant sought to introduce evidence that the State twice amended its original information to reduce charges of sexual intercourse or attempted sexual intercourse to sexual assault. Defendant contended the amendments reflected the alleged victims' changing stories and wished to attack their credibility through the amendments. The evidence was properly denied. The prosecutor had stated the amendments were for tactical reasons, not because of any decision by the alleged victims. Defendant's argument, that because the court judicially noticed the amendments evidence behind their having been made should have been admitted, was without merit because the court noticed them only for the purpose of ruling on the State's motion to exclude evidence of them and not for future evidentiary considerations. St. v. Anderson, 211 M 272, 686 P2d 193, 41 St. Rep. 1357 (1984).

Criminal Mischief for Damage to One's Own Property to Defraud Insurer — Relevance of Pictures of Property: Defendant was charged with criminal mischief in that he purposely drove his pickup over a steep bank to wreck it so he could collect from his insurance company. Later the pickup was vandalized. Pictures of the pickup taken after the vandalism were properly admitted as proof of defendant's motive, and their probative value was substantial and was not outweighed by prejudice to defendant, who claimed that they should not have been admitted because they were evidence of other crimes as well as the one with which he was charged and that he had not been charged with vandalism. St. v. Gray, 207 M 261, 673 P2d 1262, 40 St. Rep. 2023 (1983).

Relevance of Unmailed Letter Contradicting Testimony: A letter that wife wrote to her father, stating that her lawyer was "in cahoots with the psychologist" and that the two were setting her husband up "very smart" in divorce proceeding and would make her look "super good", was a private communication. There was no evidence it was completed or sent. Husband found and copied it. The trial judge allowed wife to testify as to its contents and had the opportunity to determine whether the letter was relevant to the truth of her statements and her credibility. It was not an abuse of discretion to exclude the letter for either evidentiary or impeachment purposes. Cherewick v. Cherewick, 205 M 75, 666 P2d 742, 40 St. Rep. 1106 (1983).

Handwriting Analysis — Not Relevant to Show Mental State in Criminal Action: At issue was the state of mind of arson defendant on the night he allegedly set the fire. Handwriting analyst did not testify as to his mental state that night or to an analysis of a writing he made that night. Her testimony as to analysis of writings made before and after that night was not relevant and was properly excluded. St. v. Gray, 202 M 445, 659 P2d 255, 40 St. Rep. 199 (1983).

Illustrative Exhibits: In reviewing the trial court's ruling on admission of illustrative exhibits, the Supreme Court must give great deference to the trial court's discretion. Barmeyer v. Mont. Power Co., 202 M 185, 657 P2d 594, 40 St. Rep. 23 (1983).

Experiments — Simulated Accident: In action by a father alleging negligent care and supervision of his son at the YMCA swimming pool, evidence showed that one of five qualified lifeguards at the pool found the 6-year-old boy submerged about 4½ feet from the surface, that the lifeguard and a young boy pulled the son to the surface, and that one or more lifeguards carried the boy to the edge of the pool. The trial judge admitted evidence of an experiment in which one of the lifeguards threw a diving ring into the pool where the son was recovered and timed how long it took two young boys (one of which had helped save the son) to retrieve it, and then threw a 10-pound diving weight into the pool so that it settled into the pool. The boys were unable to retrieve it. From this the lifeguard concluded that the son was not on the bottom of the pool when rescued. The evidence was properly admitted since it supported the conclusion that the son was rescued in a shorter period of time than it would take for brain damage to result through submersion in water, and the experiment was substantially similar to the accident and rescue so as to lay a sufficient foundation for admission of testimony regarding the experiment. Johnson v. YMCA, 201 M 36, 651 P2d 1245, 39 St. Rep. 1937 (1982).

Corporate Liquidation — Records of Related Family Corporations Relevant: In an action for liquidation of a corporation because of oppression and shareholder deadlock, corporate minutes and financial statements of two separate but closely related family corporations were relevant and therefore admissible. Fox v. 7L Bar Ranch Co., 198 M 201, 645 P2d 929, 39 St. Rep. 862 (1982).

Farmer's Testimony as to Damage to Own Land: Plaintiffs own a farm surrounded on three sides by the Flathead River and Flathead Lake. After Kerr Dam was built in 1939, the water table in the area began to rise. In 1960 plaintiffs filed suit claiming inverse condemnation of their land and damages due to the rising of the water table. The complaint was amended four times over the years and was finally tried in 1979. Defendant claimed that the cause was barred by prescription and the Statute of Limitations. At all times defendant denied any damage. Plaintiffs presented photographs of the land and a chart showing various tracts in different colors, denoting the degree of soil damage in each tract. Defendant objected that the evidence was a self-serving statement. The Supreme Court recognizes a farmer's competence to testify, without proper foundation, about the effects of water damage to his crop and land. (See Watson v. Colusa-Parrot Min. & Smelting Co., 31 M 513, 79 P 14 (1905).) The chart was held to be properly admissible on this basis. Blasdel v. Mont. Power Co., 196 M 417, 640 P2d 889, 39 St. Rep. 219 (1982).

Evidence of Changes External to Subdivision Relevant to Question of Violation of Restrictive Covenant: In an action by subdivision property owners for a preliminary injunction enjoining the use of a building for any purpose other than as a single-family dwelling pursuant to restrictive covenants, evidence as to changes in the character of the subdivision caused by developments in neighboring land is relevant to the question of whether the restrictions on the use of the dwelling are being violated. The evidence is admissible on the question of whether the character of the neighborhood has changed so radically as to render enforcement of the restrictions inequitable. Porter v. K & S Partnership, 192 M 175, 627 P2d 836, 38 St. Rep. 648 (1981).

Impeachment Evidence Held Relevant — Fair Trial Not Denied: In a prosecution for theft in which the defendant first gave the prosecutor notice of intent to rely on an alibi and later withdrew the notice and obtained a pretrial order limiting the prosecutor's cross-examination to the scope of direct examination, the court did not err in allowing the prosecutor to ask a defense witness, who previously testified about defendant's physical condition during the time the theft was committed, whether she had previously made any statements that she was with the defendant at the time of the offense. The ruling of the trial court was in accordance with the holding in Kipp v. Silverman, 25 M 296, 64 P 884 (1901), in which it was held that cross-examination should be allowed an extended range rather than a limited one. In the present case, the prosecution only attempted to determine if the witness' testimony related to the defendant's condition on the day of the theft. St. v. Hart, 191 M 375, 625 P2d 21, 38 St. Rep. 133 (1981).

Evidence of Payments to Employees as Tending to Refute Performance of Contract: Plaintiff brought suit alleging that, although he had performed in accordance with a land clearing contract, defendant refused to release to him certain slash disposal money due and owing as consideration. Defendant denied that plaintiff had fully performed under the contract and alleged, by way of counterclaim, that because of this failure he had lost the use of his land as farmland for 3 years. Defendant offered evidence of expenditures made in hiring others to complete work allegedly left undone by the plaintiff. The trial court improperly refused the evidence, as it tended to support defendant's denial of plaintiff's allegation that plaintiff had fully performed and was entitled to the slash disposal money. The refusal to admit this evidence did not constitute reversible error, however, as defendant was able to introduce evidence showing the condition of the land after plaintiff finished his work as well as evidence that he hired others to finish the work allegedly left undone by plaintiff. In spite of this evidence, plaintiff prevailed at the trial level, and that judgment was affirmed. Marvin v. Hargrave, 190 M 59, 618 P2d 339, 37 St. Rep. 1737 (1980).

Actions Related to Inadmissible Hearsay — No Probative Value: A police officer testified that he traveled in order to observe the owner of a stolen vehicle signing a stolen property report. The testimony was inadmissible hearsay because it was testimony about an extrajudicial statement in an effort to prove the truth of the statement, i.e., to show that a theft was committed. The actions of the officer in traveling and observing the signing are not admissible, not because they are hearsay but because those actions are irrelevant, having no probative value to the case at hand. In re D.W.L., A Youth, 189 M 267, 615 P2d 887, 37 St. Rep. 1452 (1980), followed in Heisler v. Boule, 226 M 332, 735 P2d 516, 44 St. Rep. 698 (1987).

Nonprejudicial Cumulative Error on Hazard of Crossing: The District Court admitted part and refused part of the State of Montana's Railroad Crossing Protection Policy on the ground that the hazard rating for the railroad crossing in question was not necessarily connected to its hazard rating at the time of the accident. The District Court also admitted some and refused other evidence relating to traffic counts and hazard indexes. The District Court by instruction defined ordinary care and by further instructions told the jury that public authorities have the duty to exercise ordinary or reasonable care to plan and design the highways to make them reasonably safe for the traveling public. The District Court also instructed that the duty of the county in maintaining the crossing was commensurate with the increased hazard occasioned by any obstructions, so that it was the duty of the county to exercise ordinary care under the circumstances shown. Evidence was presented for the jury to consider in determining whether or not the county exercised ordinary care in failing to provide additional signal devices at the crossing. The claimed errors were therefore not prejudicial to plaintiff since they were only cumulative on one side or the other of the issue of how hazardous the crossing was. Wollaston v. Burlington N., 188 M 192, 612 P2d 1277, 37 St. Rep. 1015 (1980).

Effect of Remoteness on Relevancy — Evidence Discovered Less Than Three Months After Crime: The objection that evidence is too remote is directed to the trial court's discretion and is a matter that goes to the credibility of the evidence rather than its admissibility unless the offered evidence is so remote as to have no evidentiary value. When witnesses had testified that the defendant possessed a .45 caliber handgun and wore a ski mask while waiting in a car at the scene of the crime, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting into evidence a ski mask and a .45 caliber shell casing taken from the car less than 3 months after the crime. St. v. Fitzpatrick, 186 M 187, 606 P2d 1343, 37 St. Rep. 194 (1980).

Relevancy of Usual Fees in Theft Prosecution of Fiduciary: Testimony as to the usual fee charged by an attorney to workers' compensation clients is relevant in a prosecution of the defendant on charges of larceny by bailee. The purpose of expert testimony is to aid the jury, but it does not limit the jury's capacity to decide for itself. Since the statute at the time in question provided that an agreement as to attorney fees could be implied, some standard as to what such an implied agreement might be was essential. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974, 36 St. Rep. 1037 (1979).

Rule 402. Relevant evidence generally admissible; irrelevant evidence inadmissible.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal Rule 402 except that the clause beginning with "except as otherwise provided" is changed to apply to Montana law and is identical to Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 402 except that "constitution" is added.

This rule codifies a classic formulation and analysis of the admissibility of evidence. Advisory Committee Note to Federal Rule 402, 46 F.R.D. 161, 223. Under this analysis, the admissibility of evidence is determined first by testing relevance and then by determining whether the evidence is excluded by some provision of the law of evidence. Thayer, Preliminary Treatise on Evidence at Common Law 269 (1898). The codification of this formulation in Federal Rule 402 first declares the general principle that all relevant evidence is admissible with exceptions provided by law and then declares the negative of the general principle that whatever is not relevant is not admissible but lists no exceptions. In other words, irrelevant evidence is never admissible.

Existing Montana law, noted in the Commission Comments to Rule 401, is certainly consistent with Rule 402. The exceptions to the general rule that all relevant evidence is admissible contained in Rule 402 refer to situations listed below. The list of exclusionary law and rules is only by way of example, because if a party wishes that relevant evidence be excluded he must object and give the specific reasons and authority therefor under Rule 103.

Constitutional provisions excluding evidence relate primarily to the Fourth, Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the United States Constitution and Sections 11, 24 and 25 of Article II, 1972 Constitution of Montana covering search and seizure, self-incrimination, and right to jury trial and case law under these provisions. Examples given by the Advisory Committee Note to Federal Rule 402, 46 F.R.D. 161, 225, are Weeks v. U.S. 332 U.S. 383 (1944) and Katz v. U.S. 389 U.S. 347 (1967) for unlawful search and seizure and Massiah v. U.S., 377 U.S. 201 (1964) for incriminating statements elicited in violation of right to counsel. Reference to these provisions and cases reflects the intent of the rule to recognize these limitations on the admissibility imposed by these constitutions but not to list each instance of limitation possible.

Statutory provisions which limit the admissibility of evidence in Montana must also be given by way of example because again the rule does not intend to list each limitation imposed: Section 32-1213(c), R.C.M. 1947 [61-7-114], does not allow an accident report under the Uniform Accident Report Act to be used as evidence in any trial. This view was affirmed in Morrison v. City of Butte, 150 Mont. 106, 112, 431 P2d 79 (1967). A similar provision is found in Section 53-428, R.C.M. 1947 [61-6-108], under the Motor Vehicle Safety — Responsibility Act disallowing actions or findings by the supervisor under the act to be admitted as evidence of negligence in an action for damages. Under Section 93-401-13, R.C.M. 1947 [28-2-905, also at 72-11-304, now repealed, and 70-20-202], parol evidence of writings is excluded except in certain circumstances. Under R.C.M. 1947, Sections 93-601-2 [26-1-902] and 93-701-4 [Title 26, ch. 1, part 8] privileges are recognized which do not allow otherwise admissible evidence. Under the code of criminal procedure, two sections (R.C.M. 1947, 95-1803(c) [46-15-302] and 95-1804(c) [46-15-303]) exclude evidence if it has not met discovery, inspection and notice requirements. Two other sections implement statutory guarantees under the Fourth and Fifth Amendments to the U.S. Constitution and Sections 11 and 25 of Article II of The 1972 Montana Constitution; Section 95-1805, R.C.M. 1947 [46-13-301], provides for suppression of involuntary confessions and [Section] 95-1806, R.C.M. 1947 [46-13-302], of illegally seized evidence.

Other rules which exclude evidence will be found following this rule: Rules 403, 404, and 407 through 411 exclude otherwise relevant evidence; Article V excludes evidence through privileges; Article VI presents restrictions upon the examination of witnesses having the effect of excluding evidence; Article VII sets out requirements for expert testimony; Article VIII excludes hearsay evidence; Article IX excludes evidence not properly authenticated and identified; and Article X restricts proof of writings and recordings.

Montana Rules of Civil Procedure applicable in the courts of this state which provide procedures for excluding relevant evidence are Rule 16, allowing limitations upon evidence to be introduced at trial; Rule 30(b), allowing protection of parties or deponents and thereby excluding relevant evidence; and Rule 37, allowing the court to forbid introduction by a party of any evidence for failure to comply with the discovery rules.

RELEVANT EVIDENCE

Text Messages Properly Admitted — Evidence Showing Conspiracy Involving Defendant Properly Admitted Under Coconspirator Exception — Probative Value Outweighed Danger of Unfair Prejudice — Statements Against Interest and Statements by Party Opponent — Defendant’s Jury Instruction Regarding Reasonable Doubt Properly Refused. St. v. Wienke, 2022 MT 116, 409 Mont. 52, 511 P.3d 990.

Escape Attempt 3 Weeks After Crime Relevant: The defendant was shot in the leg by a homeowner in the course of a burglary. While recovering at a rehabilitation center, the defendant escaped and was arrested after a high-speed chase with police. At trial, the state sought to introduce evidence of the defendant’s escape, to which defense counsel objected because it occurred weeks after the burglary and therefore was irrelevant. The state argued that the evidence of the escape attempt was relevant because it showed consciousness of guilt. The District Court allowed evidence to be presented to the jury, and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing that evidence of the defendant’s escape from the rehabilitation center was relevant to prove consciousness of guilt. St. v. Strizich, 2021 MT 306, 406 Mont. 391, 499 P.3d 575.

Blanket Exclusion of Victim’s Use of Drugs Prior to Reporting Rape — Abuse of Discretion in He-Said/She-Said Case — New Trial Granted: The defendant was charged with sexual intercourse without consent. He claimed that the alleged victim had consented. At trial, the defendant sought to introduce a redacted version of the victim’s toxicology report that indicated high levels of THC in her blood and testimony that the victim had ingested a THC-concentrated marijuana product shortly before reporting the alleged rape to police. The District Court disallowed the report, finding that the evidence would unfairly confuse and distract the jury. On appeal, the Supreme Court concluded that the District Court’s total exclusion of the victim’s marijuana use for impeachment purposes was an abuse of discretion in a classic “he-said/she-said” case. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the matter for a new trial. St. v. Pelletier, 2020 MT 249, 401 Mont. 454, 473 P.3d 991.

Stale and Unsubstantiated Rape Allegation — Probative Value Outweighed by Prejudice: The defendant was charged with sexual intercourse without consent. He claimed that the alleged victim had consented. At trial, the defendant testified that he was not the kind of person that would rape someone. The District Court allowed the prosecutor to question the defendant about an allegation he had raped someone 15 years before when he was 15 years old. After his conviction, the defendant appealed and argued that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing the state to cross-examine him about the allegation. The Supreme Court agreed, holding that the unsubstantiated allegation from when the defendant was a teenager over 15 years earlier had minimum probative value and was extremely prejudicial. Accordingly, the Supreme Court reversed and remanded the matter for a new trial. St. v. Pelletier, 2020 MT 249, 401 Mont. 454, 473 P.3d 991.

Exclusion of Evidence Relevant to Testimony of Key Witness — Abuse of Discretion — Homicide Trial: The defendant argued that he was defending himself from the victim at the time he shot and killed him. The District Court granted the prosecutor's motion in limine to prohibit the defense from introducing evidence that the sole witness to the homicide may have been high on methamphetamine at the time of the murder. Following conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which agreed that the District Court had abused its discretion in granting the motion in limine. The Supreme Court reasoned that the ruling had prevented the jury from considering important impeachment evidence and remanded the matter. St. v. Polak, 2018 MT 174, 392 Mont. 90, 422 P.3d 112.

Indistinguishable DUI Reports — Preclusion of Defendant From Introducing or Referencing Reports for Purpose of Impeachment — Abuse of Discretion: A defendant accused of DUI sought to introduce police reports from other cases prepared by the reporting officer. The reports contained identical or nearly identical language that led to at least one mistake in another case in which the officer reported that the suspect had failed a field sobriety test that the officer did not administer. Because the reports were relevant and admissible to attack the police officer's credibility and truthfulness, the District Court abused its discretion by granting the state's motion in limine to preclude the defendant from introducing or referencing the arresting officer's reports for purposes of impeachment. St. v. Zimmerman, 2018 MT 94, 391 Mont. 210, 417 P.3d 289.

Condemnation of Private Water System: The city of Missoula filed a complaint to condemn the water system privately owned by the defendant water company. The city previously lost an attempt to condemn the water system in Missoula v. Mtn. Water Co. (Mountain Water I), 228 Mont. 404, 743 P.2d 590 (1987), and Missoula v. Mtn. Water Co. (Mountain Water II), 236 Mont. 442, 771 P.2d 103 (1989). The District Court issued a preliminary order of condemnation. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, finding that the defendants presented no compelling evidence that they were deprived of due process, that the District Court properly refused to grant a continuance and no actual prejudice resulted, that the defendants did not make a compelling case that they were not ready for trial because they were able to present a full and well-prepared defense, that the District Court properly declined to admit all of the proposed valuation evidence and the Legislature clearly intended for valuation to be determined by unbiased fact finders after the necessity determination, that the District Court properly refused to dismiss a party, that collateral estoppel was inappropriate because there was a change of circumstances sufficient to warrant a new analysis of whether public ownership of the water system was more necessary than private ownership and the city's previous attempt to acquire the water system did not bar the new action, that the District Court properly found that the effect of condemnation on employees was one of several nondispositive factors that must be considered, and that the District Court correctly determined that public ownership of the water system was more necessary than private ownership. Missoula v. Mtn. Water Co., 2016 MT 183, 384 Mont. 193, 378 P.3d 1113.

Statistics Concerning Lineup Identification — No Abuse of Discretion: A detective's testimony that it is extremely rare for witnesses to identify suspects from photo lineups was relevant because it bore on the credibility of a witness's identification of the defendant. St. v. Zlahn, 2014 MT 224, 376 Mont. 245, 332 P.3d 247.

Admission of Sexually Explicit Photographs Taken When Victim Was Between 15 and 18 Years Of Age — Relevant and Admissible: There is no age element required for a conviction of incest; thus sexually explicit photographs taken when the victim was 18 were relevant and admissible because they tended to prove the defendant had a sexual relationship with the victim, who was his daughter. Additionally, because the photographs were admissible to prove a necessary element in the crime of incest, the defendant's argument that the photographs were inadmissible because they did not provide evidence for a sentence enhancement lacked merit. St. v. Stewart, 2012 MT 317, 367 Mont. 503, 291 P.3d 1187.

No Requirement That All Uncharged Acts Be Similar or Near In Time to Charged Act: When a defendant raises a Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., objection, the court should analyze whether the evidence is relevant for a purpose that does not involve drawing an impermissible inference of action in conformity with a trait of character. St. v. 18th Judicial District Court, 2010 MT 263, 358 Mont. 325, 246 P.3d 415.

Sufficient Explanation of DNA Evidence to Jury — Prosecutor's Reference to Defendant's DNA Not Violative of Due Process: A prosecution expert testified that the presence of Jackson's DNA could not be excluded from a weapon used to kill a deputy. During closing, the prosecutor referenced the presence of Jackson's DNA on the weapon where it should never have been. Jackson asserted that the reference to Jackson's DNA violated his due process rights because the testimony did not state that it was Jackson's DNA on the weapon, but rather that Jackson could not be eliminated as a contributor to the DNA sample. However, the jury was given a correct explanation of the DNA evidence numerous times throughout the trial, and the state's case did not rest solely on DNA evidence. The Supreme Court concluded that the prosecutor's brief incorrect reference, to which Jackson did not object, did not implicate Jackson's fundamental rights or compromise the judicial process, so plain error review of the claim was inappropriate. St. v. Jackson, 2009 MT 427, 354 M 63, 22 P3d 1213 (2009), distinguishing U.S. v. Massey, 594 F2d 676 (8th Cir. 1979), and Brown v. Farwell, 525 F3d 787 (9th Cir. 2008).

Admissibility of Evidence From Prior Suit — Distinct Causes of Action and Different Instances of Alleged Wrongdoing: Plaintiffs sued defendant insurer for breach of contract for failing to cover medical expenses, even though coverage had been provided for similar medical costs in the past and the insurance policy remained the same. The District Court held that evidence from prior settled disputes could not be used in the present suit and granted the insurer's motion for summary judgment on grounds of res judicata and collateral estoppel. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed. Although the medical issue was similar to the prior settled coverage, the instant action alleged wrongdoing by the insurer after the prior coverage dispute was settled and alleged a distinct cause of action arising from a different instance of alleged wrongdoing, so plaintiffs' use of evidence that was relevant in the previous dispute did not constitute relitigation of the prior dispute that would be barred by res judicata and collateral estoppel, and the District Court erred in so holding. The prior evidence was admissible to provide a context for the instant claims by revealing the history of plaintiffs' relationship with the insurer. Lorang v. Fortis Ins. Co., 2008 MT 252, 345 M 12, 192 P3d 186 (2008). See also Berlin v. Boedecker, 268 M 444, 887 P2d 1180 (1994).

Evidence of Purchase of Medication With Day-Care Funds Relevant to Question of Whether Medicine Endangered or Caused Death of Children in Day Care: Bieber was charged with the death of one child and endangerment of other children in her day-care center by administering an over-the-counter sedative medication to the children without their parents' permission and in violation of administrative rules pertaining to the use of drugs at day-care centers. The state offered evidence that Bieber purchased 63 12-ounce bottles of the medication during the 2 years prior to the child's death, 45 bottles in the year prior to the child's death, and 6 bottles within a month of the death and showed that the majority of the purchases were made with day-care funds. Bieber objected to the evidence on grounds that the evidence was irrelevant and highly prejudicial. The evidence was admitted, and Bieber appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed. The evidence of Bieber's long-term purchases with day-care funds was relevant to the questions of whether Bieber caused the child's death and endangered the other children by administering the medication to them. The evidence was probative and not unfairly prejudicial. Likewise, the evidence of administrative violations was admissible under the transaction rule. St. v. Bieber, 2007 MT 262, 339 M 309, 170 P3d 444 (2007).

Order of Presentation of Proof at Discretion of Trial Court: The order at which proof is admitted at trial is within the sound discretion of the trial court. In this case, ordering the trial so that the jury considered whether defendant's counterclaim had been settled before deciding the merits of the counterclaim was a logical sequence for considering the issues and was not an abuse of discretion. Stockman Bank of Mont. v. Potts, 2006 MT 64, 331 M 381, 132 P3d 546 (2006). See also St. v. White, 185 M 213, 605 P2d 191 (1980), and St. v. Snaric, 262 M 62, 862 P2d 1175 (1993).

Admission of Medical Records to Determine Whether Material Misrepresentation Made on Application — No Prejudice: When applying for credit life insurance, plaintiff's husband, Clarence, indicated that he was in good health. Less than 1 year later, Clarence died, and plaintiff submitted an insurance claim, but the claim was denied and the policy was rescinded, so plaintiff sued. At trial, the District Court admitted Clarence's medical records. Plaintiff argued that the records were allowed without foundation showing that the records existed when Clarence applied for the insurance or that the records were relied on by the parties. The court concluded that it was for the jury to decide whether Clarence made a material misrepresentation that would justify defendant's action in denying the claim and rescinding the policy. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the District Court did not act arbitrarily or exceed the bounds of reason in admitting the records for jury inspection and that plaintiff failed to identify any prejudicial information in the records or show how introduction of the records harmed the case. Williams

v. Union Fidelity Life Ins. Co., 2005 MT 273, 329 M 158, 123 P3d 213 (2005). See also Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001).

Evidence Related to Plaintiff's Bankruptcy Properly Precluded From Trial Regarding Plaintiff's Purchase of Credit Life Insurance: When Clarence and Barbara purchased a vehicle, the dealer offered credit life insurance as part of the transaction. Clarence died within 1 year of the purchase, but the insurer denied a life insurance claim and rescinded the policy. Barbara sued the insurer for fraud and bad faith. At trial, defendant sought to introduce evidence regarding plaintiff's bankruptcy, but the trial court granted Barbara's motion in limine excluding the bankruptcy evidence, and defendant appealed. The Supreme Court found no evidence that the trial court acted arbitrarily or exceeded the bounds of reason in granting the motion in limine, and the trial court was affirmed. Williams v. Union Fidelity Life Ins. Co., 2005 MT 273, 329 M 158, 123 P3d 213 (2005). See also Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001).

Sufficient Evidence of Attempted Obstruction of Peace Officer — Jury Properly Instructed Regarding Mental Standards of Offense: When she saw heavily armed officers approaching a neighbor's residence, Baker called the neighbor and left a recorded message that it would be in the neighbor's interests to peek out the window. The message was subsequently confiscated, and Baker was charged with and convicted of attempted obstruction of a police officer. On appeal, Baker challenged the use of evidence regarding the neighbor's history and arrest, the purpose and use of the high-risk unit in arresting the neighbor, and an officer's outrage at Baker's interference with the police, contending that the evidence was irrelevant and unfairly prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under the transaction rule set out in St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371 (1999), the trial court did not err in allowing the evidence because it enabled the jury to understand the circumstances surrounding the police activity and how Baker's interference could have affected the outcome. Baker also contested the jury instructions. Under 45-7-302, a person obstructs an officer when the person knowingly hinders the enforcement of the criminal law, so for a person to commit the offense of attempted obstruction, the person need only perform any act toward the commission of obstruction while aware of the fact that the person is performing the act. The instructions to the jury contained an explanation of the "knowingly" standard and multiple instructions on Baker's purpose for making the call and thus were a fair and full instruction on the law. The conviction was affirmed. St. v. Baker, 2004 MT 393, 325 M 229, 104 P3d 491 (2004).

Evidence of History of Violence — Consideration Not Limited to Parent or to Violence of Another Committed During Course of Relationship With Parent — Converse Fallacy of Accident or Hasty Generalization: In a child abuse and neglect proceeding, the physician doing psychological evaluations of the parents was given documents that referred to the father's alleged history of violence in another state. On appeal of the termination of parental rights, the mother argued that because she was neither dating nor married to the father at the time of the alleged violence, the doctor should not have considered the father's violent history in evaluating her. The mother relied on three cases in which evidence of violence by a spouse or intimate partner that was committed during the course of the relationship with the parent, who is the subject of the inquiry, was held admissible. The Supreme Court held that the cases cited by the mother do not require a court to exclude any evidence if that evidence is relevant. If the evidence is admissible in court, a fortiori, it is admissible in the psychologist's evaluation. By relying on the cited cases, the mother committed the converse fallacy of accident or hasty generalization. In re D.B., 2004 MT 371, 325 M 13, 103 P3d 1026 (2004).

Photographs of Nonvictim Children Not Considered Prejudicial or Character Evidence — Probative Value Warranting Admissibility: In Bar-Jonah's aggravated kidnapping, sexual assault, and assault with a weapon trial, the trial court allowed the admission of hundreds of photographs of children seized during a search of Bar-Jonah's residence. Bar-Jonah contended that the photographs were: (1) improperly admitted because only a few were images of the victims; and (2) unfairly prejudicial and tended to erroneously reflect on Bar-Jonah's character. The Supreme Court disagreed. The photographs were relevant by linking them to Bar-Jonah's motive for befriending the victims, for enhancing the credibility of the victims, and to rebut Bar-Jonah's asserted defenses. Even if the photographs could be construed to reflect on Bar-Jonah's character, they were not introduced for that purpose, but rather to prove motive. Any prejudice to Bar-Jonah through introduction of the photographs was outweighed by their probative value, which did not present evidence of other crimes or acts. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Admissibility and Jury Instructions Related to Unrecorded Subdivision Covenants — Validity of Unrecorded Instrument Between Persons With Notice: At issue in a subdivision dispute were unrecorded covenants prohibiting commercial activity in the subdivision. The District Court allowed the unrecorded instruments into evidence and instructed the jury that the instruments were valid between the parties who had notice of them. On appeal, the Supreme Court found no error either in admission of the covenants into evidence or in the jury instruction. Witnesses testified that copies of the unrecorded instruments had been given to both parties, so the documents were clearly relevant and admissible, and because both parties were notified of the restrictive covenants, an instruction regarding the validity of the instruments was appropriate under 70-21-102. Rice v. C.I. Lanning, 2004 MT 237, 322 M 487, 97 P3d 580 (2004).

Evidence of Defendant's Intoxication Following Arrest Admissible Under Transaction Rule: At McCaslin's trial for aggravated assault, assault, and assault with a weapon, the state introduced evidence of McCaslin's intoxication after arrest. McCaslin contended that the evidence was irrelevant and prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Under the transaction rule, McCaslin's behavior following arrest was relevant as part of the transaction, and the jury had a right to hear evidence regarding McCaslin's behavior subsequent to arrest in order to provide context to the criminal act. St. v. McCaslin, 2004 MT 212, 322 M 350, 96 P3d 722 (2004). See also St. v. Detonancour, 2001 MT 213, 306 M 389, 34 P3d 487 (2001), and St. v. McLaughlin, 2009 MT 211, 351 M 282, 210 P3d 694 (2009).

Generalized Expert Testimony Regarding Sexual Abuse and Religious Manipulation and Control Properly Admitted in Sexual Intercourse Without Consent, Incest, and Witness Tampering Case: In Sandrock's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, incest, and witness tampering, an expert testified regarding sexual abuse and religious manipulation and control based on experiences in a Christian sect. Sandrock moved for mistrial on grounds that the testimony was irrelevant and tended to supplant the state's need to prove Sandrock's mental state. The motion was denied, and on appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The expert did not provide any testimony specific to Sandrock, but rather provided the jury a context within which to understand the intricacies of religious groups in general, so the court concluded that the testimony was relevant. Further, the testimony did not prejudice Sandrock because Sandrock himself admitted to controlling his wife and daughters, and the expert never stated that Sandrock exhibited or performed the beliefs that were typical of the religious groups about which the expert testified in general. The mistrial motion was properly denied. St. v. Sandrock, 2004 MT 195, 322 M 231, 95 P3d 153 (2004).

No Violation of Pretrial Order Precluding Evidence of Negligence by Plaintiff's Employer — New Trial Properly Denied: Plaintiff was employed by a vocational day-care program that took developmentally disabled persons on day outings. Plaintiff was assaulted by a developmentally disabled person from a group home managed by defendant corporation and sued the corporation for negligence for failing to control the assailant. Before trial, the District Court granted plaintiffs' motion to exclude any evidence of negligence by plaintiff's employer and ruled that defendant had a special relationship of custody and control over the disabled person and thus had a legal duty of care to those placed within the foreseeable zone of risk created by any breach of that duty. Nevertheless, the jury found for defendant, and plaintiffs' motion for a new trial was denied. On appeal, plaintiffs contended that when defense counsel repeatedly referred to the individual planning process for the assailant, in which plaintiff's employer was a partner, blame for the injury was thereby shifted to plaintiff's employer in violation of the pretrial order and prevented plaintiffs from receiving a fair trial. The Supreme Court disagreed, pointing out that plaintiffs opened the door by presenting evidence regarding the individual planning process in questioning plaintiffs' first witness and that both parties subsequently presented evidence about the process. Further, evidence regarding the individual planning process was relevant to a limit on defendant's ability to monitor the assailant and did not equate to evidence of negligence by plaintiff's employer, nor did defense counsel ever attempt to establish that any breach of legal duty by the employer led to plaintiff's injury. Thus, the District Court did not manifestly abuse its discretion in denying plaintiffs' motion for a new trial, and the verdict was affirmed. Papich v. Quality Life Concepts, Inc., 2004 MT 116, 321 M 156, 91 P3d 553 (2004), distinguishing Cech v. St., 183 M 75, 598 P2d 584 (1979), Durden v. Hydro Flame Corp., 1998 MT 47, 288 M 1, 955 P2d 160 (1998), St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103 (1998), Unmack v. Deaconess Medical Center, 1998 MT 262, 291 M 280, 967 P2d 783 (1998), and Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001).

Discovery of Medical Records Upon Commencement of Action for Damages Placing Mental and Physical Condition at Issue — Waiver of Physician-Patient Privilege as to Condition in Controversy: Plaintiff's child fell through the second story railing at the Montana State University-Bozeman library and suffered brain injuries. Plaintiff brought damage claims related to the child's injuries and claims related to plaintiff's own emotional distress, loss of consortium, and posttraumatic stress disorder. The state moved to compel production of all of plaintiff's health care records from before and after the fall. The District Court denied the motion, holding that the records were constitutionally protected and irrelevant to the case and therefore not discoverable. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted plaintiff's constitutional right to confidentiality of medical records, but cited State ex rel. Mapes v. District Court, 250 M 524, 822 P2d 91 (1991), for the holding that that right must be balanced against a defendant's right to defend itself in an informed manner and that records of prior physical or mental conditions are discoverable only if they relate to currently claimed damages. Here, plaintiff commenced an action for damages that placed in issue the mental and physical condition arising from the accident, thus waiving any physician-patient privilege as to the condition in controversy, and the state had the right to discover evidence related to prior medical conditions that was possibly connected to plaintiff's current damages. Denial of the discovery motion prejudiced the state's right to defend itself in an informed manner, constituting reversible error. Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004).

Motion In Limine to Exclude Relevant Statements Made by Defendant During and After Assault Properly Denied: During a bar fight, Brasda brandished a knife and stated that he would use it because he was not afraid to go back to prison. After the fight, Brasda stated to a deputy that he didn't try to stab anyone. At trial, Brasda made a motion in limine to suppress the statements on grounds that they were irrelevant to any fact at issue or, alternatively, that they were statements of other crimes or acts and inadmissible because no exception applied. The trial court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Both statements were clearly relevant and integral to the state's proof of the elements of the crime and to the jury's ability to evaluate witness testimony. Further, the statements were admissible under the mental, emotional, or physical condition exception to the hearsay rule and under the transaction rule in 26-1-103. The court also noted that under St. v. Bauer, 2002 MT 7, 308 M 99, 39 P3d 689 (2002), statements regarding a defendant's history or imprisonment and probationary status that are inextricably linked to circumstances surrounding the crime are admissible. Denial of the motion in limine was proper. St. v. Brasda, 2003 MT 374, 319 M 146, 82 P3d 922 (2003).

Supreme Court Reduction of Offense of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent to Sexual Assault — Relevance of Testimony of Victims Regarding Belief That Massage Therapist's Actions Were Criminal: Stevens was convicted of two counts of sexual intercourse without consent after having sexual contact with two female patients at his massage clinic. The Supreme Court determined that there was insufficient proof that the offenses were committed without consent and, without addressing whether sexual assault was a lesser included offense of sexual intercourse without consent, reduced the offenses to sexual assault. Even though Stevens was not specifically charged with sexual assault, there was no question that he was reasonably apprised of the sexual assault charges against him. Stevens offered a jury instruction, which was given without objection, stating that sexual intercourse without consent necessarily included the offense of sexual assault. Evidence clearly showed that Stevens had sexual contact with the victims, and testimony from the victims regarding whether they considered sexual contact by a massage professional to be criminal was relevant and admissible, tending to make the existence of a material element of the crime, namely whether the crime was committed without consent, more likely than without the evidence. St. v. Stevens, 2002 MT 181, 311 M 52, 53 P3d 356 (2002), distinguishing St. v. Black, 270 M 329, 891 P2d 1162 (1995).

Defendant's Testimony Regarding Law-Abiding Nature Opening Door to Cross-Examination Regarding Belligerent Conduct When Arrested: Dobson testified at trial that he would have cooperated with law enforcement officers if they would have had a warrant, implying that he was peaceful and law-abiding by nature, so the state attempted to elicit testimony regarding the fact that during his arrest, Dobson was belligerent and hostile. Dobson objected on grounds that the testimony was irrelevant to the charge of sexual intercourse without consent. On a stand-alone basis, Dobson's cross-examination testimony about the details of his arrest did not tend to make the existence of any fact that he committed sexual intercourse without consent more or less probable; however, Dobson did not have a right to offer an unnecessary, self-serving statement, intended to place him in a better light with the jury, without laying the statement open to cross-examination. The state created a sufficient nexus between Dobson's direct testimony and his behavior during arrest, and Dobson opened the door through which the state was entitled to walk. Dobson had an adequate opportunity to rehabilitate himself and countermand any prejudice resulting from the cross-examination, so the testimony was relevant and properly admitted. St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001), following St. v. Kinney, 230 M 281, 750 P2d 436 (1988), and distinguishing St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358 (1998).

Defendant Acquitted of Murder — Evidence of Motive for Murder Admissible on Arson Charge — Evidence Admissible as to One Defendant Properly Introduced in Consolidated Trial: Link was acquitted by a jury of purposefully or knowingly causing Leonard's death. In a later trial on charges of arson and deliberate homicide under the felony-murder rule, Link argued that evidence of his financial motive for wanting Leonard's death was inadmissible on the arson charge because he had already been acquitted of accountability for Leonard's death. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was properly admitted because it was not made irrelevant by the fact that Link could collect only if Leonard actually died as a result of the fire. Link also argued that evidence that Enright, a codefendant with whom Link's trial had been consolidated, also committed similar crimes against Leonard was not admissible because it did not pertain to him. The Supreme Court held that the evidence against Enright was admissible because the jury was capable of considering the evidence only as it pertained to Enright and had been instructed by the District Court to do so. St. v. Enright, 2000 MT 372, 303 M 457, 16 P3d 366, 57 St. Rep. 1590 (2000).

No Prejudice From Use of Inadmissible, but Simple and Distinct, Evidence: Southern was charged with two counts of kidnapping, one count of burglary, one count of theft, and five counts of sexual intercourse without consent. In moving to sever the nine counts in the information into four separate trials pursuant to 46-13-211, Southern argued that the prejudicial effect of the other crimes evidence substantially outweighed its probative value and thus evidence of the other crimes would not have been admissible in separate trials. It is inevitable that evidence of other crimes will have some prejudicial effect, so under the fourth part of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)), relevant evidence will be inadmissible only when its probity is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Pursuant to St. v. Huether, 284 M 259, 943 P2d 1291, 54 St. Rep. 872 (1997), the prejudicial effect of relevant evidence will substantially outweigh the probative value when the evidence will prompt the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Thus, evidence is inadmissible under the fourth part of the modified Just rule if it arouses the jury's sympathy for one side without regard to its probative value, if it confuses or misleads the jury, or if it distracts the jury from the main issues in the case. Prejudice arising from the use of inadmissible evidence will not be found when the evidence is simple and distinct. Even though the other crimes evidence in Southern's case would have been prejudicial, the jury was instructed that each count was a distinct offense and had to be decided separately. There was nothing in the record to suggest that the jury did not keep the relevant evidence separate. Since the other crimes evidence was simple and distinct and would have been admissible at separate trials, Southern failed to establish that the jury used evidence of guilt on one charge to convict him of other charges on the theory that the evidence would have been inadmissible in trials on the other charges. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999).

Stipulation Precluding Need to Bring Evidence of Insurance Settlement Before Jury: Dill suffered damages after being hit as a pedestrian by a vehicle operated by Jardine. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company (State Farm) provided both liability insurance for Jardine and underinsured motorist coverage for Dill. Dill maintained that State Farm's settlement of the underlying liability claim against Jardine was admissible as relevant under Rule 401, M.R.Ev., and this rule and as impeachment evidence pursuant to Rules 607 and 801(d)(2), M.R.Ev. However, it was not necessary to bring evidence of the settlement before the jury in light of the fact that State Farm stipulated that it had paid Dill the liability policy limit on behalf of Jardine and would pay any jury verdict that exceeded that amount up to the policy limit under the underinsured motorist policy. Simple knowledge that the policy limits were paid was sufficient. Dill v. District Court, 1999 MT 85, 294 M 134, 979 P2d 188, 56 St. Rep. 350 (1999).

Evidence of Son's SIDS Death Relevant in Homicide Trial Following Daughter's Death — Just Notice Not Required: The prosecution sought to introduce evidence that, only 7 months prior to the death of his infant daughter, Huether's 7-month-old son had died of sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS) while in Huether's care. The trial court allowed the evidence pursuant to Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the evidence was improperly admitted pursuant to Rule 404(b) because the trial court misconstrued the evidence, which did not pertain to other crimes, wrongs, or acts. However, the evidence was nevertheless admissible pursuant to this rule because it was relevant to the question of whether Huether, in caring for his daughter, consciously disregarded a risk of which the death of his son should have made him aware. The probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect. Because the evidence was not Rule 404(b) "other crimes" or character evidence but, rather, relevant circumstantial evidence, the prosecution was not required to comply with the Just notice provisions. St. v. Huether, 284 M 259, 943 P2d 1291, 54 St. Rep. 872 (1997).

Admissibility of Booking Photograph Not Part of Reciprocal Discovery Package: McKeon contended that a booking photograph taken 2 days after commission of a robbery unfairly surprised him, allowing the prosecution an unfair advantage and prejudicing his case because the photograph was not part of the reciprocal discovery package and was produced only the day before trial. The Iowa state trooper who had arrested McKeon brought the photograph when he came to Montana to testify, and as soon as the prosecution became aware of the photograph, McKeon was notified. McKeon had based his mistaken identity defense on the fact that the witness description of a robbery suspect did not match his appearance at trial, but the booking photograph showed that the description was accurate at the time of the robbery. Absent a showing that the prosecution had intentionally withheld the photograph until immediately before trial, the Supreme Court held that the prosecution had complied with the spirit of the discovery rules. McKeon's decision to alter his appearance at trial from his described appearance at the time of the robbery was a strategic decision that failed, and admission of the booking photograph did not result in unfair prejudice. St. v. McKeon, 282 M 397, 938 P2d 643, 54 St. Rep. 404 (1997).

Photographs of Defendant and Accomplices Relevant for Corroboration of Accomplice Testimony: McKeon contended that dated photographs depicting him brandishing firearms with his alleged robbery accomplices should have been excluded as irrelevant and highly prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed, holding that the photographs were relevant for the purpose of corroborating portions of an accomplice's testimony in which the chain of events leading up to the robbery were described, including the fact that the parties were traveling around the West around the time of the crime and that the accomplice had purchased firearms for McKeon and another accomplice similar to those in the photographs. Corroboration of the accomplice testimony was necessary and prudent, and the probative value of the photographs outweighed any possible prejudicial effect. St. v. McKeon, 282 M 397, 938 P2d 643, 54 St. Rep. 404 (1997).

Evidence That Insurance Agent Who Had Premiums Paid With Loans Against Policy Without Plaintiffs' Knowledge Did Same Thing to Other Insureds: An insurance agent testified that forms that he filled out authorizing loans against plaintiffs' policies to pay premiums must have been authorized by plaintiffs because he would not otherwise have filled them out and sent them in. Plaintiffs testified that they did not authorize, sign, or see the forms. Testimony of other persons to whom the agent sold policies that this also happened to them and that they did not authorize the forms made the agent's statements in this case less credible and was relevant and admissible. Cartwright v. Equitable Life Assurance Soc'y, 276 M 1, 914 P2d 976, 53 St. Rep. 268 (1996).

Admissibility of Victim Testimony as to Sexual Acts Committed by Nondefendants — Not Hearsay: The trial court allowed the victim to testify not only to the sexual acts committed by defendants but also to similar acts committed at about the same time by three other men not on trial. Defendants contended that the court abused its discretion in allowing the testimony because it was hearsay and violated the res gestae doctrine. However, the evidence was admissible because it was closely related to and explanatory of the offense and was therefore part of the transaction, as contemplated under 26-1-103. The testimony was not considered hearsay because the testimony of the other three men was not offered into evidence to prove the sexual acts. St. v. Wing, 264 M 215, 870 P2d 1368, 51 St. Rep. 223 (1994), followed in St. v. Maier, 1999 MT 51, 293 M 403, 977 P2d 298, 56 St. Rep. 208 (1999). See also St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999).

General Standard of Review of Holdings on Admissibility of Evidence: Rulings on the admissibility of evidence are within the sound discretion of the District Court and will not be overturned on appeal absent an abuse of discretion by the trial court. St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992).

Evidence That Dentist "Stopped to Smell the Roses" Admissible: The plaintiff in a personal injury action objected to the admission of an advertisement for the sale of his dental practice published in a medical journal prior to his injury. The Supreme Court held that the fact that the advertisement stated that the plaintiff worked only 4 days a week and took plenty of time off to "smell the roses" was relevant to the question of his lost earning capacity. Linden v. Huestis, 247 M 383, 807 P2d 185, 48 St. Rep. 241 (1991).

Admissibility of Evidence of Similar Injury Occurring Six Years Before: A railroad employee sued the railroad for injuries he received on the job. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's admission of evidence of a similar accident that happened 6 years prior to the plaintiff's injury. The court found that both accidents involved a laborer working under the same foreman, lifting rail ties manually and thereby injuring his back. The evidence was held admissible to show the existence of danger and notice thereof. Kalanick v. Burlington N. RR Co., 242 M 45, 788 P2d 901, 47 St. Rep. 532 (1990).

Admissibility of Testimony of Nontreating Physician: The lower court denied the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude the testimony of a physician who did not treat the plaintiff and who examined the patient only one time, for approximately 15 minutes. The ruling was affirmed on appeal on the grounds that the testimony went to the credibility of the plaintiff and her witnesses and that the testimony was not so unfairly prejudicial that it substantially outweighed its probative value. Feller v. Fox, 237 M 150, 772 P2d 842, 46 St. Rep. 694 (1989).

Evidence of Employee Misconduct Improperly Excluded for Remoteness: The District Court excluded offered evidence of instances of employee misconduct on the grounds that the acts were too remote in time to be relevant. The employer sought to introduce evidence of alleged employee dishonesty and theft that occurred within 3 years of termination. Given the relatively short time between the occurrences and the trial, the eyewitness nature of the evidence, and the importance of the evidence to the employer's defense of termination for dishonesty, it was error to exclude the evidence on the basis of remoteness in time. Barrett v. ASARCO Inc., 234 M 229, 763 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 1865 (1988).

Admission of Magazines in Rape Case — Relevant to Victim's Credibility: Where a child rape victim testified that she had been shown "dirty" magazines prior to the rape and such magazines were found in defendant's apartment, the magazines were relevant because they tended to buttress the victim's credibility. Although she never testified the magazines in evidence were the same ones defendant showed her, defendant's admission that the magazines in evidence were the same present in his room on the date in question provided a sufficient foundation supporting admissibility. St. v. Laird, 225 M 306, 732 P2d 417, 44 St. Rep. 254 (1987).

Motion In Limine — Denial of Offer of Proof on Question Going to Issues of Fact — Reversible Error: Several months after an accident at a bridge, the state improved the bridge and approach, then made a motion in limine, which was granted, that the District Court hold inadmissible any evidence relating to the subsequent improvement project. At trial, a Highway Department (now Department of Transportation) engineer was asked if the state had ever planned to change the bridge and approach prior to the accident. The question was objected to, and plaintiff's counsel made an offer of proof that the engineer would answer affirmatively and thereafter counsel would ask why the improvements had not been made prior to the accident. The court ruled that the question violated the motion in limine and overruled the offer of proof. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the District Court erred in denying the offer of proof and in not permitting the witness to answer because the question went to two other issues of fact important in the case: notice of hazardous condition, if it was hazardous, and time and opportunity to act. Buck v. St., 222 M 423, 723 P2d 210, 43 St. Rep. 1384 (1986).

Evidence Relevant — Inadmissible as Unfair Prejudice: In a tort action, on the issue of the causation of damages, the trial court abused its discretion in allowing testimony concerning the plaintiff's home environment and whether her father's alleged drinking and fighting caused her symptoms rather than an earlier vehicular accident. The questioned testimony had a tendency to make the alleged cause of the symptoms more or less probable than it would have been without the testimony. The testimony therefore was relevant but not admissible as its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Kimes v. Herrin, 217 M 330, 705 P2d 108, 42 St. Rep. 1231 (1985), followed in Newville v. St., 267 M 237, 883 P2d 793, 51 St. Rep. 758 (1994), Werre v. David, 275 M 376, 913 P2d 625, 53 St. Rep. 187 (1996), and Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004). However, see Peterson-Tuell v. First Student Transp., LLC, 2014 MT 307, 377 Mont. 113, 339 P.3d 16, in which the court ruled that testimony referencing sexual abuse suffered by the plaintiff's daughter was both relevant and admissible on the issue of causation of her injuries from a car accident.

Internal Department Memoranda — Relevant to Road Condition: In a wrongful death action plaintiff attempted to introduce into evidence internal Highway Department (now Department of Transportation) memoranda containing evaluations of specific stretches of road within the state, including the location of the accident involved. Plaintiff had a state employee explain the documents and laid a foundation for their admission. The State, a codefendant, contended the documents were irrelevant, confusing, prejudicial, and erroneous. The trial court excluded the evidence. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the exhibits were relevant. They tended to show the general condition of the highway which was a material issue in the plaintiff's case against the State. The contention that the exhibits would confuse or mislead the jury showed a lack of confidence in the intelligence and common sense of the jury. It was error to exclude the exhibits; however, in light of all the evidence admitted concerning the road conditions, the error was harmless. Lindberg v. Leatham Bros., Inc., 215 M 11, 693 P2d 1234, 42 St. Rep. 137 (1985).

Intoxication — Expert Testimony Within Court's Discretion: Plaintiff was injured when she opened an elevator door and fell 15 feet because the car was not on the floor level. After a verdict was returned for plaintiff, defendants appealed, alleging the trial court erred in excluding testimony from a toxicology expert regarding the number of drinks consumed by the plaintiff on the night of the accident. Plaintiff's alcoholic blood content of .16% was admitted without objection. Over objection, the toxicologist testified about the effect upon a person of different ranges of alcohol blood content. The trial court then excluded testimony as to the amount of alcohol necessary to be consumed to reach plaintiff's blood alcohol content. The Supreme Court said the admission of this kind of testimony was discretionary with the trial court. The relevant consideration is whether plaintiff was intoxicated, and if so, how that affected her conduct on the night in question. The trial court received testimony on the relevant matters. The trial court is vested with great latitude in ruling on the admissibility of expert testimony. Exclusion of the offered evidence was not clearly erroneous or sufficiently prejudicial to require a new trial. Cash v. Otis Elevator Co., 210 M 319, 684 P2d 1041, 41 St. Rep. 1077 (1984), followed in Niles v. Big Sky Eyewear, 236 M 455, 771 P2d 114, 46 St. Rep. 504 (1989).

Circumstances of Case and Discretion of Judge: A trial court is not guided by fixed rules in determining whether evidence is too remote in time to be relevant. The nature of the evidence and the circumstances of the case control. For this reason the determination is left in great part to the discretion of the judge and is subject to review only in the event of manifest abuse. Preston v. McDonnell, 203 M 64, 659 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 297 (1983), followed in Safeco Ins. Co. v. Ellinghouse, 223 M 239, 725 P2d 217, 43 St. Rep. 1689 (1986), In re Marriage of Cole, 224 M 207, 729 P2d 1276, 43 St. Rep. 2136 (1986), and in In re Marriage of Starks, 259 M 138, 855 P2d 527, 50 St. Rep. 719 (1993). See also Zugg v. Ramage, 239 M 292, 779 P2d 913, 46 St. Rep. 1693 (1989).

Town Meeting Minutes and Related Documents: The Troy Town Council had passed a resolution requesting a speed limit of 25 miles per hour on trains passing through town, due to the hazardous nature at the crossing where the accident in question occurred. The minutes of the Town Council, letters between the Town Council and the railroad, and intercorporate memoranda between railroad officials on the subject matter of the crossing should have been admitted into evidence. They were relevant to show notice of the claimed hazardous conditions and the intent of the railroad with respect to the same. These documents go to the issue of ordinary care to be exercised by the railroad and may go to the issue of punitive damages as an indication of wantonness or oppressiveness. The intercorporate memoranda are also relevant as possible admissions of a party opponent. Runkle v. Burlington N., 188 M 286, 613 P2d 982, 37 St. Rep. 995 (1980), followed in McEwen v. MCR, LLC, 2012 MT 319, 368 Mont. 38, 291 P.3d 1253, in which the Supreme Court concluded that evidence of the defendant's bid on state trust land, for which it had no use, was properly admitted to prove the plaintiffs' punitive damages claim as it was relevant to whether the defendant was acting maliciously toward the plaintiffs.

Credibility of Witnesses — Threat to Kill as Motive to Testify Falsely: The plaintiff allegedly assaulted and threatened to kill the witness if he did not testify favorably to plaintiff's case at trial. Testimony concerning the assault was admitted over the objection that it was irrelevant. The Supreme Court stated that although the evidence is irrelevant to the issue in dispute at trial it is admissible if it is otherwise relevant to the credibility of the witness. The fear of plaintiff carrying out the threat could provide a motive for the witness to give false testimony, and therefore evidence of the assault was relevant and properly admitted to show a motive to testify falsely. Cissel v. W. Plumbing & Heating, 188 M 149, 612 P2d 206, 37 St. Rep. 966 (1980). See also St. v. Flores, 1998 MT 328, 292 M 255, 974 P2d 124, 55 St. Rep. 1329 (1998).

Relevance of Evidence Showing Control Over Premises in Possessory Crime: Two license plates bearing the defendant's nickname and a letter to the defendant addressed to the premises at which prohibited drugs were discovered were properly admitted as evidence tending to show defendant's dominion and control over the residence. St. v. Meader, 184 M 32, 601 P2d 386, 36 St. Rep. 1747 (1979), followed in St. v. Caekaert, 1999 MT 147, 295 M 42, 983 P2d 332, 56 St. Rep. 583 (1999).

IRRELEVANT EVIDENCE

Evidence That Is Only Marginally Relevant May Be Constitutionally Excluded by Courts. St. v. Ripple, 2023 MT 67, 412 Mont. 36, 527 P.3d 951.

Prior History of Prostitution Excluded — Inadmissible Propensity Evidence — Motion to Exclude Proper: The defendant was charged with promoting prostitution of two young women.

At trial, the state sought and received an order disallowing the defendant from introducing evidence that one of the women had previously engaged in prostitution. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed, claiming that the woman's prior history was relevant and that the District Court abused its discretion by excluding it. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the excluded evidence was not relevant and constituted inadmissible propensity evidence. St. v. Thomas, 2020 MT 281, 402 Mont. 62, 476 P.3d 26.

Evidence of Discovery Dispute Not Relevant, Unfairly Prejudicial, Prohibited by Court Order: The District Court did not err by granting the state's motion in limine to exclude the defendant from arguing that the state had not fulfilled its discovery obligations to him. The District Court also did not err by disallowing the defendant's discussion of the subject of the motion in limine in his closing argument. A court has the inherent power to grant or deny a motion in limine to ensure a fair trial. The defendant sought to admit, and subsequently mentioned in his closing argument, documents from the state crime lab unrelated to his case or to any of the crime lab personnel involved in his case in an effort to prove the prosecutor failed to produce evidence. This evidence did not pertain to the defendant's case and likely did not have a tendency to make the existence of any fact related to his guilt more or less probable. Nonetheless, even if the evidence was relevant to an attack on the prosecution's efforts, the evidence was unfairly prejudicial to the state because it was premised on an assertion that the prosecution had violated its discovery obligations, about which the District Court had already ruled to the contrary. Further, admitting the evidence could well have confused or misled the jury regarding the issues to be determined. St. v. Hudon, 2019 MT 31, 394 Mont. 226, 434 P.3d 273.

TARP Evidence Improperly Admitted — Banking Action: In an action involving several complex business transactions, the District Court allowed the plaintiffs to present evidence regarding Troubled Asset Relief Program (TARP) funds at trial. On appeal, the defendant bank argued that it was under no obligation to extend TARP funds, that a private right of action under TARP does not exist, and that the evidence was unfairly prejudicial. The Supreme Court agreed with the defendant, holding that the TARP evidence was not relevant to the claims asserted and that the evidence unfairly prejudiced the jury. Masters Group Int'l, Inc. v. Comerica Bank, 2015 MT 192, 380 Mont. 1, 352 P.3d 1101.

Connection Between Causal Theory and Facts of Case Required — Expert Testimony on Seizures Properly Excluded: After the defendant drove on the wrong side of the interstate, forcing vehicles off of the road before colliding with a vehicle and killing its occupants, the state charged the defendant with negligent homicide and negligent endangerment on the basis that the defendant was under the influence of alcohol at the time of the incident. At trial, the District Court excluded the defendant from presenting expert testimony about the typical symptoms of partial seizures and the difficulty in diagnosing them, without giving the jury an opinion as to whether the defendant actually suffered from a partial seizure while driving. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the defendant failed to establish a connection between partial seizures and his driving and that testimony about a causal theory that was not factually connected to the case was irrelevant and would confuse the jury. The Supreme Court also concluded that excluding the testimony did not abridge the defendant's constitutional right to present a defense because Rule 702, M.R.Ev., is rationally related to the important goal of admitting only expert testimony that is logically related to the central issues of a case. St. v. Jay, 2013 MT 79, 369 Mont. 332, 298 P.3d 396.

Attempted Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — Evidence of Conversations Leading up to Violation Properly Excluded — Photos of Other Women Sent by Victim to Defendant Irrelevant and Prejudicial: After the defendant was convicted of attempted sexual intercourse without consent, he claimed that his due process rights were violated based on the District Court's exclusion of evidence that included alleged sexual conversations between the defendant and the victim in the days leading up to the violation and photos of semiclothed women that were allegedly sent from the victim's cell phone to the defendant. The Supreme Court determined that the rape shield law exception in 45-5-511 does not extend to alleged conversations leading up to the date of the violation. Moreover, the Supreme Court held that the exclusions were proper on the basis that the alleged conversations and photos were irrelevant or more prejudicial than probative under Rules 401 through 403, M.R.Ev. The District Court struck the appropriate balance between the defendant's right to develop his case and the rules of evidence. St. v. Bishop, 2012 MT 259, 367 Mont. 10, 291 P.3d 538.

Evidence of Victim Being a "Cutter" Inadmissible — Right to Present Defense Not Infringed: Following the defendant's convictions on charges stemming from altercations between the defendant and his girlfriend, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court erred when it prohibited the defendant from testifying that an altercation was caused by the defendant walking in on his girlfriend purposely cutting herself, thereby denying the defendant his constitutional right to present a defense. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the girlfriend's "cutting" constituted character evidence that was inadmissible under the facts of the case. Because the defendant's justifiable-use-of-force defense was that after he entered a room, his girlfriend came at him with the knife, the reason the knife was in his girlfriend's possession was irrelevant. St. v. Hauer, 2012 MT 120, 365 Mont. 184, 279 P.3d 149.

Evidence of Abuse of Children by Wife Inadmissible in Husband's Trial: In a trial against the defendant for assault with a weapon for injuries to one of his sons, evidence of the wife's conduct was irrelevant and not probative of the assault with a weapon charge against the defendant. The evidence of the wife's conduct against one of her sons was prejudicial and not probative of whether the defendant committed assault with a weapon. St. v. Knowles, 2010 MT 186, 357 Mont. 272, 239 P.3d 129.

Evidence That Stabbing Victim Wielded Knife Prior to Stabbing Properly Denied: At his homicide trial, Schmidt sought to introduce evidence from a witness who claimed to have seen the stabbing victim wield a knife earlier in the evening in order to justify Schmidt's use of force, but the testimony was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Schmidt never saw the victim with a knife or claimed that he knew the victim had a knife, so whether the victim brandished a knife earlier in the evening played no role in Schmidt's calculation as to the amount of force to use against the victim, and the testimony was irrelevant to Schmidt's decision to use a knife against the victim. St. v. Schmidt, 2009 MT 450, 354 M 280, 224 P3d 618 (2009).

Consideration of Irrelevant Information at Trial Violative of Fair Trial Guarantee — Failure to Request Exclusion of Irrelevant Information or Object at Trial — Review of Issue for First Time on Appeal Precluding Review: Prior to trial, defendant requested review of a state case file containing information concerning a witness. The trial court reviewed the file in camera, determined that there was nothing relevant to the defense, and denied defendant's request for review. At trial, the court mentioned the file to the witness and questioned the witness regarding the contents of the file. Defendant did not object to the reference at trial, but later appealed on grounds that the court committed reversible error after finding the file irrelevant and refusing defendant access to it when it contained information on the witness that might have led defendant to formulate a different defense. The Supreme Court held that the trial court's actions indeed denied defendant a fair trial. However, because defendant did not specifically request that the file be excluded at trial and failed to object when the trial court referred to the file, defendant was not allowed to raise the issue for the first time on appeal. St. v. Ramsey, 2007 MT 31, 336 M 44, 152 P3d 710 (2007).

Irrelevant Evidence Unrelated to Employee's Ineligibility for Unemployment Benefits Based on Misconduct Properly Denied: Wiman, a dispatcher at the Fallon County jail, allowed an unauthorized person to enter a convicted felon's cell to give the prisoner a haircut. Wiman's deliberate action violated county security policy, and Wiman was suspended without pay for 60 days, during which time Wiman sought unemployment benefits, but the benefits were denied. Wiman contended that the hearings officer improperly denied her the right to introduce evidence that went to the heart of the misconduct issue, such as evidence regarding the inmate's mental state, whether Wiman or another employee had previously provided items to inmates, and whether Wiman's breach of security policy was adequately investigated. However, the question before the hearings officer was the denial of unemployment benefits during the time that Wiman was suspended for allowing an unauthorized person into the cell—conduct which Wiman admitted—so the evidence related to Wiman's misconduct issue was irrelevant and inadmissible. Wiman v. Mont. Dept. of Labor and Industry, 2004 MT 208, 322 M 332, 96 P3d 710 (2004).

Financial Documents, School Transcripts, and Personnel Records Irrelevant to Medical Damages Claim — Discovery Properly Disallowed: Plaintiff's child fell through the second story railing at the Montana State University-Bozeman library and suffered brain injuries. Plaintiff brought damage claims related to the child's injuries and claims related to plaintiff's own medical problems stemming from trauma associated with the fall. The state moved to compel production of plaintiff's financial documents, school transcript, and personnel records. The District Court denied the motion, finding that plaintiff's statement of damages was sufficient and that the requested documents were unlikely to lead to discovery of any relevant information. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Plaintiff did not claim lost earnings or lost earning capacity. Only plaintiff's mental and emotional conditions were at issue, and the documents were irrelevant to those legitimate issues, so absent a showing of prejudice to the state's case, denial of discovery was proper. Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004).

Error in Not Excluding Results of Independent Blood Alcohol Test Taken After DUI Arrestee Released From Custody: When Krause was picked up for DUI, he refused to take a Breathalyzer test and his license was revoked. After booking, Krause was released from custody, went to the hospital, and requested a blood alcohol test. The state subsequently obtained the results of the blood test by investigative subpoena, and the District Court allowed admission of the test results at Krause's trial over his objection. Krause appealed on grounds that the test results should not have been admitted because they were not relevant to any issue in the case. Krause pointed out that the decision as to the validity of an arrest must be based on information that the officer had at the time and cannot be justified bolstered by information obtained after the fact. The state argued that the evidence of the blood test was introduced to substantiate the credibility of the arresting officer's observations and opinion, not to retrospectively validate the officer's belief that Krause had been driving under the influence. The Supreme Court agreed with Krause. The officer's character for truthfulness was not attacked, nor did evidence of Krause's blood test refer to the officer's character for truthfulness. Thus, there was no legitimate purpose for the introduction of the blood test evidence, and the District Court should have excluded it. St. v. Krause, 2002 MT 63, 309 M 174, 44 P3d 493 (2002).

Improper Admission of Rape Examination Evidence as Not Probative of Issue of Consent — Error Harmless in Light of Other Admissible Evidence on Consent: At defendant's trial for sexual assault, the District Court admitted the testimony of a nurse practitioner regarding the mechanics of completing a rape kit. Defendant maintained on appeal that the evidence was not probative of the ultimate issue of consent, and the Supreme Court agreed. The evidence was irrelevant and admitted erroneously. However, the jury was presented with enough cumulative admissible evidence on the issue of consent as to render introduction of the inadmissible rape examination evidence harmless. Qualitatively, and in comparison to the victim's testimony concerning the examination, there was no reasonable possibility that the erroneously admitted evidence contributed to defendant's conviction or resulted in prejudice. St. v. Detonancour, 2001 MT 213, 306 M 389, 34 P3d 487 (2001).

Evidence Improperly Admitted Regarding Incident With "Baby Think It Over" Doll — Parental Rights Terminated Based on Statutory Criteria: The Department received a referral regarding J.M.'s birth, indicating that the parents had intellectual disabilities. The parents were provided with a "Baby Think It Over" doll, which is an infant simulator used in parenting classes that records incidents of neglect and significant abuse if not tended to. The simulator also measures a parent's ability or willingness to respond to an infant's time demands. The simulator recorded an incident of abuse for which the parents had no explanation. As part of a subsequent proceeding to terminate parental rights, the District Court allowed the introduction of evidence regarding the incident. Parental rights were terminated based on the parents' noncompliance with their treatment plan. On appeal, the mother contended that the court erred in allowing evidence regarding the doll because a sufficient foundation was not provided for admission of the evidence. The Supreme Court agreed that the state failed to provide a sufficient foundation for admission of the evidence, such as whether the doll was functioning properly at the time that it was used and whether the results of its use were reliable. The doll's recordation of an incident of abuse did not establish a consequential fact relevant to the state's contention that the parents had not complied with their treatment plan and that the parents' condition was unlikely to change, so the evidence was inadmissible. However, the state did provide sufficient other evidence to support its contention. Thus, although evidence regarding the doll was erroneously allowed, the evidence would not have affected the outcome of the case, so the error was harmless. In re J.M., 2001 MT 51, 304 M 303, 21 P3d 618 (2001).

Evidence of Reliability of Breathalyzer Irrelevant When Test Refused: Because Robertson refused to take a DUI Breathalyzer test, he lacked grounds to later challenge whether the machine in question produced reliable results; nevertheless, his refusal to take the test was admissible under 61-8-404 (now repealed and content reorganized in Title 61, chapter 8, part 10). Missoula v. Robertson, 2000 MT 52, 298 M 419, 998 P2d 144, 57 St. Rep. 250 (2000), following St. v. Jackson, 206 M 338, 672 P2d 255, 40 St. Rep. 1698 (1983).

Drug Evidence Irrelevant and Prejudicial — Introduction Reversible Error: Ingraham was convicted of negligent homicide, criminal endangerment, and criminal trespass to property in relation to an automobile accident. Ingraham filed a motion in limine to exclude evidence of drugs detected in his system and found in his car and to exclude evidence of warnings about drug and alcohol interactions. The motion in limine was denied, and the evidence was introduced. Whether the evidence was relevant and admissible depended on the state's ability to demonstrate a link between the evidence and the accident. The Supreme Court found that because uncontradicted evidence presented to the jury established that none of the drugs had any impairing effect whatsoever on Ingraham's ability to drive at the time of the accident, evidence of their presence was irrelevant and prejudicial and had virtually no probative value. The same reasoning was applied to the warnings. Admission of the evidence constituted reversible prejudicial error. Ingraham's motion in limine properly preserved his objection to the introduction of the evidence for appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998). See also State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 2000 MT 266, 302 M 39, 22 P3d 166, 57 St. Rep. 1111 (2000), in which the use of Ingraham's testimony from the first trial was not precluded, constitutionally or statutorily, from use by the state in its case in chief at the retrial.

Irrelevant Testimony Improperly Admitted but Not Prejudicial — Conviction Affirmed: The trial court improperly admitted witness testimony that was unrelated to the crime and clearly irrelevant. However, after evaluating the testimony under the totality of the circumstances in the context of the trial record, the Supreme Court concluded that admitting the testimony did not constitute undue prejudicial error and affirmed the conviction. St. v. Lancione, 1998 MT 84, 288 M 228, 956 P2d 1358, 55 St. Rep. 344 (1998).

FELA Action Against Amtrak — Negligent Failure to Provide Personnel for Safe Baggage Handling Procedure — Evidence of Baggage Volume at Other Stations Excluded: McGregor, a ticket agent for Amtrak, sued Amtrak for damages under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) for injuries that she sustained while lifting heavy baggage off a train car onto a baggage cart at the Whitefish Amtrak station. McGregor claimed that Amtrak was negligent in failing to provide enough personnel for safe handling of baggage and sought to introduce evidence that the baggage volume at Whitefish was higher than at either Spokane or Seattle. The evidence was excluded by the District Court based upon testimony by an Amtrak employee that baggage volume should not be compared among the three Amtrak stations because of differences in the type of stations and type of baggage handled. McGregor also admitted on cross-examination that there was a sufficient crew at Whitefish to perform the baggage handling function. The Supreme Court upheld the exclusion of evidence, finding that there was no abuse of discretion in the District Court's ruling. McGregor v. Nat'l RR Passenger Corp., 284 M 178, 943 P2d 1269, 54 St. Rep. 834 (1997).

FELA Action Against Amtrak — No Negligence Found — Evidence of Another Lawsuit Held Harmless Error: McGregor, a ticket agent for Amtrak, sued Amtrak under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) for damages that she sustained while lifting heavy baggage off a train car onto a baggage cart at the Whitefish Amtrak station. McGregor claimed that Amtrak was negligent in failing to adopt safe baggage handling procedures and in failing to provide enough personnel for safe handling of baggage. During cross-examination and over the objection of her counsel, McGregor admitted that she had another lawsuit pending against Amtrak. Her counsel moved for a mistrial on the grounds that the information concerning the other lawsuit might adversely affect the jury's computation of McGregor's damages. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's curative instructions for the jury to disregard evidence of another lawsuit were sufficient and that if there was any error, it was harmless error because the jury found that there was no negligence by Amtrak. McGregor v. Nat'l RR Passenger Corp., 284 M 178, 943 P2d 1269, 54 St. Rep. 834 (1997).

Evidence Tending to Support Discharge for Reasons Other Than Stated in Discharge Letter Held Irrelevant: Galbreath injured his knee, neck, and head while working for Golden Sunlight Mines, Inc. (GSM), and took a 3-month medical leave of absence. GSM later accepted liability for Galbreath's injuries. Upon Galbreath's attempt to return to work, GSM terminated his employment, claiming that Galbreath had failed to provide documentation of the reason for his absence. The District Court admitted evidence that Galbreath was terminated for reasons other than stated in the discharge letter. Citing Swanson v. St. John's Lutheran Hosp., 182 M 414, 597 P2d 702 (1979), the Supreme Court held that in a wrongful discharge action, the only reason for discharge that the District Court could consider was the reason stated in the discharge letter. The Supreme Court held that other reasons were irrelevant and that evidence supporting the other reasons should have been excluded. Galbreath v. Golden Sunlight Mines, Inc., 270 M 19, 890 P2d 382, 52 St. Rep. 58 (1995), followed in McGillen v. Plum Creek Timber Co., 1998 MT 193, 290 M 264, 964 P2d 18, 55 St. Rep. 808 (1998), and Bean v. Bd. of Labor Appeals, 1998 MT 222, 290 M 496, 965 P2d 256, 55 St. Rep. 927 (1998). See also Smith v. Charter Communications, Inc., 2023 MT 92, 412 Mont. 292, 529 P.3d 871, holding that the Galbreath rule had not been superseded by 1999 statutory amendments.

Evidence of When Life Begins and Biblical or Moral Justification Inadmissible as Criminal Defense: As a defense, defendants who blocked access to an abortion clinic sought to introduce evidence of when life begins, as well as biblical and moral justification for their actions. Evidence of when life begins was properly excluded by the trial court absent any citation to a defense to which the evidence might be relevant. Further, defendants' individual religious and moral beliefs were neither included in nor relevant to any allowable statutory defense. Personal beliefs do not provide legal justification for or immunize a person from the consequences of acts that violate state criminal laws. Missoula v. Asbury, 265 M 14, 873 P2d 936, 51 St. Rep. 383 (1994), distinguishing Strzelczyk v. Jett, 264 M 153, 870 P2d 730, 51 St. Rep. 206 (1994).

Knowledge of Statutory Inference of Intoxication Irrelevant: Dixon was charged with rape of H.D., which occurred while H.D. was intoxicated. On cross-examination, Dixon's counsel asked H.D. whether she knew that the legal limit of intoxication in Montana is .10, to which question the prosecution objected on grounds of relevancy. The District Court sustained the objection, holding that the evidence of intoxication was relevant, but H.D.'s knowledge of the legal limit was irrelevant. The Supreme Court held that H.D.'s knowledge of her condition was relevant as impeachment evidence, but since there was no evidence that H.D. was in control of a motor vehicle, her knowledge of the .10 legal limit was irrelevant. St. v. Dixon, 264 M 38, 869 P2d 779, 51 St. Rep. 135 (1994).

Denial of Defendant's Access to Rape Victim's Counselor and Counselor's Records Upheld: Muir was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with a victim under 16 years of age. Prior to and during trial, Muir requested access to the victim's psychological counselor and to the counselor's records because the counselor was listed as a potential witness. However, after an in camera review of the records by the District Court, Muir was given access only to an investigator's note of an interview with the victim's counselor. The Supreme Court held that Muir was properly denied access to the counselor and the counselor's records because the victim's conversations with the counselor are privileged and the District Court found no exculpatory evidence in the records. Citing St. v. Reynolds, 243 M 1, 792 P2d 1111 (1990), the Supreme Court also reasoned that a defendant's right to pretrial discovery is not equivalent to a defendant's constitutional right of confrontation and that Muir had shown no correlation between the victim's emotional problems and her consent to sexual intercourse. St. v. Muir, 263 M 211, 867 P2d 1094, 51 St. Rep. 19 (1994).

Photographs of Site of Alleged Sexual Assault Properly Excluded: Little was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault on his two minor stepdaughters. During trial, he attempted to introduce photographs of a cherry orchard to show that a sexual assault upon his older stepdaughter could not have occurred at the place and in the manner alleged by the older stepdaughter. The District Court excluded two of the photos because they were closeup pictures of cherry trees and did not, as Little's counsel acknowledged, disprove the possibility of the acts occurring elsewhere in the orchard. The Supreme Court held that because the District Court has wide latitude over the admission of evidence, the Supreme Court could not conclude that the evidentiary ruling of the District Court constituted an abuse of discretion. St. v. Little, 260 M 460, 861 P2d 154, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993).

Common Law Defense — Choice of Evils Not Included in Compulsion: The trial court granted the prosecution's motion to exclude Lewis's and Brisendine's argument that they were not guilty of trespass under the compulsion statute. The Supreme Court ruled that the compulsion statute does include the common law defense of "choice of evils" and that the common law elements of the defense are not recognized in Montana. Helena v. Lewis, 260 M 421, 860 P2d 698, 50 St. Rep. 1103 (1993).

Defense of Compulsion Properly Excluded in Abortion Clinic Trespass Case: The trial court granted the prosecution's motion to exclude Lewis's and Brisendine's argument that they were not guilty of trespass under the compulsion statute. The Supreme Court ruled that the compulsion statute does include imminent threats of harm to third persons. The defendants' argument concerning compulsion was properly excluded as inapplicable as a matter of law. Helena v. Lewis, 260 M 421, 860 P2d 698, 50 St. Rep. 1103 (1993).

In Camera Inspection of Private Employment Records — Court Discretion in Suppressing Discovery Proper: The state attempted to compel discovery of defendant's personnel files from the Helena Catholic Diocese. The State sought information regarding reports of similar misconduct, disciplinary actions, transfer records, and witness names to use in rebutting and cross-examining defendant's character witnesses. After initial refusal to surrender the records, the parties agreed to an in camera review of the records by the presiding judge. The judge ruled that the information was not discoverable because it contained personal and private information. The in camera review and the subsequent prohibition on discovery of material that was not probative were held to be within the discretionary power of the judge in controlling discovery. Absent an abuse of that discretion, denial of access to the records was affirmed. St. v. Burns, 253 M 37, 830 P2d 1318, 49 St. Rep. 353 (1992).

Evidence Irrelevant and Inadmissible Regarding Drug-Related Activities Beyond Scope of Offense: Facts relevant to the charge of criminal sale (now criminal distribution) of dangerous drugs were whether defendant was in a certain place at a certain time and whether he sold drugs at that time and place. Evidence of matters not pertaining to those facts was irrelevant and inadmissible. The District Court erred in admitting testimony regarding defendant's associates and their drug-related activities, the presence of juveniles at an unrelated drug sale, and places at which defendant may have spent time on occasion, such as bars known to be drug hangouts. A defendant on trial for one offense should be convicted, if at all, by evidence that shows he is guilty of that offense alone. St. v. Webb, 252 M 248, 828 P2d 1351, 49 St. Rep. 236 (1992).

Homicide Victim's Medical Records Irrelevant: Homicide victim's medical records were not relevant to prove her violent and unstable personality because the medical treatment was remote in time and not relevant to the alleged defense. St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989).

Evidence of Secondary Gain Irrelevant — New Trial Warranted: A physician's testimony on motives of secondary gain, which he defined as that financial, emotional, or other type of benefit received by virtue of an injury that serves to encourage continuation of the injury, was so irrelevant and prejudicial to plaintiff's injury case as to amount to abuse of discretion, warranting a new trial. Dahlin v. Holmquist, 235 M 17, 766 P2d 239, 45 St. Rep. 2127 (1988).

Nature of Crime Scene Irrelevant to Homicide Charge: Defendant contended District Court error in disallowing evidence regarding the nature of the apartment complex where the crime occurred, asserting that the dangerous surroundings magnified his fear. It was within the court's discretion to hold the evidence irrelevant as to whether deliberate homicide was committed and as to defendant's claim of self-defense. St. v. Crazy Boy, 232 M 398, 757 P2d 341, 45 St. Rep. 1145 (1988), followed in St. v. Walters, 247 M 84, 806 P2d 497, 48 St. Rep. 102 (1991).

Evidence Unrelated to Claim as Prejudicial — Mistrial Motion Improperly Denied: Plaintiff's testimony in a trial to recover damages for a partial crop loss included emotional testimony about the loss of his wife, who died during preparation of the case for trial. There was no claim that her death was caused in any way by defendants. It was improper for the trial court to deny a defense motion for a mistrial based on relevance and prejudice. Gurnsey v. Conklin Co., Inc., 230 M 42, 751 P2d 151, 45 St. Rep. 1 (1988).

Letters Introduced in Trial on First Claim but Relating to Second — Admission Improper: The trial court severed, for separate trial, a bad faith claim from a fraud or negligence claim. Letters written subsequent to the incident that was the basis for the fraud claim were admitted in the first trial. The Supreme Court found the letters did not directly relate to a fraud theory or support a claim for emotional distress. On retrial, the letters were not to be admitted. Gurnsey v. Conklin Co., Inc., 230 M 42, 751 P2d 151, 45 St. Rep. 1 (1988).

Denial of Evidence Relating to Prior Fires — No Error: The Supreme Court found no error in the denial by the District Court Judge of evidence or testimony relating to prior fires from which the insured may have received insurance proceeds. The court held that the proffered evidence did not naturally and logically tend to establish a fact in issue and did not meet the test of relevancy, in that it did not make probable that the insured had committed arson either from the viewpoint of motive, intent, or the deed itself. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986), followed, as to the application of Rule 404, M.R.Ev., in St. v. Enright, 1998 MT 322, 292 M 204, 974 P2d 1118, 55 St. Rep. 1308 (1998). See also Phil-Co Feeds, Inc. v. First Nat'l Bank in Havre, 238 M 414, 777 P2d 1306, 46 St. Rep. 1380 (1989).

Prior Civil Action Against Victim — Exclusion: In the trial of a defendant for felony assault (now assault with a weapon) against a woman and her 14-month-old daughter, the trial court excluded testimony regarding a previous civil child protective action against the mother on grounds that the subject matter of the previous action was not relevant and its introduction would only serve to confuse the issues. The Supreme Court held that the District Court Judge did not abuse his discretion in determining that the offered evidence was irrelevant and that there was sufficient evidence to support the jury verdict despite the victim's denial of her previous statements about the assault. St. v. Oman, 218 M 260, 707 P2d 1117, 42 St. Rep. 1565 (1985).

Evidence of Concurrent and Subsequent Negligence Irrelevant: In a medical malpractice action, evidence of the surgical nurses' concurrent negligence and the radiologist's subsequent negligence was irrelevant on the issue of the surgeon's negligence. The fact that the active and simultaneous negligent act of the nurses was also a substantial factor in bringing about harm to the patient does not protect the surgeon from liability. As to negligence of the radiologist, the law requires that at times an initial tortfeasor, such as the surgeon, must answer for the subsequent negligence of a subsequent tortfeasor. Rudeck v. Wright, 218 M 41, 709 P2d 621, 42 St. Rep. 1380 (1985).

Prior Guilty Plea — Irrelevant to Misconduct or Punitive Damages: Defendant and plaintiff, who was 16, were drinking and driving at a high rate of speed in Anaconda. Defendant was driving plaintiff's car when he lost control and hit a house. Plaintiff was severely injured. At a trial for damages based on negligence, plaintiff's counsel sought to introduce evidence of defendant's having pleaded guilty to two prior incidents of supplying intoxicating beverages to minors. Defendant's attorney moved for a motion in limine, which was denied. The jury awarded compensatory and punitive damages. On appeal the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the evidence of appellant's prior guilty pleas did not have the tendency to make the existence of his alleged willful and wanton misconduct on the night in question more or less probable. The evidence was irrelevant to establishing misconduct on the night in question or for establishing a basis for punitive damages. The fact that defendant had purchased alcohol for minors did not go toward establishing his operation of the vehicle in a reckless fashion, the act complained of. Therefore the evidence was also irrelevant toward showing a basis for punitive damages. Derenberger v. Lutey, 207 M 1, 674 P2d 485, 40 St. Rep. 902 (1983), followed in Maurer v. Clausen Distrib. Co., 275 M 229, 912 P2d 195, 53 St. Rep. 78 (1996).

Causal Relationship for Relevance — Watergate and Split Tire Rim: In a tort action relating to the explosive failure of a Goodyear K-type split tire rim, it was error to admit material relating to Watergate in an attempt to receive exemplary damages. The Supreme Court held that the Watergate material was irrelevant under this rule because the record showed only a speculative connection between the incident complained of and allegations by the plaintiff that political activities by defendant Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company during Watergate included an illegal political contribution by Goodyear in an attempt to avoid the recall of the K-type rims by the Nixon administration. Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 207 M 37, 673 P2d 1208, 40 St. Rep. 1861 (1983).

Prejudice Stemming From Evidence Held Inadmissible as Irrelevant: In a tort action relating to the explosive failure of a Goodyear K-type split tire rim where the Supreme Court held inadmissible as irrelevant testimony regarding political bribery during Watergate by the defendant Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, the failure of the trial court to exclude such evidence was prejudicial to the defendant and permitted the jury to indulge in improper speculation and guesswork. Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 207 M 37, 673 P2d 1208, 40 St. Rep. 1861 (1983).

Failure to Admit Warranty Into Evidence — No Relevancy to Credibility of Contrary Testimony: Where the plaintiff brought an action for breach of warranty against the defendant and the defendant sought to introduce the text of a warranty whose provisions were contrary to the testimony of one of the plaintiff's employees, the District Court did not err in refusing to admit the warranty into evidence. The warranty was in keeping with evidence obtained during discovery, but that evidence was not used to impeach. While the discovery evidence might have had impeachment value, the text of the warranty alone would have been insufficient for impeachment, was therefore irrelevant, and was properly excluded. Iowa Mfg. Co. v. Joy Mfg. Co., 206 M 26, 669 P2d 1057, 40 St. Rep. 1479 (1983).

Motion In Limine — Irrelevant Evidence on Statute of Limitations and Release Properly Excluded: Where the plaintiff brought a third-party action against the defendant for breach of a warranty of performance of certain air pollution control equipment, the District Court properly granted the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude evidence of the plaintiff's release from liability signed by the plaintiff in the original action and evidence that the date of delivery of the equipment was the starting time of the running of the Statute of Limitations. While the defendant argues that this evidence shows a lack of any real liability to the plaintiff in the original action and therefore a lack of liability of the defendant, the evidence shows that the release had nothing to do with the issue of the warranty and that the evidence concerning the date of delivery was excluded as irrelevant because the trial court properly found that a cause of action for breach of warranty of performance began when the breach was discovered and not when the equipment was delivered. Iowa Mfg. Co. v. Joy Mfg. Co., 206 M 26, 669 P2d 1057, 40 St. Rep. 1479 (1983).

Health Permit Requirements — Relevance of Prior Licensing: An action was brought by purchasers to rescind contract for bakery. After Department of Health notified purchasers of deficiencies needing correction, they closed the bakery and gave the keys to seller. The seller had stated in the contract that to his knowledge he had complied with government regulations. Seller fixed the deficiencies, received a health license, and opened the bakery, which he had operated for almost 17 years prior to the sale to purchasers. It was not error for the judge to refuse admission of conditional health licenses granted seller in 1968 and 1969 on the ground that they were so remote in time as to have little if any probative value and were therefore not relevant to issue whether seller knew at time of sale that the bakery would not meet health standards. Preston v. McDonnell, 203 M 64, 659 P2d 276, 40 St. Rep. 297 (1983), followed in Waller v. Hayden, 268 M 204, 885 P2d 1305, 51 St. Rep. 1291 (1994).

Relevance of Testimony on Defendant's Past Sexual Relationships: In a prosecution for sexual intercourse without consent, it was improper to ask a witness who had had sexual relations with the defendant whether other women became upset with defendant because he failed to carry on relationships with them. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Admission of Evidence of Surviving Spouse's Remarriage as Prejudicial Error in Wrongful Death Action: In an action for the wrongful death of the plaintiff's wife, the court granted the plaintiff's motion to prohibit the defendant's counsel from informing the jury of the plaintiff's subsequent remarriage. Under these circumstances it was prejudicial and reversible error for the court to allow the defendant's lawyer to ask the jury panel on voir dire if any of the panel knew the plaintiff's present wife. Evidence of a surviving spouse's remarriage is irrelevant, and the introduction of the evidence cannot be cured by an admonition by the court. Workman v. McIntyre Constr. Co., 190 M 5, 617 P2d 1281, 37 St. Rep. 1637 (1980).

Wrongful Death Action — Exclusion of Construction Contract Terms Upheld: In a wrongful death action in which the decedent's surviving spouse brought suit against the State and its contractor for negligently failing to warn the decedent of an abrupt edge at the shoulder of a highway construction project, the court properly excluded certain provisions in the contract between the state and the contractor regarding certain traffic control devices mentioned in a payment schedule. Because the question in the case was whether certain devices should have been used, the contract provisions allowing their use were of no probative value and were irrelevant. Workman v. McIntyre Constr. Co., 190 M 5, 617 P2d 1281, 37 St. Rep. 1637 (1980).

Right to Compulsory Process — Irrelevant Testimony: Defendant was not denied his right to compulsory process because of the exclusion of certain testimony when the testimony excluded was not relevant. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974, 36 St. Rep. 1037 (1979).

OTHER CRIMES OR ACTS

Other Acts Under Modified Just Rule Limited to Acts of Defendant: In a trial in which the defendant was charged with felony assault with a weapon, the District Court erred in admitting evidence that the defendant's wife had abused one of the couple's sons as evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts pursuant to the modified Just rule. All four criteria of the modified Just rule must be satisfied in order to admit evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts, and unless the defendant is attempting to inculcate another person for the crime, the acts must be the acts of the defendant and not the acts of a third party. The assault with a weapon conviction was reversed and remanded. St. v. Knowles, 2010 MT 186, 357 Mont. 272, 239 P.3d 129.

No Error in Admitting Evidence of Past Deviant Sexual Acts as Grooming for Future Sexual Abuse: At Marshall's trial for attempted sexual abuse of children, the trial court admitted evidence of Marshall's prior deviant sexual acts and comments over Marshall's objection that the prior acts were too spread out to constitute the same transaction and because the requirements of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., were not met. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was admissible as grooming, defined as the process of cultivating trust with a victim and gradually introducing sexual behaviors until reaching the point at which it is possible to perpetrate a sex crime against the victim. Thus, even though Marshall's prior acts may have been remote in time, grooming by definition must occur over a period of time, so the acts were inextricably linked to the charged offense. St. v. Marshall, 2007 MT 198, 338 M 395, 165 P3d 1129 (2007), followed in St. v. Bieber, 2007 MT 262, 339 M 309, 170 P3d 444 (2007), to the extent that evidence of defendant's legal acts was inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense and therefore admissible, notwithstanding the rules related to admissibility of evidence of other acts, and in St. v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 M 344, 220 P3d 640 (2009). See also St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Objectionable Testimony Elicited by Defendant's Own Actions — Right to Allege Error on Appeal Waived: Smith was charged with stealing his mother's credit card and using the card to withdraw money from her bank account and charge items for his personal use. Pretrial, Smith moved in limine to preclude witnesses at trial from testifying regarding Smith's prior criminal convictions, and the motion was granted. When his mother testified, Smith's counsel asked what efforts she made to locate Smith after discovering that her credit card was gone, and the mother responded that she had checked with Smith's parole officer to see if the officer knew where Smith was. Smith immediately moved for a mistrial, asserting that the comment violated the motion in limine, but the motion was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Because the objectionable testimony was elicited by Smith's own actions, he waived the right to allege error on appeal because he actively participated in creating the error. St. v. Smith, 2005 MT 18, 325 M 374, 106 P3d 553 (2005), following St. v. Gafford, 172 M 380, 563 P2d 1129 (1977).

Failure by State to Articulate Permissible Purpose for Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes — Lack of Proof of Defendant's Knowledge of Fact of Consequence: During pretrial proceedings for Dobson's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the state indicated its intent to introduce evidence that Dobson had been previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. The purported purpose was for proof of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident, establishing that Dobson knew that someone under 16 years of age could not legally consent to sexual intercourse. Instead of objecting, defense counsel offered to stipulate that Dobson did have knowledge of that fact. The state objected that Dobson should not be able to stipulate away its case, and urged that the jury instructions contain details of the prior charge. The trial court declined the specific instructions offered by both Dobson and the state and fashioned and gave its own instruction, advising the jury that Dobson was previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor and thus had knowledge of the law, but instructing that the evidence was not to be construed by the jury as evidence of Dobson's character, but only as evidence of Dobson's prior knowledge that such conduct was criminal. On appeal, Dobson contended that the instruction was erroneous. The Supreme Court agreed that the trial court abused its discretion in giving the instruction because it did not meet the third criteria of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)). Although it appeared at first blush that the state asserted permissible purposes of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident for the admission of other crimes evidence, merely reciting an allowable purpose is not sufficient if the evidence does not further that purpose or if that purpose is not an issue in dispute (see St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1 (1995)). Rather, as set out in U.S. v. Mehrmanesh, 689 F2d 822 (9th Cir. 1982), the state must articulate precisely the evidential hypothesis by which a fact of consequence may be inferred from the other acts evidence, which in this case, the state did not do. Dobson's knowledge of the law that it is a felony offense to have sexual intercourse with someone under 16 years of age was not a fact of consequence to the action. Thus, admission of the evidence via the jury instruction was reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001). See also St. v. Anderson, 275 M 344, 912 P2d 801 (1996).

Introduction of Evidence of Acts Not Referred to in Pretrial Order — Not Grounds for New Trial: As a result of a dispute, the relationship between neighbors Lopez, Monroe, and Josephson deteriorated until assault charges were filed against Josephson. The operative contentions in the pretrial order were that Josephson assaulted Lopez by pointing a firearm at Lopez's face and assaulted Monroe verbally and fired a weapon toward Monroe's property. The District Court found it impossible to determine from the allegations the dates, times, and places that the alleged assaults took place, but the court concluded that the pretrial order nevertheless placed Josephson on notice that he was being accused of assault on multiple occasions over an unspecified period of time. Josephson moved for a new trial on grounds that plaintiffs were improperly allowed to introduce evidence of acts not referred to in the pretrial order, evidence of bad character, and evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts. However, because Josephson waited until the day of trial to clarify which assaults formed the basis of the case against him, rather than using available pretrial motions and rules of discovery, the District Court was not found to have abused its discretion in giving plaintiffs latitude in their proof of the various assaults at trial, including allowing evidence of bad character to impeach Josephson's testimony. The District Court did properly preclude evidence of assaults by Josephson on nonparty persons. Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001).

Evidence of Assault Victim's Prior Conviction Properly Excluded: Medrano pulled Jenness from a vehicle and kicked and beat him, rupturing Jenness's spleen. Medrano claimed self-defense based on an unsubstantiated belief that Jenness had a weapon and sought to introduce evidence that Jenness had been previously convicted of misdemeanor assault after attacking a couple in another vehicle. The claim of self-defense was not based on any awareness by Medrano of Jenness's violent nature or on Medrano's knowledge of the prior conviction at the time of the confrontation with Jenness. The District Court properly excluded evidence of the prior incident as irrelevant to the claim of self-defense. St. v. Medrano, 285 M 69, 945 P2d 937, 54 St. Rep. 1048 (1997).

Rule 403. Exclusion of relevant evidence on grounds of prejudice, confusion, or waste of time.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 403. The Commission intends, by adoption of this rule, to make no change in Montana law in this area. Terms used by this rule which may be new to Montana law are to be construed as synonymous with current practice; for example, “unfair prejudice” is synonymous with the usual use of the term prejudice.

A key element of this rule is the discretion of the judge in deciding whether otherwise relevant evidence is to be excluded because of the factors listed in the rule. Montana law is consistent with this approach: Section 93-401-25, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], allows “discretion of the court to permit inquiry into collateral facts...”; Section 93-1201-1, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], allows the admission of demonstrative or real evidence to be “regulated by the sound discretion of the court”. Section 93-1901-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], contains a statement which is similar to the policy of the proposed rule: “The court, however, may stop the production of further evidence upon a particular point when the evidence upon it is already so full as to preclude reasonable doubt”. Case law is also consistent with this rule. In State v. Rollins, 149 Mont. 481, 484, 428 P2d 962 (1967) the court allowed a photograph to be admitted and held that when admissibility of such evidence is being considered the court should “weigh its probative value against its prejudicial effect.... The trial judge should have latitude of discretion in passing upon the admissibility of such evidence”. Other cases have dealt with similar questions that arise under the rule and have been treated similarly: State v. Bischert, 131 Mont. 152, 159, 308 P2d 969 (1957) on gruesome photographs; State v. Satterfield, 114 Mont. 122, 127, 132 P2d 372 (1943) on remote evidence; and Wallin v. Kinyon Estate, 164 Mont. 160, 164, 519 P2d 1236 (1974) on exclusion of prejudicial evidence through the use of a motion in limine.

PROBATIVE VALUE VERSUS PREJUDICIAL EFFECT

Defendant's Prior Attempt to Marry 13-Year-Old Daughter to Man in Exchange for House and Cell Phone Relevant to Charged Crime of Sexual Abuse of 4-Year-Old Daughter by Same Man — Demonstrative of Motive of Financial Desperation — Admission of Evidence of Marriage Attempt Not Abuse of Discretion. St. v. Mountain Chief, 2023 MT 147, 413 Mont. 131, 533 P.3d 663.

Reference to Defendant's Prior Sexual Offenses Inextricably Intertwined With Improper Threats in Official and Political Matters — Evidence Probative of Defendant's Mental State in Threatening Police Officer — Prior Offenses Properly Admitted Under Transaction Rule. St. v. Hardin, 2023 MT 132, 413 Mont. 26, 532 P.3d 466.

Defendant Assault of Victim 5 Years Earlier — Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence of Assault Denied: The defendant was charged with incest for raping his minor half-sister. At trial, the defendant filed a motion in limine to exclude evidence about him sexually assaulting her 5 years earlier. The District Court denied the motion to exclude the evidence, and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the defendant argued that unfair prejudice toward him substantially outweighed the evidentiary value of the earlier assault. The Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the motion, holding that the probative value of the defendant's earlier assault while a juvenile substantially outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. St. v. Murphy, 2021 MT 268, 406 Mont. 42, 497 P.3d 263.

Evidence of Other Slip and Falls Not Admissible — Not Substantially Similar: The District Court did not err when it did not allow plaintiffs to introduce evidence of other falls on the defendant's clinic campus. A District Court has broad discretion to determine whether evidence is relevant and admissible. Evidence of other falls is not admissible to prove negligence. The evidence is admissible to show the existence of danger, defect, or knowledge. A prior accident must be “substantially similar to” and “not too remote from the accident in question” to qualify for admission. As applied, the District Court properly concluded that evidence of other falls was not similar to the plaintiffs’ as the other falls occurred in parking lots rather than on sidewalks or at sister facilities not on the defendant's main hospital campus. Nolan v. Billings Clinic, 2020 MT 167, 400 Mont. 326, 467 P.3d 545.

Improper Use of Prior Convictions as Credibility Attack: At a traffic stop that led to drug charges, the driver admitted to police that she had one DUI conviction when in fact she had several. The state entered evidence about the multiple DUIs during its case-in-chief to attack her credibility, but the defendant had not asserted personal credibility during opening arguments. On appeal, the Supreme Court reviewed the evidentiary ruling allowing the DUI testimony for abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a new trial, finding that the probative value of the evidence was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice and that the District Court abused its discretion in allowing this testimony during the state's case-in-chief. St. v. Clausen, 2020 MT 100, 400 Mont. 9, 462 P.3d 664.

Testimony of Examining Physician Excluded — Potential for Unfair Prejudice: The defendant alleged that he was injured by police officers as he was being arrested. At trial, he sought to offer testimony from the physician who had examined him the day after the incident. The Municipal Court granted the city's motion to exclude the physician from testifying. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed to the District Court, which affirmed. On further appeal, the Supreme Court also affirmed the exclusion, finding that the primary purpose of seeking testimony by the examining physician was to create sympathy for the defendant. Bozeman v. McCarthy, 2019 MT 209, 397 Mont. 134, 447 P.3d 1048.

Probative Value in Partner or Family Member Assault Case: A defendant convicted of assaulting his girlfriend challenged on appeal the admission of evidence regarding his verbal abuse and financial manipulation, and challenged the admission of testimony and text messages in which racial slurs had been used. The Supreme Court affirmed admission of the evidence regarding verbal abuse and financial manipulation, finding that its probative value in establishing the motives of the defendant and in explaining the actions of the victim outweighed the risk of unfair prejudice. Likewise, the Supreme Court affirmed the admission of the testimony and text messages with racial slurs, finding that they had probative value for establishing rising tension between the defendant and the victim and for containing an admission of guilt based on the facts and that they did not result in an unfair trial. St. v. Haithcox, 2019 MT 201, 397 Mont. 103, 447 P.3d 452.

Evidence of Discovery Dispute Not Relevant, Unfairly Prejudicial, Prohibited by Court Order: The District Court did not err by granting the state's motion in limine to exclude the defendant from arguing that the state had not fulfilled its discovery obligations to him. The District Court also did not err by disallowing the defendant's discussion of the subject of the motion in limine in his closing argument. A court has the inherent power to grant or deny a motion in limine to ensure a fair trial. The defendant sought to admit, and subsequently mentioned in his closing argument, documents from the state crime lab unrelated to his case or to any of the crime lab personnel involved in his case in an effort to prove the prosecutor failed to produce evidence. This evidence did not pertain to the defendant's case and likely did not have a tendency to make the existence of any fact related to his guilt more or less probable. Nonetheless, even if the evidence was relevant to an attack on the prosecution's efforts, the evidence was unfairly prejudicial to the state because it was premised on an assertion that the prosecution had violated its discovery obligations, about which the District Court had already ruled to the contrary. Further, admitting the evidence could well have confused or misled the jury regarding the issues to be determined. St. v. Hudon, 2019 MT 31, 394 Mont. 226, 434 P.3d 273.

Exclusion of Evidence — Similar Claims — Habit Evidence Too Remote — No Abuse of Discretion: The District Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding several pieces of evidence in an asbestos personal injury trial. Specifically, the District Court excluded a form containing a general reference to the personal injury claims of other employees even after the defendant railroad argued that the plaintiff had not been exposed to asbestos because the plaintiff did not establish that the other claims were substantially similar to and not too remote from the plaintiff's claim. Likewise, although letters that referenced nonasbestos violations of the federal Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 (OSHA) and the defendant railroad's refusal to permit access to OSHA inspectors without a warrant could be admissible under Rule 406, M.R.Ev., as habit evidence, the referenced infractions were too remote from both the plaintiff's asbestos-related claim and the plant at which the plaintiff worked. Daley v. Burlington N. Santa Fe Ry. Co., 2018 MT 197, 392 Mont. 311, 425 P.3d 669.

Passing Reference to Excluded Evidence — Prejudice Minimal — No Abuse of Discretion: After admitting portions of two depositions by coworkers of a plaintiff in an asbestos personal injury trial, the District Court excluded references to the coworkers' deaths because there was no evidence in their depositions that they had suffered from asbestos-related diseases. The District Court also excluded reference to the lawsuits they had filed, reasoning that they were irrelevant.

The plaintiff argued that the evidence was improperly excluded because the defense referenced the coworkers' claims in an opening statement. The District Court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the defendant's reference had not opened the door to a discussion of the coworkers' illnesses and claims because the reference was made in passing, any prejudice was minimal, and admitted portions of the depositions detailed relevant information, specifically the coworkers' exposure to asbestos at the same plant as the plaintiff. Daley v. Burlington N. Santa Fe Ry. Co., 2018 MT 197, 392 Mont. 311, 425 P.3d 669.

Transaction Rule — Evidence of Defendant's Gang Affiliations Properly Admitted — Evidence of Outstanding Warrant Not Grounds for Mistrial: The defendant was convicted of aggravated burglary and four counts of assault with a weapon. The crimes related to the defendant's attempts to recruit a former gang member to commit gang-related crimes. The defendant appealed the conviction, arguing that the District Court should not have admitted evidence relating to his gang affiliation because the prejudicial effect outweighed its probative value. The defendant also argued that the District Court should have granted his motion for a mistrial, following disclosure by a law enforcement witness that the defendant had an active warrant. The Supreme Court upheld the conviction, holding that evidence of the defendant's gang affiliation was central to the jury's understanding of what transpired, was allowed under the transaction rule, and was inextricably linked to and explanatory of the state's charges against him and the danger of unfair prejudice was not outweighed by its probative value. The court further held that the mention of the defendant's outstanding warrant was properly cured by an instruction from the District Court and there was no reasonable possibility that inadmissible evidence contributed to the defendant's conviction. St. v. Michelotti, 2018 MT 158, 392 Mont. 33, 420 P.3d 1020.

Admission of Subsequent Drug Charges in Another State Highly Prejudicial — Failure to Exclude Charges Reversible Error — New Trial Required: The defendant was arrested in Montana and charged with four drug-related charges. Prior to his trial in Montana, the defendant was charged in Utah for other drug charges. At trial, the defendant objected to the admittance of the Utah drug charges, which were admitted to prove an element of an offense: that the money the defendant had in his vehicle at the time of his arrest in Montana was to be used in the distribution of drugs. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed with the defendant that the Utah drug charges' prejudicial nature substantially outweighed the probative value of the evidence. Because the state could not point to any admissible evidence that would prove the same facts as the tainted evidence, the Supreme Court held there was a reasonable probability that the admission of the Utah drug charges contributed to the defendant's conviction, and the state failed to demonstrate that the error was harmless. The Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion in admitting the Utah drug charges and reversed and remanded the case for a new trial. St. v. Buckles, 2018 MT 150, 391 Mont. 511, 420 P.3d 511.

Brief Reference to Defendant's Past Conduct — Denial of Motion for Mistrial — No Error: At trial, a deputy made a single reference to knowledge of the alleged victim that the defendant had been violent in the past. The District Court gave a cautionary instruction explaining that the reference was not an attempt to prove conformity to character but to demonstrate that the victim's state of mind caused her to act as she did, including a 9-month delay in reporting the assault. Because the defendant's arguments did not establish that he was denied a fair and impartial trial, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for a mistrial. St. v. Ankeny, 2018 MT 91, 391 Mont. 176, 417 P.3d 275.

Defendant's Letters to Victim Mentioning Prior Bad Acts — Probative Value Not Substantially Outweighed by Prejudice: Several letters were admitted at trial from the defendant to the alleged victim that contained the defendant's apologies, near admissions to the charges, requests that the victim drop the charges, and indications of the defendant's abusive, controlling relationship with the victim. Although the defendant mentioned prior bad acts, the references were minimal, vaguely stated, and closely woven with his promises to change his behavior. The District Court issued a cautionary instruction concerning the prior acts. The probative value of the letters was substantial, demonstrating his consciousness of guilt and tending to corroborate the victim's version of the incidents, demonstrating a typical domestic violence cycle of abuse, and helping explain why the victim delayed reporting the criminal incidents for 9 months. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the letters or by concluding that the letters' probative value was not substantially outweighed by prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Ankeny, 2018 MT 91, 391 Mont. 176, 417 P.3d 275.

Admission of Evidence of Prior Conviction Upheld: The defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide resulting from the death of his 53-day-old daughter. At trial, the District Court admitted evidence about his prior partner family member assault conviction under Rule 404, M.R.Ev. The defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court abused its discretion in admitting the prior conviction and that the written judgment was nonconforming because it omitted credit for days of time served. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's admission of the conviction, holding that the state properly offered the evidence to show motive, identity and pattern, and absence of mistake or accident, and the District Court properly applied the Rule 403, M.R.Ev., balancing test by providing a cautionary jury instruction. St. v. Blaz, 2017 MT 164, 388 Mont. 105, 398 P.3d 247.

Evidence Showing Motive, Purpose, Mental State, Particular Patterns — No Abuse of Discretion: By admitting evidence of the defendant's lengthy and detailed process to systematically obtain control over victims, groom them for abuse, abuse them, and coerce secrecy about the abuse, the District Court did not abuse its discretion because the defendant's longstanding sexual fixation with underage teen girls showed motive, the defendant's actions intended to set up or abuse the victims showed both purpose and mental state, and the evidence showed that the defendant employed particular patterns to enable sexual assault. In admitting the evidence, the District Court properly fulfilled its gatekeeping function. St. v. Daffin, 2017 MT 76, 387 Mont. 154, 392 P.3d 150.

Evidence of Prior Homosexual Overture by Defendant Allowed to Prove Intent: The defendant was accused of sodomizing and killing a man in a hot tub. At trial, the state sought to introduce evidence that prior to the murder, the defendant had invited another man into the same hot tub who left when the defendant started to touch him suggestively. The defendant argued that the evidence about the prior homosexual overture was prejudicial and outweighed any probative evidence. The District Court disagreed and allowed the evidence at trial. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the circumstances of both events were sufficiently similar and near in time to logically show a common motive and intent. St. v. Madplume, 2017 MT 40, 386 Mont. 368, 390 P.3d 142.

Medical Malpractice — Evidence of Prohibited Sale and Marketing of Medication Inadmissible — Relevance Outweighed by Prejudice: The plaintiff sued the defendant, a naturopath, who had applied a black salve to her that disfigured her face. The defendant sought to exclude evidence at trial that federal law prohibited the sale, market, or manufacture of the salve because, he argued, it was overly prejudicial. The District Court agreed and disallowed the evidence. After a jury awarded the plaintiff some damages, she appealed, arguing that the District Court had abused its discretion by disallowing the evidence. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the naturopath had not himself sold, marketed, or manufactured the salve and that the relevance of the evidence did not outweigh its prejudicial value. McColl v. Lang, 2016 MT 255, 385 Mont. 150, 381 P.3d 574.

Evidence of Earlier Encounter With Arresting Officer Allowed — Reliance on Evidence by Both Parties — No Abuse of Discretion: The defendant was charged with and convicted of improper influence of an official for threatening to kill a police officer and his family as he was being taken to jail by the officer for disorderly conduct. The defendant had been arrested by the same officer earlier, and the state was allowed to introduce evidence of the previous encounter. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing evidence of that encounter. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, ruling that the defendant had not demonstrated that the danger of unfair prejudice had outweighed the evidence's probative value. St. v. Spottedbear, 2016 MT 243, 385 Mont. 68, 380 P.3d 810.

Denial of Motion in Limine of Defendant Yelling at Victim and Taking Victim's Car — Transaction Rule — Prejudice Outweighed by Probative Value: The defendant was charged with partner or family member assault. Prior to trial, he moved to prevent testimony that he had yelled at the victim and taken her car at the time of the incident. The District Court denied the motion and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing the testimony and that the prejudicial effect of the testimony outweighed its probative value. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, holding that the evidence was inextricably linked and explanatory of the nature and power dynamics of the relationship between the defendant and the victim. St. v. Saylor, 2016 MT 226, 384 Mont. 497, 380 P.3d 743.

Prior Uncharged Sexual Assaults Admitted — Evidence to Support Allegations of Spousal Abuse Excluded — No Abuse of Discretion: After evidence of a sexual assault against a family member in Washington State arose, the mother of the victim informed her sister, who also had a daughter. The first victim's cousin indicated that she had also been a victim of sexual acts by her uncle. In a trial over a decade later concerning the sexual assaults involving the cousin, the District Court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted evidence of the prior uncharged sexual assault because the evidence was introduced to show the timing of the victim's disclosure and because the District Court had tightly controlled the admission of the evidence to limit the danger of unfair prejudice. The District Court also did not abuse its discretion when it refused to admit evidence of bruising on the victim after she was married because the evidence did not show that the victim had been abused by the victim's husband, contrary to her statements denying spousal abuse at trial; and even if it did show that the victim had lied about whether her husband abused her, it did not establish that she had lied about the earlier sexual assaults, nor did it show that the victim erroneously attributed the cause of her emotional injuries to the sexual assaults. St. v. Pulst, 2015 MT 184, 379 Mont. 494, 351 P.3d 687.

Railroad Employee Injury — Evidence of Supplemental Employment Income Very Prejudicial — District Court Abuse of Discretion: The plaintiff, an employee of a railroad, pursued a cause of action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA) and the Locomotive Inspection Act (LIA) for a work-related injury that prevented him from working as a conductor for 6 months. In addition to working as a conductor, the employee had a lucrative consulting business before and after the date of injury. Before trial, the District Court denied the plaintiff's motion in limine to exclude reference to money earned by him as a consultant. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the District Court abused its discretion by admitting into evidence the specific amount of income the plaintiff made from his nonrailroad employment, and the case was remanded for a new trial. The court reasoned that the evidence was very prejudicial and that it could have had an impact upon the jury's verdict on the issue of liability, as well as damages. Martin v. BNSF Ry. Co., 2015 MT 167, 379 Mont. 423, 352 P.3d 598.

Admission of Testimony Regarding Defendant's Sexual Habits — Reversible Error: The defendant was charged with sexually assaulting his girlfriend's sister. During the trial, the state was allowed to present testimony regarding his sexual habits to show that he exercised control over his girlfriend, who was an adverse witness. On appeal, the defendant argued that the testimony was highly prejudicial and should not have been permitted under Rule 403. The Supreme Court reversed his conviction, agreeing that the testimony was inflammatory in an otherwise weak evidentiary case and that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing the testimony. St. v. Nichols, 2014 MT 343, 377 Mont. 384, 339 P.3d 1274.

Testimony Regarding Prior Charges of Which Defendant Was Acquitted — Use of Testimony Prejudicial: The defendant was charged with sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault of an 11-year-old girl. During the defendant's trial, the prosecutor sought to introduce evidence of an earlier charge against the defendant of sexually assaulting a 5-year-old, of which he had been acquitted. Against the defendant's objection, the court allowed testimony regarding the other charge to help explain why the victim had waited for 4 years before coming forward with her allegations. However, at trial, the prosecution expanded the use of the testimony and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed with the defendant that he was entitled to a new trial given the misuse of this highly inflammatory testimony, which was unfairly prejudicial to the defendant. St. v. Franks, 2014 MT 273, 376 Mont. 431, 335 P.3d 725, distinguished in St. v. Colburn, 2018 MT 141, 391 Mont. 449, 409 P.3d 1196.

Evidence Improperly Admitted — Cumulative Evidence: Condoms found in the defendant's van were admitted in a trial, but there was no relationship between the presence of the condoms in the van and alleged sexual comments from the defendant while in the van to a pedestrian or between the presence of the condoms and the crimes charged, which included attempted deliberate homicide, assault with a weapon, criminal endangerment, and witness tampering. Although the evidence was more prejudicial than probative, it was harmless trial error because the evidence was cumulative. St. v. Zlahn, 2014 MT 224, 376 Mont. 245, 332 P.3d 247.

No Error in Admitting Evidence of Alleged Threats and Prior Conduct: In a proceeding concerning a misdemeanor assault conviction, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of an altercation in a parking lot with another member of the victim's party prior to the incident and evidence of earlier threats from the defendant. The Supreme Court held that the events explained the charged offense and were inextricably linked with it. Furthermore, although the defendant argued that the evidence should be excluded under Rule 403, M.R.Ev., the trial court did not err in refusing to exclude the evidence because the rule does not require that relevant information be excluded simply because it is prejudicial. St. v. Lamarr, 2014 MT 222, 376 Mont. 232, 332 P.3d 258.

Constructive Discharge Upheld Despite Error in Admission of Evidence: Admission of evidence of the settlement amount in another employment case against the same defendant was in error. Since there was only one other employment case against this defendant, evidence of the settlement amount did not demonstrate a habitual pattern, and the danger of prejudice exceeded the probative value. However, in light of the other evidence presented by the plaintiff and the damage limitations in the Wrongful Discharge from Employment Act, the court concluded that introducing the settlement amount of a separate employment claim did not significantly alter the result of the trial. Harrell v. Farmers Edu. & Co-op Union, 2013 MT 367, 373 Mont. 92, 314 P.3d 920.

Sexually Explicit Photographs Highly Probative and Admissible: Rule 403, M.R.Ev., confers discretion on the trial judge to exclude relevant evidence that poses a danger of unfair prejudice. In this case, the photographs were highly probative of the defendant's sexual relationship with his daughter, and the prosecution's use of the photographs at trial was not unfairly prejudicial. St. v. Stewart, 2012 MT 317, 367 Mont. 503, 291 P.3d 1187.

Video of Defendant Taking Preliminary Alcohol Screening Test Inadmissible — Expert Testimony Required: After being convicted of driving under the influence of alcohol, the defendant claimed on appeal that the District Court abused its discretion by admitting a police video that showed the defendant participating in a preliminary alcohol screening test (PAST) and then being placed under arrest. The sound from the video was muted and the results of the PAST were not presented to the jury. The Supreme Court reversed the conviction, reasoning that the video showing administration of the PAST, followed by an arrest, raised a compelling inference that the defendant was over the legal blood alcohol limit. Consequently, the Supreme Court determined that the video was impermissibly used as substantive evidence of intoxication without the state satisfying the requirement of St. v. Damon, 2005 MT 218, 328 Mont. 276, 119 P.3d 1194, and Rule 702, M.R.Ev., to call an expert witness to testify regarding the reliability and accuracy of the PAST. St. v. Lozon, 2012 MT 303, 367 Mont. 424, 291 P.3d 1135.

Jury Permitted to Determine Whether Plaintiff's Health Problems Were Caused by Carbon Monoxide Exposure or Alcohol Abuse — No Unfair Prejudice: An employee claimed that he suffered long-term physical and emotional injuries from carbon monoxide and propane exposure at his place of employment. The employee died prior to trial, and the District Court denied the estate's motion in limine to prohibit evidence or argument regarding the cause of death. On appeal, the Supreme Court upheld the District Court's ruling and determined that evidence of alcohol abuse was relevant in allowing the jury to make factual determinations regarding causation and damages. Moreover, the probative value of admitting the evidence of alcohol abuse was not unfairly prejudicial, since the exclusion of all evidence regarding the death could have led the jury to improperly speculate on the link between exposure to carbon monoxide and the employee's death. Alexander v. Bozeman Motors, Inc., 2012 MT 301, 367 Mont. 401, 291 P.3d 1120.

Attempted Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — Evidence of Conversations Leading up to Violation Properly Excluded — Photos of Other Women Sent by Victim to Defendant Irrelevant and Prejudicial: After the defendant was convicted of attempted sexual intercourse without consent, he claimed that his due process rights were violated based on the District Court's exclusion of evidence that included alleged sexual conversations between the defendant and the victim in the days leading up to the violation and photos of semiclothed women that were allegedly sent from the victim's cell phone to the defendant. The Supreme Court determined that the rape shield law exception in 45-5-511 does not extend to alleged conversations leading up to the date of the violation. Moreover, the Supreme Court held that the exclusions were proper on the basis that the alleged conversations and photos were irrelevant or more prejudicial than probative under Rules 401 through 403, M.R.Ev. The District Court struck the appropriate balance between the defendant's right to develop his case and the rules of evidence. St. v. Bishop, 2012 MT 259, 367 Mont. 10, 291 P.3d 538.

Waste of Game Animal — Photos of Moldy Carcass Held Probative — No Substantial Change in Condition: Wilmer was charged with waste of a game animal under 87-3-102 (now repealed) and objected to introduction of a photo of the carcass at trial because 3 days had passed between when the carcass was confiscated and when the photo was taken and because there may have been bite marks on it. The Supreme Court noted that roughly 70 days had passed between when the deer was shot and when it was confiscated and that the game warden insisted that the photo showed the condition of the carcass when it was confiscated. The Supreme Court held that the additional 3 days could not have altered the carcass significantly, that the lack of odor of the meat in the photographs went to the weight of the evidence and not its admissibility, that the photos were not unduly prejudicial, and that the District Court properly admitted the photographs. St. v. Wilmer, 2011 MT 78, 360 Mont. 101, 252 P.3d 178.

Recorded Phone Call by Defendant Threatening Victim Admissible: The defendant argued that admitting a recorded phone call by him threatening the victim on the night of the assault was inflammatory and prejudicial. The Supreme Court noted that basically all evidence presented by the prosecution against a defendant is prejudicial, but in the absence of a showing by the defendant that the evidence poses a danger of unfair prejudice and that the danger substantially outweighs the probative value of the evidence, the evidence is admissible. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had failed to meet the required burden of proof to have the evidence excluded. St. v. Belanus, 2010 MT 204, 357 Mont. 463, 240 P.3d 1021.

Improper Admissibility of Evidence Concerning Defendant's Sexual Relationship in Obstruction Case — Reversible Error — Relevant Evidence Admissible: Miller was convicted in Justice's Court of obstructing a police officer. Following a call to Kalispell police regarding the welfare of her partner, Miller, a probation officer, had called the Kalispell police to report that her partner was with her at the bar and that the call was a prank, when in fact the partner had left the bar and was subsequently involved in an auto accident. During trial, the court allowed multiple references to Miller's lesbian relationship and allowed evidence related to the accident. Miller appealed on grounds that the references to her sexual orientation were unrelated to the charge, irrelevant, and highly prejudicial. Miller also asserted that evidence of the accident was an abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court reversed the admission of references to Miller's sexual orientation. Society does not view homosexuality or bisexuality in the same manner as it views heterosexuality, so there was a strong potential that a juror would be prejudiced against a homosexual or bisexual person, so it was prejudicial to allow references to Miller's relationship because it was not probative or relevant to the crime with which Miller was charged. However, evidence of the accident was relevant to Miller's crime because it proved that Miller provided untruthful information to the police, so the court affirmed admission of the accident evidence. A new trial was ordered with directions to exclude references to Miller's homosexuality. Kalispell v. Miller, 2010 MT 62, 355 Mont. 379, 230 P.3d 792. See also St. v. Ford, 278 Mont. 353, 929 P.2d 245 (1996).

Collateral Nature of Evidence in Determining Admissibility of Contradiction Evidence: The Supreme Court cited federal courts and the Commission Comments to Rule 607, M.R.Ev., and concluded that while the collateral or noncollateral nature of evidence may be a factor to consider, the admissibility and use of contradiction evidence, whether extrinsic or the actual testimony of the witness, is to be governed by Rules 401 and 403, M.R.Ev., and any other applicable rules of evidence. Rule 403 identifies the factors pertinent to determining the admissibility of contradiction evidence. A trial court must carefully apply those factors in deciding whether and to what extent contradiction evidence may be introduced, and the trial court has broad discretion to exclude evidence under Rule 403. St. v. Passmore, 2010 MT 34, 355 Mont. 187, 225 P.3d 1229.

Admissibility of Video of Defendant Immediately After Accident: Schauf asserted that a video taken by the arresting officer's patrol car camera depicting Schauf's behavior at the scene of a vehicle accident should not have been admitted because the prejudicial effect of the evidence outweighed its probative value. The Supreme Court disagreed. The video was clearly relevant and probative of Schauf's condition and level of intoxication. The jury was informed that the video was taken just after a horrific high-speed crash and that Schauf had suffered a head injury. The jury was in a position to weigh the factors and to give the evidence as a whole the weight it deserved. As the District Court found, the only prejudice to Schauf was that the video was highly probative of the state's contention that Schauf was intoxicated at the time of the crash. The evidence was not unfairly prejudicial, and the District Court properly exercised its discretion in allowing admission of the video into evidence. St. v. Schauf, 2009 MT 281, 352 M 186, 216 P3d 740 (2009).

Expert Testimony Regarding Grooming of Victims for Sexual Abuse Properly Allowed: The court in Berosik's incest trial allowed the state's witness to describe the characteristics of the grooming of potential child victims of sexual abuse and then allowed the complaining witnesses and others to testify about Berosik's prior acts that occurred with the victims over several years. The court ruled that the prior acts were evidence that Berosik was grooming his victims and thus were part of the transactions the state sought to prove. On appeal, Berosik asserted that the expert testimony on grooming was irrelevant and highly prejudicial. The Supreme Court disagreed. Expert testimony explaining the complexities of child sexual abuse is admissible, and the evidence of prior sexual activity occurring before the charged offenses was admissible under the transaction rule because the activity formed part of the transaction that was the fact in dispute and was explanatory of the charged offense. St. v. Berosik, 2009 MT 260, 352 M 16, 214 P3d 776 (2009). See also St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 M 114, 201 P3d 811 (2009), and St. v. Crosley, 2009 MT 126, 350 M 223, 206 P3d 932 (2009).

Relevance of Criminal and Character Evidence in Wrongful Discharge: Dean's employment as an administrative assistant to the Board of County Commissioners was terminated following the discovery of Dean's involvement in a marijuana business and subsequent arrest. Dean subsequently sued the county for its negligent hiring of the officer who was involved in the drug investigation, for unlawful arrest and imprisonment, for wrongful discharge, and for malicious prosecution. A jury found for the county on all claims, and Dean appealed. The Supreme Court considered the evidence related to each claim and affirmed. The county's actions in hiring the officer who was involved in the investigation were irrelevant as to whether Dean was falsely arrested, and evidence related to the hiring was properly excluded. Likewise, evidence gathered after Dean's arrest concerning Dean's personal drug use, although not admissible as evidence of false arrest, was relevant to a determination of whether Dean was wrongfully discharged or terminated for good cause and was properly admitted. Evidence in the record was substantial that probable cause existed to arrest Dean, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of Dean's drug use and connection to persons involved in the marijuana business. Dean v. Sanders County, 2009 MT 88, 350 M 8, 204 P3d 722 (2009).

Prejudicial Exclusion of Rebuttal Testimony Warranting Retrial: Plaintiffs sued the seller of a subdivision lot for failure to disclose that the lot contained uncontrolled fill material to a depth of about 31 feet below grade, which resulted in shifting of the foundation of plaintiffs' home, causing damages. Plaintiffs were prohibited at trial from introducing evidence of similar problems with other homes in the subdivision on grounds that the evidence was irrelevant and prejudicial and because defense counsel indicated that defendant would not try to introduce evidence that the damage to plaintiffs' home was a unique anomalous occurrence. However, at trial defendant repeatedly referred to numerous other homes in the area that had not experienced foundation problems, which insinuated that plaintiffs' home was unique and that the damage was likely the result of plaintiffs' own negligence. The trial court adhered to its ruling precluding plaintiffs' evidence of similar damage to other homes and did not allow plaintiffs to rebut defendant's evidence. The jury apportioned negligence of 10% to defendant, 45% to the city, and 45% to plaintiffs, and plaintiffs appealed. The Supreme Court held that excluding plaintiffs' rebuttal testimony affected the result, because any change in the apportionment of negligence would alter plaintiffs' recovery; therefore, plaintiffs were entitled to reversal and retrial with the opportunity to present evidence of similar problems with other homes in the area. Rohrer v. Knudson, 2009 MT 35, 349 M 197, 203 P3d 759 (2009). See also Rieger v. Coldwell, 254 M 507, 839 P2d 1257 (1992).

No Right to Confront Witness With Irrelevant Evidence: Dunning contended that his constitutional right to confront witnesses was violated when he was not allowed to question the friend of the victim of a kidnapping and sexual assault regarding the victim's allegedly untruthful statement that she was pregnant in order to establish the victim's propensity to lie. However, the testimony would have been an improper attack on the victim using irrelevant evidence, and the constitutional right does not allow a defendant to confront a witness with irrelevant evidence. The possibility of the friend's testimony prejudicing the jury outweighed the probative value of the testimony, so the testimony was properly excluded. St. v. Dunning, 2008 MT 427, 347 M 443, 198 P3d 828 (2008).

Cumulative Testimony on Injuries: Pol was driving his pickup truck on a city street in Missoula, Montana. His truck struck a motorcycle carrying two riders, Bernard Kuhns and his wife, Teresa Kuhns. Teresa Kuhns was killed, and Bernard Kuhns was injured. Pol drove away without stopping. Pol was charged with negligent vehicular assault and vehicular homicide while under the influence of alcohol, and a jury convicted him on both counts. Pol contended the District Court erred in admitting testimony about both victims' injuries, in light of a stipulation that included that Bernard Kuhns suffered serious bodily injury, as a result of the collision, in that he suffered a broken clavicle. In addition, over objection, a person who witnessed the collision testified to the apparent extent of the victims' injuries. In support of his argument that the testimonies were inadmissible, Pol advanced cases addressing the admission of otherwise relevant photographs, in which the issue was whether the probative value of the photographs was outweighed by their prejudice to the defendant. Montana courts have long recognized the special visual capacity of photographs to arouse human feelings of sympathy or prejudice. However, that special capacity was not contained in the testimony. The Supreme Court held that, while the challenged responses were arguably cumulative to the stipulated facts, Pol failed to establish that the court abused its discretion in allowing them. St. v. Pol, 2008 MT 352, 346 M 322, 195 P3d 807 (2008).

Admissibility of Minor Death Verdicts Chart in Unfair Trade Practices Trial: At numerous times during an unfair trade practices trial against an insurer for not reasonably settling an underlying medical malpractice claim, the insurer made reference to and presented a chart summarizing child death verdicts in Montana. The insurer argued that Montana juries have not generally ruled in favor of plaintiffs who seek damages for the death of their children and asserted that this information was of consequence during settlement procedures. A verdict was eventually returned for the insurer, and on appeal, plaintiffs argued that the chart was irrelevant, prejudicial, and inadmissible hearsay. The Supreme Court disagreed. The evidence was offered to demonstrate that knowledge of past verdicts and settlements was critical to the insurer when evaluating malpractice claims and that the evidence provided a basis on which to generate settlement offers and counteroffers. Any prejudicial effect of the chart was outweighed by its probative value because the trial was about the process used by the insurer before entering a settlement. Peterson v. The Doctors' Co., 2007 MT 264, 339 M 354, 170 P3d 459 (2007).

Potentially Confusing or Misleading Expert Testimony Properly Excluded: At Spencer's trial for sexually assaulting his children, Spencer sought to introduce videotaped testimony of a licensed clinical psychologist who opined that Spencer did not have the diagnostic criteria of a pedophile. The District Court rejected the testimony because it was not about Spencer's mental condition, but rather about whether Spencer could be considered a member of a diagnostic group. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed that the testimony was improper for the jury. Whatever relevance the testimony had, the dangers of confusing the issues or misleading the jury substantially outweighed its probative value. St. v. Spencer, 2007 MT 245, 339 M 227, 169 P3d 384 (2007), followed in St. v. Passmore, 2010 MT 34, 355 Mont. 187, 225 P.3d 1229, and St. v. Walker, 2018 MT 312, 394 Mont. 1, 433 P.3d 202.

Determination of Punitive Damage Award — Improper Exclusion of Evidence Tending to Indicate Defendant's Action: The trial court held defendant strictly liable for damages related to environmental damage caused by defendant's refinery but refused to allow defendant to introduce evidence at trial of state involvement with site remediation or of defendant's attempts to comply with state law or to instruct the jury at the hearing on punitive damages to consider whether defendant's actions comported with state regulations or had been approved by the state regulator. The Supreme Court held that a trial court may not categorically exclude evidence tending to show why a defendant acted as it did, or failed to act, when a jury considers whether to award punitive damages. The punitive damage award was vacated and the case remanded in order to allow a new jury to consider evidence of the state's role for purposes of determining whether defendant acted with actual fraud or malice and to allow defendant to explain any remedial measures taken in response to the discovery of misconduct as a means to mitigate punitive damages. Sunburst School District No. 2 v. Texaco, Inc., 2007 MT 183, 338 M 259, 165 P3d 1079 (2007). See also Two Leggins v. Gatrell, 2023 MT 160, 413 Mont. 172, 534 P.3d 668, holding that evidence of racial motivation is admissible when considered for the exclusive purpose of determining a punitive damages award.

Photographs of Homicide Victim Admissible to Show Type of Injury and to Aid in Understanding Trial Testimony: English asserted that emergency room photographs of a negligent homicide victim were improperly admitted because they were inflammatory, irrelevant to the question of English's negligence, and far more prejudicial than probative. The Supreme Court disagreed. Although the victim's death was not in dispute, the photographic documentation of the victim's particular injuries may have been useful in helping the jury understand the manner in which the victim was injured and may have enabled the jury to make inferences about English's state of mind at the time of the crime. Thus, the photographs were relevant because the type of injuries could have been a factor in determining English's negligence, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting them. St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006), distinguishing St. v. Bristow, 267 M 170, 882 P2d 1041 (1994). See also St. v. Mergenthaler, 263 M 198, 868 P2d 560 (1994).

Exclusion of Assault Victim's Prior Assault Record — Probative Value Outweighed by Prejudicial Effect: Grixti was arrested for family member assault against his wife. At trial, Grixti sought to introduce evidence of the wife's prior family member assault against Grixti, but the trial court granted the state's motion in limine excluding evidence of the wife's prior assault. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that evidence of a witness's prior crimes and wrongs is inadmissible to show action in conformity with the prior crime under this rule, but may be admissible under Rule 404, M.R.Ev., to prove motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident and under Rule 608, M.R.Ev., to attack a witness's character if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness. However, in this case, the trial court found that the potential prejudicial effect of the wife's prior arrest record likely outweighed any probative value regarding the wife's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness. The Supreme Court deferred to the trial court's discretion in making evidentiary character determinations and affirmed the grant of the motion in limine. St. v. Gixti, 2005 MT 296, 329 M 330, 124 P3d 177 (2005).

No Error in Disallowing Expert to Testify Regarding Nonwitness Third-Party Experiences With Product Given Minimal Probative Value: Plaintiffs sought to introduce testimony from an expert regarding the functioning of a type of subflooring that was installed in plaintiffs' home, resulting in a squeaky floor. The District Court allowed the expert to testify concerning the expert's experiments on pieces of the subflooring and concerning the experience of another witness who previously testified to a squeaky floor after using the subflooring, but the court did not allow the expert to speak to the experiences of nonwitness third parties concerning other experiences with the subflooring. On appeal, plaintiffs contended that the expert's testimony on other incidents of subflooring failures should have been allowed because they formed the basis for the expert's opinion and demonstrated notice. The Supreme Court concluded that excluding the testimony was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion. Although under Rule 703, M.R.Ev., an expert witness may testify to evidence that might be otherwise inadmissible, if the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice or confusion, the evidence may be excluded under this rule. With the expert's foundational testimony already in evidence, the probative value of the expert's testimony regarding experiences of nonwitness third parties would likely have been minimal, particularly since plaintiffs had declined the opportunity to cross-examine the witness who testified to a squeaky floor after using the subflooring. Tripp v. Jeld-Wen, Inc., 2005 MT 121, 327 M 146, 112 P3d 1018 (2005). See also Kissock v. Butte Convalescent Center, 1999 MT 322, 297 M 307, 992 P2d 1271 (1999).

Videotape of Detention Center Altercation Properly Admitted: At a trial for assaulting peace officers during an altercation at a detention center, the trial court allowed introduction of a videotape of the altercation. Pittman contended that the videotape was prejudicial and needlessly presented cumulative evidence because the officers who appeared in the videotape also testified at trial. The Supreme Court held that introduction of the videotape was not an abuse of the trial court's discretion because the videotape was instructive and corroborative and the probative value of the videotape was not substantially outweighed by any danger of unfair prejudice to Pittman. St. v. Pittman, 2005 MT 70, 326 M 324, 109 P3d 237 (2005).

Photographs of Nonvictim Children Not Considered Prejudicial or Character Evidence — Probative Value Warranting Admissibility: In Bar-Jonah's aggravated kidnapping, sexual assault, and assault with a weapon trial, the trial court allowed the admission of hundreds of photographs of children seized during a search of Bar-Jonah's residence. Bar-Jonah contended that the photographs were: (1) improperly admitted because only a few were images of the victims; and (2) unfairly prejudicial and tended to erroneously reflect on Bar-Jonah's character. The Supreme Court disagreed. The photographs were relevant by linking them to Bar-Jonah's motive for befriending the victims, for enhancing the credibility of the victims, and to rebut Bar-Jonah's asserted defenses. Even if the photographs could be construed to reflect on Bar-Jonah's character, they were not introduced for that purpose, but rather to prove motive. Any prejudice to Bar-Jonah through introduction of the photographs was outweighed by their probative value, which did not present evidence of other crimes or acts. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

No Prejudice by Inability to Depose or Call Child Accident Victim as Witness: A 3-year-old child fell through the second story railing at the Montana State University-Bozeman library and suffered brain injuries. The state sought to depose the child and call him as a witness in the ensuing trial, but the District Court concluded that because of the child's age, little probative information could be gained by forcing him to testify and that such testimony would be traumatic and unduly burdensome, so testimony at deposition and trial was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although there is no minimum age requirement regarding child testimony, nevertheless, child witnesses need protection against the potential emotional and psychological injuries that may occur with regular litigation procedures. Any information that the child could have provided was available from other witnesses and was thus needlessly cumulative and subject to exclusion under this rule. The state was not prejudiced by its inability to call the child as a witness, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in protecting the child from having to testify at deposition and trial. Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004). See also St. v. Stock, 2011 MT 131, 361 Mont. 1, 256 P.3d 899.

Certain Relevant Evidence of Defendant's Conduct Following Sexual Assault Properly Admitted Under Transaction Rule: Immediately following a sexual assault, defendant went into the victim's daughter's room, then came back into the living room wearing a pair of the daughter's panties. Prior to trial, defendant moved in limine to exclude this evidence, as well as evidence that he then masturbated in front of the victim while wearing the panties. The District Court granted defendant's motion excluding testimony about the alleged masturbation, but allowed testimony about the panties and allowed the panties into evidence. Defendant contended on appeal that allowing the evidence was prejudicial and designed to inflame the jury. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103. The conduct occurred immediately after the assault and was intertwined with the crime and relevant as part of the transaction, plus the victim testified that the conduct made her fearful. The evidence was highly probative, and the jury had the right to evaluate the evidence in the context in which the crime occurred. St. v. Detonancour, 2001 MT 213, 306 M 389, 34 P3d 487 (2001).

Evidence of Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy Proper to Prove Motive, Not Character: Hocevar was charged with attempted deliberate homicide, two counts of deliberate homicide, criminal endangerment, and assault in connection with the deaths of her two sons. She contended on appeal that it was error to introduce evidence of another son's death to prove her character, in that she suffered from Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy (MSBP), which is a pattern of behavior wherein a caretaker, usually a mother, fabricates or causes illness in another, usually a preverbal child, to gain attention, and then to use MSBP as the common plan or motive for her actions against her other children. The Supreme Court considered the third and fourth elements of the modified Just rule, holding that the evidence was admissible. MSBP is not a psychiatric diagnosis of a mental disorder, but rather a pediatric diagnosis of a form of child abuse. The "disorder" consists of the behavior of the person suffering from it, so there is no distinction between the disorder and the behavior associated with the disorder. As such, MSBP did not describe Hocevar's character, but rather her behavior toward her children. The evidence showed motive and was properly admitted under the third requirement of the modified Just rule because it was used to establish Hocevar's motive in smothering one child and poisoning another, not to establish Hocevar's character and that she acted in conformity with MSBP. The possible prejudicial effect of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its great probative weight because it tended to establish the MSBP diagnosis and Hocevar's motive. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Clarification of General Requirement of Substantially Similar Circumstances as Precedent to Admission of Evidence of Prior Accident: Evidence of prior accidents, although inadmissible to prove negligence, may be admitted for other purposes, such as to show: (1) the existence of a particular physical condition or defect; (2) the dangerousness of the condition or defect; (3) the possibility that the condition or defect might cause an accident or injury of the type alleged; (4) cause in fact; and (5) knowledge of the condition or defect. (See Modern Evidence: Doctrine and Practice, Mueller & Kirkpatrick, § 4.8 at 281, 282 (1995), and McCormick on Evidence § 200 at 844-847, 4th Ed. (1992).) Regarding the degree of identity of circumstances required when offering prior accident evidence for the sole purpose of notice or knowledge, the general requirement of substantially similar circumstances is relaxed or less strict when the evidence is proffered to show notice rather than dangerousness or causation, and a lack of exact similarity of conditions will not preclude admission under these circumstances if the accident was of a kind that should have served to warn defendant. In proving notice, there may be dissimilarities between the accidents; however, the differences affect the weight of the evidence, but not necessarily the admissibility. Here, Kisson slipped and fell in defendant's parking lot. The District Court excluded proffered evidence of a fall by another person in the same parking lot days earlier because it occurred at a different time of day under different physical circumstances. The Supreme Court disagreed and reversed, holding that the minor spatial and temporal differences existing between the two slip-and-fall accidents went to the weight rather than admissibility of the evidence in supporting an inference that defendant had notice or knowledge of the icy conditions. The circumstances surrounding the prior accident were not so remote or dissimilar from Kisson's accident that the probative value was substantially outweighed by unfair prejudice to defendant. Kisson v. Butte Convalescent Center, 1999 MT 322, 297 M 307, 992 P2d 1271, 56 St. Rep. 1288 (1999). See also Runkle v. Burlington N., Inc., 188 M 286, 613 P2d 982, 37 St. Rep. 995 (1980), *Bailey v. S. Pac. Results of Prior Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus Test Improperly Admitted — Harmless Error: At Berosik's DUI trial, he argued that because his eyes had been injured in his youth, the horizontal gaze nystagmus test (HGN) was not valid. The District Court concluded that Berosik opened the door to evidence of a prior DUI incident in testifying on direct examination about the eye condition and admitted evidence of the results of the prior HGN, which Berosik had also failed.

The Supreme Court decided on appeal that the court abused its discretion in admitting the evidence because it did not rebut Berosik's suggestion that he scored high on the test due to the injuries and because the prior test results had, at most, a negligible probative value that was substantially outweighed by the risk of confusion of the issues. However, the error was harmless because Berosik failed to show that any of his substantive rights were prejudiced or that his right to a fair trial was impaired. Even without the prior test results, there was overwhelming evidence that Berosik was guilty of DUI, so the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Berosik, 1999 MT 238, 296 M 165, 988 P2d 775, 56 St. Rep. 938 (1999), applying St. v. Partin, 287 M 12, 951 P2d 1002, 54 St. Rep. 1474 (1997).

No Prejudice From Use of Inadmissible, but Simple and Distinct, Evidence: Southern was charged with two counts of kidnapping, one count of burglary, one count of theft, and five counts of sexual intercourse without consent. In moving to sever the nine counts in the information into four separate trials pursuant to 46-13-211, Southern argued that the prejudicial effect of the other crimes evidence substantially outweighed its probative value and thus evidence of the other crimes would not have been admissible in separate trials. It is inevitable that evidence of other crimes will have some prejudicial effect, so under the fourth part of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)), relevant evidence will be inadmissible only when its probity is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Pursuant to St. v. Huether, 284 M 259, 943 P2d 1291, 54 St. Rep. 872 (1997), the prejudicial effect of relevant evidence will substantially outweigh the probative value when the evidence will prompt the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Thus, evidence is inadmissible under the fourth part of the modified Just rule if it arouses the jury's sympathy for one side without regard to its probative value, if it confuses or misleads the jury, or if it distracts the jury from the main issues in the case. Prejudice arising from the use of inadmissible evidence will not be found when the evidence is simple and distinct. Even though the other crimes evidence in Southern's case would have been prejudicial, the jury was instructed that each count was a distinct offense and had to be decided separately. There was nothing in the record to suggest that the jury did not keep the relevant evidence separate. Since the other crimes evidence was simple and distinct and would have been admissible at separate trials, Southern failed to establish that the jury used evidence of guilt on one charge to convict him of other charges on the theory that the evidence would have been inadmissible in trials on the other charges. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999).

Evidence of Defendant's Participation Admissible Although Actions Not Direct Cause of Victim's Death: Lantis was tried for deliberate homicide by accountability. He argued that evidence of his involvement in the crime relating to the victim being stabbed should have been excluded because the victim died because of strangulation at the hands of another person. The Supreme Court ruled that the evidence was admissible because it established facts connecting the defendant to the crime scene and suggested his involvement in the crime. St. v. Lantis, 1998 MT 172, 289 M 480, 962 P2d 1169, 55 St. Rep. 694 (1998).

Drug Evidence Irrelevant and Prejudicial — Introduction Reversible Error: Ingraham was convicted of negligent homicide, criminal endangerment, and criminal trespass to property in relation to an automobile accident. Ingraham filed a motion in limine to exclude evidence of drugs detected in his system and found in his car and to exclude evidence of warnings about drug and alcohol interactions. The motion in limine was denied, and the evidence was introduced. Whether the evidence was relevant and admissible depended on the state's ability to demonstrate a link between the evidence and the accident. The Supreme Court found that because uncontradicted evidence presented to the jury established that none of the drugs had any impairing effect whatsoever on Ingraham's ability to drive at the time of the accident, evidence of their presence was irrelevant and prejudicial and had virtually no probative value. The same reasoning was applied to the warnings. Admission of the evidence constituted reversible prejudicial error. Ingraham's motion in limine properly preserved his objection to the introduction of the evidence for appeal. St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998). See also State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 2000 MT 266, 302 M 39, 22 P3d 166, 57 St. Rep. 1111 (2000), in which the use of Ingraham's testimony from the first trial was not precluded, constitutionally or statutorily, from use by the state in its case in chief at the retrial.

Cross-Examination Regarding Unrelated Incidents of Prior Sexual Abuse Properly Limited: The District Court did not err in limiting defendant's cross-examination of his ex-wife regarding two unrelated prior incidents of sexual abuse, one involving the ex-wife and the other involving her infant daughter. Defendant was allowed to present closing arguments concerning the ex-wife's motive, bias, or prejudice, based on evidence in the record. However, allowing cross-examination regarding the two prior unrelated incidents would have created unfair prejudice against the ex-wife and confused the issues for the jury. St. v. MacKinnon, 1998 MT 78, 288 M 329, 957 P2d 23, 55 St. Rep. 331 (1998).

Admission of Criminal Justice Information as Evidence in Tort Action Upheld: David, his wife Susan, their minor child, and the parties' defunct business sued Pierce Flooring and others for damages, including damages for emotional distress, stemming from criminal acts of vandalism taken against the plaintiffs' competing business. In the course of the trial, the District Court allowed the defendants to inspect, copy, and introduce evidence in police records concerning domestic violence complaints made by Susan against David. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was relevant because it showed that there may have been another cause for the Blacks' emotional distress other than the acts of vandalism. The Supreme Court also held that the record showed that the District Court properly exercised its discretion under this rule in allowing the admission of some of the evidence but excluding other evidence because the Blacks' right to privacy exceeded the public's right to know. The Supreme Court held that the District Court's failure to make the written finding required by 44-5-303(1) was harmless error. Rocky Mtn. Enterprises, Inc. v. Pierce Flooring, 286 M 282, 951 P2d 1326, 54 St. Rep. 1410 (1997).

Pending Criminal Charges Inadmissible: Clews sued Montana Mining Properties, Inc. (MMPI), for failure to pay him for his consulting services. MMPI argued that the lower court erred in not admitting evidence of pending stock fraud charges in England against Clews and another company principal that were related to the mining project involving Clews and MMPI. The Supreme Court held that evidence of the charges was not probative of the relationship that existed between Clews and the other company principal, that charges do not prove anything, and that therefore their prejudicial value exceeded any probative value. C. Haydon Ltd. v. Mont. Min. Properties, Inc., 286 M 138, 951 P2d 46, 54 St. Rep. 1341 (1997).

Evidence of Prior Corporal Punishment Properly Excluded: When Huerta was tried on charges of assault of a juvenile, he attempted to introduce testimony of 26 witnesses who would testify that the child's mother had the habit of severely punishing the child. In an effort to reduce delay caused by redundant testimony, the District Court required Huerta to summarize the testimony of all of the witnesses by affidavits. The District Court held that the testimony would constitute "character assassination" and excluded the evidence. Citing St. v. Sigler, 210 M 248, 688 P2d 749 (1984), the Supreme Court held that the evidence that was excluded by the District Court was not inadmissible evidence of character but was evidence of habit that was relevant and therefore admissible under Rule 406, M.R.Ev. However, the Supreme Court also pointed out that this rule allows the trial court to exclude relevant evidence if it finds that the value of the evidence will be outweighed by prejudice, will confuse the issues, or will mislead the jury. After reviewing the record, the Supreme Court concluded that Huerta was able to sufficiently present his defense without the excluded testimony and, for that reason, that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 483, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Irrelevant and Prejudicial Evidence of Consumption of Alcohol by Plaintiff: Violette pulled out of a store's parking lot in front of Havens, and the two collided. Havens sued the state, claiming negligent failure to place a stoplight at the parking lot entrance. It was not error to deny Havens' motion to exclude evidence of his alcohol consumption before the accident when the state opposed the motion by stating that it would show that the consumption was a cause of the accident. However, this forced Havens to introduce evidence of, and to address, his alcohol consumption. In addition, the state offered no evidence that Havens' alcohol consumption helped cause the accident and the state's medical expert and a law enforcement officer both testified that Havens was not negligent. Evidence of the alcohol consumption prejudiced the whole trial. It was reversible error to deny a motion for a new trial. Havens v. St., 285 M 195, 945 P2d 941, 54 St. Rep. 1108 (1997), followed in St. v. Ingraham, 1998 MT 156, 290 M 18, 966 P2d 103, 55 St. Rep. 611 (1998), and distinguished in St. v. English, 2006 MT 177, 333 M 23, 140 P3d 454 (2006).

Sexual Preference Relevant to and Probative of Issue of Same Gender Sex Offense: The question of Ford's sexual preference was raised during cross-examination and in closing arguments of his trial for sexual intercourse without consent committed upon a person of the same gender. Ford asserted on appeal that the question was so prejudicial as to deprive him of a fair trial. However, the question was probative of whether Ford fit the profile of a person who would commit such an act and did not prejudice Ford's substantial rights. The possible impact of the jury's knowledge that Ford was a bisexual paled by comparison to the likely impact of the overwhelming evidence of his guilt. St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 947 (1996).

Lawyer's Letter to Veterans Administration Claiming Plaintiff's Death Caused by Preexisting Condition Not Admissible to Show Hospital Not Liable for Plaintiff's Death: Columbus Hospital argued that the lower court had erred in refusing to admit a letter written by the plaintiff's lawyer to the Veterans Benefits Administration stating that Busta's death was due to a preexisting condition incurred when he was in the service. The hospital alleged that the letter should have been admitted because it had a tendency to make more probable the hospital's claim that Busta had died due to a preexisting condition. The Supreme Court held that an attorney is not qualified to express a medical opinion that is admissible in court and that even if relevant, the letter presented substantial potential for confusing or misleading the jury and therefore had been properly excluded. Busta v. Columbus Hosp. Corp., 276 M 342, 916 P2d 122, 53 St. Rep. 428 (1996).

Error in Exclusion of Evidence of Stress-Provoking Event Other Than Accident in Determining Loss of Established Course of Life: Maurer was injured in a car accident, after which he was depressed. This depression led him to leave the family ranch and contributed to his "course of life" damages. Defendants should have been allowed to introduce evidence of another stress-provoking incident that occurred about the same time and could have contributed to Maurer's depression. The incident involved the injury of Maurer's girlfriend, criminal charges against Maurer, and his subsequent trial and acquittal on felony assault (now assault with a weapon) charges. The link between the incident and Maurer's depression was self-evident, and the jury should have been allowed to consider evidence of the incident from a common sense viewpoint to determine to what degree, if any, the stress from the incident contributed to Maurer's loss of established course of life. The probative value of evidence of the incident was not substantially outweighed by its prejudicial nature. Maurer v. Clausen Distrib. Co., 275 M 229, 912 P2d 195, 53 St. Rep. 78 (1996).

DNA Evidence — Statistical Evidence Not Inherently Prejudicial: Weeks was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. The conviction was based in part upon DNA evidence. Weeks argued that the statistical evidence resulting from the DNA testing was prejudicial. The Supreme Court held that because Weeks introduced no specific evidence showing that he was prejudiced by the statistical evidence resulting from the DNA testing, the statistical evidence was more probative than prejudicial. St. v. Weeks, 270 M 63, 891 P2d 477, 52 St. Rep. 78 (1995).

Introduction of Polygraph Results in Custody or Visitation Dispute Prohibited: As part of a modification of Robert's visitation rights, the District Court required that Robert undergo a sex offender evaluation. Robert argued that the results of a polygraph test taken as a part of the sex offender evaluation should not be introducible. Citing St. v. Staat, 248 M 291, 811 P2d 1261 (1991), and 37-62-302 (now repealed), the Supreme Court held that the results of a polygraph test taken as part of a court-ordered sex offender evaluation would not be admissible in subsequent proceedings in the case. In re Marriage of Njos/Allard, 270 M 54, 889 P2d 1192, 52 St. Rep. 74 (1995), followed in St. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 58, 293 M 472, 977 P2d 315, 56 St. Rep. 243 (1999).

Prejudicial Effect of Photographs: In a prosecution for accountability for aggravated kidnapping when offenders pleaded guilty to the underlying offense, bodily injury was not in dispute and photographs of the injuries were of little or no probative value in establishing accountability. The probative value of the photographs was far outweighed by their prejudicial effect on the jury to the detriment of the defendant. St. v. Bristow, 267 M 170, 882 P2d 1041, 51 St. Rep. 1010 (1994).

Autopsy Photographs as Instructive and Corroborative — Admissibility: Defendant convicted of five counts of deliberate homicide in a prison riot asserted District Court error in admitting into evidence autopsy photographs of the five deceased inmates. The medical examiner stated on cross-examination that he could present his testimony without the autopsy photographs. However, the medical examiner also testified that the photographs were necessarily instructive and essential in enabling the jury to understand the nature of the injuries and that the photographs, which were carefully selected as the best representations of the injuries sustained by the victims, simplified his task of explaining the injuries. In addition, the photographs corroborated testimony by inmates whose credibility was hotly contested at trial. The probative value of the photographs outweighed their prejudicial effect and were properly admitted. St. v. Wild, 266 M 331, 880 P2d 840, 51 St. Rep. 872 (1994), following St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 293, 864 P2d 1257 (1993). See also St. v. Close, 267 M 44, 881 P2d 1312, 51 St. Rep. 876 (1994), St. v. Flores, 1998 MT 328, 292 M 255, 974 P2d 124, 55 St. Rep. 1329 (1998), St. v. Dunfee, 2005 MT 147, 327 M 335, 114 P3d 217 (2005), and St. v. Buslayev, 2013 MT 88, 369 Mont. 428, 299 P.3d 324 (photographs were relevant to demonstrate the severity of impact of the collision resulting in the victim's death).

Wrongful Death Action — Plaintiff's Miscarriage Admissible: A District Court is vested with discretion to weigh the probative value of evidence against its prejudicial effect and to admit or exclude the evidence. When the defendant made no showing of prejudice, the District Court did not commit error and did not abuse its discretion in allowing evidence of the plaintiff's miscarriage. Lutz v. Nat'l Crane Corp., 267 M 368, 884 P2d 455, 51 St. Rep. 810 (1994).

Cumulative Evidence of Past Incidents of Consensual Sexual Contact Properly Excluded: The jury was presented with ample evidence of prior consensual acts between defendants and the victim from which it could determine without bias the credibility of defendants' claim that the sexual acts in question were also consensual. It was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to restrict additional relevant and admissible evidence of the victim's past sexual conduct that was merely cumulative in nature and that could easily have had the effect of being more prejudicial to the victim than probative to the jury. In light of the abundance of evidence, the restriction did not prevent defendants from presenting their consent defense. St. v. Wing, 264 M 215, 870 P2d 1368, 51 St. Rep. 223 (1994).

Color Slides of Child's Autopsy Properly Admitted: Mergenthaler was charged with negligent homicide of Ashley, a 13-month-old female. The state's evidence showed that Ashley suffered injuries to her skull and brain that were attributed by all of the state's medical experts to "whiplash shaken infant syndrome" and not to a fall from a couch, as claimed by Mergenthaler. The state introduced testimony of a physician who performed the autopsy and who used color slides to illustrate his testimony. Citing St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 293, 864 P2d 1257, 50 St. Rep. 1564 (1993), followed in St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490, 51 St. Rep. 962 (1994), the Supreme Court held that the District Court properly allowed the use of the slides because they were used for illustrative purposes only, they were not introduced in evidence, and the jury was not allowed to take them to the jury room. The slides provided important evidence in explaining how and why Ashley died. The Supreme Court also upheld the use of a photograph showing Ashley as a normal, happy, healthy baby because the photograph depicted the child's size, age, health, and vulnerability, all of which were issues in the case. St. v. Mergenthaler, 263 M 198, 868 P2d 560, 51 St. Rep. 13 (1994).

Discretion of Court to Reopen Case in Chief — Admissibility of Surprise Defense Testimony: The District Court allowed the state to reopen its case in chief after defense testimony at trial revealed that a defense witness had fabricated evidence and that a previously unknown witness, who had also fabricated physical evidence, was involved. These facts constituted good cause sufficient to allow the court to exercise its discretion to depart from the usual order of trial and allow examination of the witnesses and the relevance of the fabricated evidence. Further, introduction of the surprise testimony was relevant, and its probative value far outweighed any danger of unfair prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Snaric, 262 M 62, 862 P2d 1175, 50 St. Rep. 1443 (1993).

Defendant Not Entitled to Introduce Evidence of 13-Year-Old Child's Prior Sexual Misconduct: Passama, accused of sexual assault upon an 8-year-old girl, attempted to question her 13-year-old brother, a witness against him, concerning the brother's prior sexual misconduct. The Supreme Court ruled that the trial court had properly excluded the evidence on the basis that its prejudicial value outweighed its probative value. St. v. Passama, 261 M 338, 863 P2d 378, 50 St. Rep. 1349 (1993).

Admissibility of Evidence of Insurer's Postfiling Litigation Conduct — Balancing Test: The District Court allowed Palmer to introduce evidence of insurer Farmers Insurance Exchange (Farmers) litigation strategy and tactics that Farmers' attorneys used in defending Palmer's uninsured motorist case and of Farmers' decision to appeal the judgment in that case, raising the question of whether evidence of an insurer's postfiling conduct was admissible in a bad faith action. The Supreme Court held that an insurer's duty to deal fairly and not withhold payment of valid claims does not end when an insured files a complaint against the insurer, but the continuing duty of good faith does not necessarily render evidence of an insurer's postfiling conduct admissible. The court reiterated the balancing test in this rule as the correct approach between deterring improper conduct by insurers and allowing insurers to defend themselves against spurious claims. When an insurer's postfiling conduct has some relevance, the trial court must weigh its probative value against the inherently high prejudicial effect of such evidence, keeping in mind the insurer's fundamental right to defend itself. In this case, the prejudicial nature of evidence regarding litigation strategy and tactics and the decision to appeal far outweighed any relevance of the conduct, and the decision to admit the evidence was erroneous. Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 261 M 91, 861 P2d 895, 50 St. Rep. 1210 (1993), followed in Federated Mut. Ins. Co. v. Anderson, 1999 MT 288, 297 M 33, 991 P2d 915, 56 St. Rep. 1152 (1999). See also White v. W. Title Ins. Co., 710 P2d 309 (Cal. 1985).

Videotaping Techniques Not Prejudicial: The District Court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the jury to watch videotaped testimony in which the videocamera operator zoomed in on the child sexual assault victim when she cried or was otherwise distressed. Whether prejudicial effect is outweighed by probative value is a matter within the discretion of the trial court. The Supreme Court declined a request to implement uniform procedures applicable to videotaping of testimony. St. v. Scott, 257 M 454, 850 P2d 286, 50 St. Rep. 353 (1993).

Evidence Regarding Equipment Placed Two Miles From Accident Site Properly Excluded: The District Court properly disallowed redirect examination about equipment placed about 2 miles from an accident site, either for potential impeachment or probative purposes, because of the irrelevance and possible prejudicial effect of the testimony as it related to conditions at the actual accident site. Brockie v. Omo Constr., Inc., 255 M 495, 844 P2d 61, 49 St. Rep. 1092 (1992).

Admissibility of Probative Evidence Refuting Expert Testimony: Rieger was injured when a light fixture dislodged from the ceiling, striking him. In light of expert testimony that the sheetrock at the accident scene was defective, Rieger should have been allowed to offer evidence that other light fixtures were loose and were subsequently repaired. The evidence was probative and tended to refute the expert testimony that the sheetrock at the accident scene was defective and was the sole cause of the accident. Rieger v. Coldwell, 254 M 507, 839 P2d 1257, 49 St. Rep. 768 (1992).

Evidence of Incest Victim's Claimed Abortion Properly Excluded: An incest victim told an investigating officer that she had become pregnant by defendant and had an abortion but maintained that she did not know where the procedure took place. Defendant's attempts to find any record of the abortion were unsuccessful. Evidence of the abortion was relevant to the issue of the victim's veracity, but the probative value of the evidence was outweighed by its prejudice to the victim and confusion of the issues under this rule and was properly excluded. St. v. Rhyne, 253 M 513, 833 P2d 1112, 49 St. Rep. 577 (1992).

Failure to Allow Evidence of Victim's Prior Arrest — Evidence of Charges Rather Than Conviction as Prejudicial: Defendant convicted of aggravated assault contended that it was error for the trial court to refuse the introduction of evidence regarding the victim's prior arrest for aggravated assault. The danger of unfair prejudice to the state clearly outweighed the probative value of the evidence, given that the evidence concerned only charges, not a conviction, and that the charges were 2 years old at the time of trial. St. v. Benton, 251 M 401, 825 P2d 565, 49 St. Rep. 95 (1992), followed in St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994).

Photos of Beating Victim and Crime Scene Admissible: The balancing of probative value against unfair prejudice is a matter for the discretion of the trial court. The trial court did not abuse its discretion when it admitted 12 of 34 photographs depicting the victim's injuries and the crime scene. St. v. Devlin, 251 M 278, 825 P2d 185, 48 St. Rep. 1093 (1991).

Necessity of Defendant's Statement to Explain Focus of Criminal Investigation: Defendant initially claimed he was not present at the crime scene. After being told by the police that they were investigating physical evidence found at the scene, defendant stated that he had been at the scene the day before the crime. Introduction of his statement was necessary after cross-examination to explain why the police focused their examination solely on defendant. The statement was therefore relevant and nonprejudicial in light of a cautionary instruction to the jury regarding defendant's conduct at the scene. St. v. Hall, 244 M 161, 797 P2d 183, 47 St. Rep. 1501 (1990).

Expert's Testimony Regarding Defendant's Statements Inadmissible: The defendant desired to have his psychiatric expert testify as to the defendant's statements to him describing the events surrounding the alleged crime. The Supreme Court held that the statements were properly excluded because the defendant's testimony was not reliable enough to overcome the possible prejudicial effect of the evidence. St. v. Van Dyken, 242 M 415, 791 P2d 1350, 47 St. Rep. 835 (1990).

No Claim of Prejudice by Party Allowed for Admission of Evidence He Introduced: Prior to trial, the plaintiff made a motion in limine to exclude evidence of certain prior conduct on his part. The Supreme Court held that he could not argue that he had been prejudiced by the admission of the evidence because during the trial he had introduced most of the evidence himself. Smith v. Roosevelt County, 242 M 27, 788 P2d 337, 47 St. Rep. 506 (1990).

Evidence of Victim's Drug Use Excluded in Product Liability Case: In a product liability case, the District Court properly excluded evidence of the victim's alleged habitual drug use that was offered on the issues of his life expectancy and assumption of risk. The evidence was speculative at best and was of such a highly prejudicial nature in comparison to its probative value that its admission could constitute error. Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989).

Admissibility Within Discretion of Trial Judge: The determination of whether relevant evidence may be excluded is within the discretion of the trial judge and will not be disturbed unless there is a manifest abuse of discretion. The judge did not abuse his discretion by granting a new trial on the grounds that admission of certain evidence prejudiced defendant. Zeke's Distrib. Co. v. Brown-Forman Corp., 239 M 272, 779 P2d 908, 46 St. Rep. 1678 (1989), followed in Hansen v. Hansen, 254 M 152, 835 P2d 748, 49 St. Rep. 677 (1992), Waller v. Hayden, 268 M 204, 885 P2d 1305, 51 St. Rep. 1291 (1994), and Houdashelt v. Lutes, 282 M 435, 938 P2d 665, 54 St. Rep. 420 (1997). See also Simmons Oil Corp. v. Wells Fargo Bank, N.A., 1998 MT 129, 289 M 119, 960 P2d 291, 55 St. Rep. 508 (1998), and St. v. Hicks, 2013 MT 50, 369 Mont. 165, 296 P.3d 1149.

Communications to Parole Officer Not Privileged: After his arrest for burglary, the defendant called his parole officer and told him of the crime. The defendant's motion to suppress the parole officer's testimony was denied on the basis that the parole officer was not an elected officer or director and therefore communications made to him were not subject to a statutory privilege. The Supreme Court also held that the probative value of the evidence outweighed the relatively slight prejudicial impact the evidence carried in showing the jury that the defendant had been convicted of a prior crime. St. v. Higareda, 238 M 130, 777 P2d 302, 46 St. Rep. 1146 (1989), followed in St. v. Thompson, 263 M 17, 865 P2d 1125, 50 St. Rep. 1683 (1993), in which the prejudicial effect of defendant's voluntary statement that First Amendment allowed stepdaughter's punishment was outweighed by its probative value.

Secondhand Nature of Testimony: The trial court excluded testimony on grounds that its secondhand nature would mislead and confuse the jury and result in unfair prejudice. The Supreme Court reversed, stating that exclusion for confusion is an "extreme measure" not properly used unless the evidential material is thoroughly objectionable or of minor utility. Phillip R. Morrow, Inc. v. FBS Ins. Mont.-Hoiness Labar, Inc., 236 M 394, 770 P2d 859, 46 St. Rep. 455 (1989).

Photograph of Forest Fire Scene Conflicting With Other Evidence — Weight of Evidence: In an action against the state for negligence in suppressing a forest fire that later flared up, a photograph of the fire area before the flare-up was admitted into evidence. The photograph showed no smoke even though that conflicted with radio logs; if taken from another angle, it may have shown smoke. The court ruled that it was not error to admit the photograph because such matters affect the weight accorded the photograph and do not make the photo so lack probity or so inaccurate that it is prejudicial. Jacobsen v. St., 236 M 91, 769 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 207 (1989).

Use of Map Representing Forest Fires — Action Against State for Negligence in Forest Fire Suppression: In an action against the state for negligence in suppressing a forest fire, a state map, marked to represent the fires burning during the times involved, was used in evidence. The accuracy of the map was not disputed, but it showed a larger area than was required by the scope of the issues in this case. The court ruled that use of the map did not have a prejudicial effect that outweighed its probative effect. The map was relevant and was not so lacking in probity to be solely for the purpose of drawing the jury's attention from the main issues. Jacobsen v. St., 236 M 91, 769 P2d 694, 46 St. Rep. 207 (1989).

Claim for Emotional Distress — Evidence of Plaintiffs' Net Worth Permissible: The District Court did not abuse its discretion by allowing evidence of plaintiffs' net worth to show the effect of a financial loss on plaintiffs' state of mind where plaintiffs sought considerable damages for emotional distress. Ahmann v. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n, 235 M 184, 766 P2d 853, 45 St. Rep. 2305 (1988).

Evidence Offered to Rebut Presumption of Good Faith Improperly Excluded: The trial court instructed the jury that an employee's good faith must be presumed and that the presumption could only be rebutted by proof of bad faith. The court then excluded the very evidence offered by the employer to rebut that presumption. The probative value of the evidence outweighed any prejudice to the employee because of the reciprocal nature of the covenant of good faith and fair dealing. The employer was entitled to have the jury consider all evidence probative on the issues, not just evidence favoring the employee, and exclusion of such evidence was improper. Barrett v. ASARCO Inc., 234 M 229, 763 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 1865 (1988).

Accomplice Testimony Not Unduly Prejudicial: The testimony of accomplices that they had previously pleaded guilty to charges arising out of the incident with which appellant was charged was not unduly prejudicial. Although the general rule is that evidence of a codefendant's guilty plea is inadmissible, there is an exception where the codefendant takes the witness stand. In that situation, such evidence is admissible to aid the jury in assessing the codefendant's credibility. St. v. Price, 234 M 144, 762 P2d 232, 45 St. Rep. 1798 (1988).

Evidence of Flight Properly Admitted: An instruction allowing the jury to infer a consciousness of guilt from evidence of defendant's failure to appear at his first trial, where jury had the opportunity to hear defendant's explanation for his nonappearance, is not so prejudicial as to be barred by this rule. St. v. Burk, 234 M 119, 761 P2d 825, 45 St. Rep. 1777 (1988). See also St. v. Campbell, 241 M 323, 787 P2d 329, 47 St. Rep. 321 (1990).

Exclusion of Evidence of Victim's Later Crimes Proper — Balance of Prejudice and Probative Value: The District Court properly excluded evidence, under Rules 608 and 609, M.R.Ev., of pending or resolved criminal charges against the victim of an assault unless the state alluded to the victim's good character, truthfulness, or veracity. As noted in Cooper v. Rosston, 232 M 186, 756 P2d 1125, 45 St. Rep. 978 (1988), evidence bearing on the issue of the credibility of a witness, in order to be admissible, must be more probative than prejudicial, and the District Court must balance prejudice and probative value pursuant to Rules 401 and 403, M.R.Ev. St. v. Hammer, 233 M 101, 759 P2d 979, 45 St. Rep. 1326 (1988), followed in St. v. Kowalski, 252 M 166, 827 P2d 1253, 49 St. Rep. 197 (1992).

Evidence Unrelated to Claim as Prejudicial — Mistrial Motion Improperly Denied: Plaintiff's testimony in a trial to recover damages for a partial crop loss included emotional testimony about the loss of his wife, who died during preparation of the case for trial. There was no claim that her death was caused in any way by defendants. It was improper for the trial court to deny a defense motion for a mistrial based on relevance and prejudice. Gurnsey v. Conklin Co., Inc., 230 M 42, 751 P2d 151, 45 St. Rep. 1 (1988).

Probative Value of Evidence of Insurance Status Outweighed by Potential Prejudice: Evidence of a party's insured status is generally inadmissible in Montana tort actions because of the prejudicial potential of such evidence. A statement with regard to insurance determined to be a minor part, at best, of a claim of fraud or misrepresentation was directed to be excluded on retrial. Gurnsey v. Conklin Co., Inc., 230 M 42, 751 P2d 151, 45 St. Rep. 1 (1988).

Attorney's Voluntary Disclosure of Confidential Statements — No Waiver of Attorney-Client Privilege: Defendant's court-appointed attorney called himself to the stand to testify about defendant's inconsistent statements. Based on the District Court's acceptance of the testimony, the Supreme Court found the following factors prejudiced defendant's right to a fair trial: (1) the attorney's testimony of defendant's statements was extremely prejudicial and had limited probative value; (2) the state presented no evidence that defendant intended to waive his right not to divulge this privileged information; and (3) given defendant's unfamiliarity with courtroom procedure, defendant's right against self-incrimination need not be surrendered in order to assert a statutory right. Conviction was reversed. St. v. Statczar, 228 M 446, 743 P2d 606, 44 St. Rep. 1668 (1987).

Admissibility of Photographs of Objects Having Probative Value: Photographs of objects having probative value forming circumstantial evidence from which to infer that defendant was perpetrator of a homicide and to infer a motive from evidence of his interest in violent sex were properly admitted into evidence. Defendant's contention that, even if relevant, the prejudicial effect of the items outweighed any probative value was rejected by the court, which noted that the state used photographs of the objects rather than the objects themselves, the latter of which may have had even greater potential for prejudice. St. v. Pease, 222 M 455, 724 P2d 153, 43 St. Rep. 1417 (1986).

Tort Action — Admitted Use of Drugs Before Traffic Accident — Motion In Limine to Exclude Unless Foundation Established: Plaintiff admitted certain use of illegal drugs before the traffic accident, but it was not error for the District Court to grant a motion in limine excluding such evidence from the trial unless a foundation could be established showing that at the time of the accident he was under the influence and that his negligence was the proximate or controlling cause of injuries. Because evidence of drugs is very prejudicial, such conditional exclusion requires some link between it and the accident and a weighing of its probative value against its prejudicial effect. Simonson v. White, 220 M 14, 713 P2d 983, 43 St. Rep. 133 (1986).

Medical Malpractice — Not Error to Permit Highlighted Medical Records and Photographs in Jury Room: In a medical malpractice action in which appellant claimed that negligent medical treatment of his ingrown toenail caused the necessity for amputation of his leg, it was not error for the trial judge to permit the jury to have, during its deliberations, highlighted copies of appellant's medical records and photographs of his leg. Kyriss v. St., 218 M 162, 707 P2d 5, 42 St. Rep. 1487 (1985).

Evidence Relevant — Inadmissible as Unfair Prejudice: In a tort action, on the issue of the causation of damages, the trial court abused its discretion in allowing testimony concerning the plaintiff's home environment and whether her father's alleged drinking and fighting caused her symptoms rather than an earlier vehicular accident. The questioned testimony had a tendency to make the alleged cause of the symptoms more or less probable than it would have been without the testimony. The testimony therefore was relevant but not admissible as its probative value was substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Kimes v. Herrin, 217 M 330, 705 P2d 108, 42 St. Rep. 1231 (1985), followed in Newville v. St., 267 M 237, 883 P2d 793, 51 St. Rep. 758 (1994), Werre v. David, 275 M 376, 913 P2d 625, 53 St. Rep. 187 (1996), and Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004). However, see Peterson-Tuell v. First Student Transp., LLC, 2014 MT 307, 377 Mont. 113, 339 P.3d 16, in which the court ruled that testimony referencing sexual abuse suffered by the plaintiff's daughter was both relevant and admissible on the issue of causation of her injuries from a car accident.

Vague Testimony of Driver and Vehicle Remote From Scene of Accident — Prejudicial — Foundation Lacking: In a trial arising from an intersection collision between plaintiff's motorcycle and defendant's auto, testimony of defendant's proposed witness was properly excluded as having prejudicial effect outweighing any probative value. He would have testified regarding a motorcyclist he saw while closing his shop. He could not positively identify plaintiff as the motorcyclist, and his description of the cycle and its driver varied from that of other witnesses and from the actual cycle and driver. His view occurred 300 yards from the accident. He was vague as to the time. Other cycles could have passed him by unobserved. His testimony characterized the driver as a stereotypical biker driving fast. The testimony also lacked a sufficient foundation, because there was insufficient connection between the driver witness saw and plaintiff. Wenel v. Hall, 215 M 78, 694 P2d 1346, 42 St. Rep. 195 (1985).

Admission of Drug Paraphernalia Found in Accident Victim's Car — Prejudicial Effect Outweighed by Probative Value: In a case involving negligence in an automobile accident, the prejudicial effect of allowing the introduction of drug paraphernalia found in the car in which the accident victim had been riding was outweighed by its probative value. Testimony of the driver and victim was that they had not smoked marijuana on the day of the accident, but because the vehicle had been owned only a short time, the existence of the paraphernalia would tend to show that the driver actively consumed marijuana within a few days of the accident, thus tending to impeach the testimony. Foreman v. Minnie, 211 M 441, 689 P2d 1210, 41 St. Rep. 1478 (1984).

Admissibility of Serologist Testimony: D.K. was forcibly raped at knife point in her home in Butte. After the rape, D.K. called the police, who took D.K. to the hospital where staff acquired pubic hair and blood samples and took vaginal swabs to secure semen samples. The samples were tested by a serologist. At trial, the serologist testified as to blood types, PGM subtypes, and "H" factors present in secreted body fluids. Defendant contended that the testimony was more prejudicial than probative and should have been excluded. Defendant relied on People v. Robinson, 27 NY 2d 864, 265 NE 2d 543 (1970), where the court concluded that evidence of blood type was not probative in view of the large portion of the general population having the same blood type. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that evidence of blood type, secretor status, and PGM subtype correlates with the significantly smaller population of Silver Bow County. The court also found, as in Robinson, that there was other independent evidence of defendant's guilt. The court found the evidence admissible. St. v. Bauer, 210 M 298, 683 P2d 946, 41 St. Rep. 1066 (1984).

Photos of Persons Hit by Auto — Probative Value Outweighed Inflammatory Nature in Homicide Case: Photographs of place at which defendant purposely hit and killed two bicycle riders with auto he was driving were testified to by police officers who did not take or direct the taking of the photos but who came to the scene and investigated a very short time after the victims were hit. They testified that the photos depicted the scene as they remembered it. The photos were properly admitted in evidence. The probative value of a color photo of one victim was not outweighed by its allegedly inflammatory nature, and the photo was admissible since it lent credence to testimony of a witness that death was caused from injuries received when victim was struck by the auto. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Prior Compromise Settlements Properly Excluded: Plaintiff injured his back when the seat in the locomotive he was operating broke and threw him backward. Plaintiff had had two prior back injuries that had been successfully treated. The District Court excluded evidence relating to plaintiff's previous settlement of claims with defendant. Defendant contended that since the jury heard evidence regarding the previous injuries, it should have been informed of the settlements. The Supreme Court held that compromise settlements for previous injuries do not necessarily reflect the seriousness of the injuries and may confuse the jury. Any probative value was outweighed by possible prejudice. Callihan v. Burlington N., Inc., 201 M 350, 654 P2d 972, 39 St. Rep. 2158 (1982).

Admissibility of Tape of Call to Police by Witness to Shooting — Probative Value: Defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide of his brother. At the trial, a tape recording of a call made by defendant's sister to the police after the shooting was admitted into evidence. Defendant can be heard in the background shouting obscenities and shooting. The Supreme Court refused to reverse the District Court's discretionary decision to allow the tape to be admitted, reasoning that although the tape was inflammatory, it had probative value with respect to the credibility of witnesses who were present at the shooting and its probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect. St. v. Johns, 201 M 192, 653 P2d 494, 39 St. Rep. 2049 (1982).

Photographs at Victim's Autopsy: Defendant objected to admission of photographs of victim's body. The court found that the pictures accurately represented victim's appearance at the autopsy and were reasonably necessary to depict the multiplicity and the extent of the injuries, how they were caused, and their age. The pictures taken at the autopsy definitely related to the charges against defendant and were properly admitted. St. v. Riley, 199 M 413, 649 P2d 1273, 39 St. Rep. 1491 (1982), followed in St. v. Doll, 214 M 390, 692 P2d 473, 42 St. Rep. 40 (1985).

Habitual Traffic Offender — Proper Foundation Required: In an action arising out of an automobile accident, the District Court advised counsel for the plaintiff that testimony regarding defendant's bad driving record would not be admitted unless a foundation was laid establishing a clear connection between defendant operating his vehicle as an unlicensed habitual traffic offender and plaintiff's injuries. No such foundation was laid, and the evidence was not admitted. This ruling was proper since the evidence was highly prejudicial and was relevant only to an issue of competency and could not be used to prove any specific act of negligence at issue in the case. It was error to grant a new trial on the basis that this evidence was excluded. Nelson v. Hartman, 199 M 295, 648 P2d 1176, 39 St. Rep. 1409 (1982).

Objection by Party Not Prejudiced: While making a left turn, the plaintiff's car was struck by a passing vehicle. The plaintiff testified that several miles before the accident he had seen the passing vehicle parked alongside the road with its occupants relieving themselves. The plaintiff could not later claim that the probative value of this testimony was outweighed by its prejudicial effect, because the testimony was not prejudicial to the plaintiff. Goodnough v. St., 199 M 9, 647 P2d 364, 39 St. Rep. 1170 (1982).

Beating Death — Color Photographs of Autopsy: A doctor testified that color photographs of an autopsy of a child, the victim of a beating death, accurately represented the victim's appearance at the autopsy and were reasonably necessary to depict the multiplicity and extent of the injuries, how they were caused, and their age. Because the probative value of the photographs outweighed their prejudicial effect, they were properly admitted into evidence. St. v. Powers, 198 M 289, 645 P2d 1357, 39 St. Rep. 989 (1982).

Admissibility of Photographs — Probative Value Versus Prejudice: Once the relevance of a photograph is established, the fact that it may be inflammatory should not render it inadmissible any more than inflammatory word descriptions should render testimony inadmissible, so long as the purpose is probative and the true facts and conditions are described. The trial judge, in his discretion, must determine whether the probative value is outweighed by potential prejudice. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982), cited in St. v. Grant, 221 M 122, 717 P2d 562, 43 St. Rep. 685 (1986). See also St. v. Beavers, 1999 MT 260, 296 M 340, 987 P2d 371, 56 St. Rep. 1035 (1999); Barnes v. United Indus., Inc., 275 M 25, 909 P2d 700, 53 St. Rep. 17 (1996); St. v. Cox, 266 M 110, 879 P2d 662, 51 St. Rep. 680 (1994); St. v. Turner, 265 M 337, 877 P2d 978, 51 St. Rep. 467 (1994); St. v. Gollehon, 262 M 293, 864 P2d 1257, 50 St. Rep. 1564 (1993); St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992); St. v. Kills On Top, 243 M 56, 793 P2d 1273, 47 St. Rep. 984 (1990); St. v. Henry, 241 M 524, 788 P2d 316, 47 St. Rep. 476 (1990); Lindberg v. Leatham Bros., Inc., 215 M 11, 693 P2d 1234, 42 St. Rep. 137 (1985); St. v. Sigler, 210 M 248, 688 P2d 749, 41 St. Rep. 1039 (1984); and St. v. Hoffman, 196 M 268, 639 P2d 507, 39 St. Rep. 29 (1982).

Testimony That Defendant Smoked Marijuana With County Attorney — Other Offense — Inadmissible: The State moved to exclude defendant's testimony that he had smoked marijuana with the County Attorney the night before the offense (deliberate homicide and obstructing justice). The trial court in excluding the offered evidence reasoned that it was not relevant, or if relevant, that its probative value was outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. St. v. Beachman, 189 M 400, 616 P2d 337, 37 St. Rep. 1558 (1980).

Threat to Kill Witness — Probative Value Not Outweighed by Prejudicial Effect: The plaintiff allegedly assaulted and threatened to kill a witness if he did not testify favorably to the plaintiff's case. Testimony concerning the assault was admitted to show that the witness had a motive to testify falsely over the objection that it was prejudicial. The Supreme Court found that the facts testified to by the witness were crucial to the issues of the case and therefore the witness' credibility was important. The prejudicial effect of the assault evidence did not substantially outweigh its probative value. Cissel v. W. Plumbing & Heating, 188 M 149, 612 P2d 206, 37 St. Rep. 966 (1980).

Evidence of Other Sex Crimes — Prejudice to the Defendant: There is inherent prejudice in showing a defendant has committed a prior sex offense, and when the acts involved were not sufficiently similar and occurred 2½ years apart, the prejudicial effect of introduction of evidence of the first act substantially outweighed its probative value. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980), explained in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986).

Admissibility of Photographs: Photographs are admissible for the purpose of explaining and applying the evidence and assisting the court and the jury in understanding the case. When the purpose of an exhibit is to inflame the minds of the jury or excite the feelings rather than to enlighten the jury as to any fact, it should be excluded. Photographs that were used by the pathologist to show body creases which indicated how long the body had been at the site where it was found and photographs that showed the nature of the wounds and explained the evidence that formed the basis of the pathologist's opinion of the size and configuration of the weapon that inflicted the wounds were relevant, useful, and necessary in explaining the evidence and assisting the trial court and the jury in understanding the case. They were properly admitted, as was a photograph of a can of paint in the defendant's possession. In upholding the admission of the photograph, the Montana Supreme Court held that any prejudicial implication of flight, which might have arisen because the can was photographed in a suitcase, could be rebutted easily. St. v. McKenzie, 186 M 481, 608 P2d 428, 37 St. Rep. 325 (1980).

Gruesome Photographs — Error: Defendant contends that photographs of murder victims were gruesome, inflammatory, and unduly prejudicial and that they should not have been introduced at trial. The photographs were introduced in identifying the victims, demonstrating the position of the bodies, and establishing the cause of death. This could have been done without the use of the photographs, which makes their probative value low. The introduction of the photographs was error, and as a result the defendant is entitled to a new trial. St. v. Allies, 186 M 99, 606 P2d 1043 (1979).

Exclusion of Photographic Evidence: A District Court does not abuse its discretion in excluding photographs that are calculated to arouse the sympathies of the jury, particularly if they are not substantially necessary or instructive to show material facts or conditions. St. v. Azure, 181 M 47, 591 P2d 1125, 36 St. Rep. 514 (1979).

Assault by Defendant Fleeing Another Crime: A patrolman's testimony that he was assaulted by the defendant who resisted arrest after fleeing from the alleged crime of aggravated assault was properly admitted in evidence because it was probative of defendant's state of mind and outweighed possible unfair prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Gone, 179 M 271, 587 P2d 1291, 35 St. Rep. 1540 (1978).

Tape of Rape Victim's Call for Assistance Inadmissible: A tape recording by the police of the victim's telephone call for assistance immediately following a rape incident should not have been admitted in evidence and played to the jury because the probative value of the tape was substantially outweighed by its unfair prejudicial effect. The admission of the tape and playing it to the jury were reversible error. St. v. Pendergrass, 179 M 106, 586 P2d 691, 35 St. Rep. 1512 (1978).

Proof of Alleged Collateral Crime — Prejudicial: The probative value, if any, of the challenged testimony was clearly outweighed by its unfair prejudice. The testimony that defendant appeared intoxicated on amphetamines was remote and cumulative and tended to confuse the issues by alleging a collateral crime with which defendant was not charged. Although this rule was not then effective, the court discussed the rule and current law and concluded that such testimony should have been excluded and failure to do so was an abuse of discretion constituting reversible error. St. v. Zimmerman, 175 M 179, 573 P2d 174 (1977).

Motion In Limine Appropriate to Exclude Evidence: A motion in limine may be used to exclude evidence that, even if relevant, has probative value substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Wallin v. Kinyon Estate, 164 M 160, 519 P2d 1236 (1974). See also St. v. Lias, 218 M 124, 706 P2d 500, 42 St. Rep. 1453 (1985).

OTHER CRIMES

Bifurcation of Trial for Aggravated DUI — Appropriate When Aggravating Factor Is Prior DUIs: The defendant in a trial for aggravated DUI had two prior DUI convictions. She requested that the trial be bifurcated so that if the jury found her guilty of driving under the influence of alcohol in the particular instance at issue in the first phase of trial, then the state could introduce evidence of her prior convictions in the second phase of trial. The Justice Court denied the request and allowed the state to discuss the prior DUIs in the opening and closing statements and during testimony. The District Court affirmed the Justice Court's decision. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded, concluding that the introduction of the prior convictions was inherently prejudicial under Rules 403, 404(b), and 609, M.R.Ev. Because the aggravated DUI statute requires the commission of a "standard" DUI plus the existence of an aggravating factor, the Supreme Court found that bifurcation was a solution that would both remove unfair prejudice from the defendant and allow the state to present each element of the defense to the jury. St. v. Holland, 2019 MT 128, 396 Mont. 94, 443 P.3d 519.

Deceptive Practices — Proper Introduction of Evidence of Prior Convictions to Show Lack of Mistake and Intent to Deceive: The defendant was charged with felony deceptive practices for cashing several thousand dollars in dishonored checks. At trial, the prosecution introduced evidence of the defendant's two prior convictions for fraudulent deceptive practices over her objection. She argued that the evidence did not show that she knew she had acted fraudulently or deceptively; however, the state successfully maintained that the evidence demonstrated her history of victimization. Following her conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing evidence of her prior convictions. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that evidence of her prior convictions was relevant to knowledge, intent, and absence of mistake under Rule 401, M.R.Ev. St. v. Reopelle, 2017 MT 196, 388 Mont. 271, 399 P.3d 903.

Evidence of Prior Convictions — Aggravated DUI — No Unlawful Prejudice at Trial: Evidence of a prior DUI conviction in an aggravated DUI proceeding is a substantive requirement that the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt to secure a conviction, rather than a recidivism element used as a sentencing consideration. Therefore, although it was prejudicial, the defendant's driving record indicating his prior DUI convictions was not erroneously admitted at trial because it was proof of a statutory element of the offense. St. v. Meyer, 2017 MT 124, 387 Mont. 422, 396 P.3d 1265, distinguished in St. v. Holland, 2019 MT 128, 396 Mont. 94, 443 P.3d 519, in which the introduction of prior DUI convictions was found unduly prejudicial. However, see St. v. Zimmerman, 2018 MT 94, 391 Mont. 210, 417 P.3d 289, distinguishing Meyer when a defendant stipulates to his prior DUI convictions as an element of the offense and holding that the District Court erred by admitting evidence of prior DUI convictions to establish the offense of aggravated DUI under those circumstances.

No Requirement That All Uncharged Acts Be Similar or Near In Time to Charged Act: When a defendant raises a Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., objection, the court should analyze whether the evidence is relevant for a purpose that does not involve drawing an impermissible inference of action in conformity with a trait of character. St. v. 18th Judicial District Court, 2010 MT 263, 358 Mont. 325, 246 P.3d 415.

Evidence of Other Crimes Properly Admitted for Impeachment Despite Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence of Prior Crimes — Failure of Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel for Lack of Objection to Properly Admitted Evidence: Prior to trial, the Justice's Court granted defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence of prior crimes or wrongs. However, on direct examination, the complaining witness stated that defendant had never been physical with her before, so the state moved to allow impeachment of the witness by asking questions relating to a prior conviction of defendant for assaulting the same victim. Defendant's counsel did not object, the motion was granted, and evidence of the prior assault was allowed. Following conviction, defendant appealed on grounds that the evidence was improperly admitted and that defense counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the prior crimes evidence. The District Court held that defendant's reliance on the motion in limine did not preserve the issue for appeal and that the evidence was properly admitted for impeachment purposes. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The trial court acted within its discretion and did not act arbitrarily without conscientious judgment or exceed the bounds of reason by allowing evidence of defendant's prior conviction for impeachment purposes, and defense counsel could not be considered ineffective for failing to object to properly admitted evidence. St. v. Parker, 2007 MT 243, 339 M 211, 169 P3d 380 (2007).

Facts Regarding Defendant's Prison Incarceration and Probationary Status Properly Admitted as Inextricably Linked to Circumstances Surrounding Incest Charge: At Bauer's incest trial, the District Court barred mention by the prosecution of Bauer's two prior felony convictions, but did rule that the fact of Bauer's lengthy prior prison incarceration and status as a probationer at the time of the incest were admissible as part of the transaction. Bauer contended on appeal that the incarceration and probation information were highly prejudicial and constituted evidence of other crimes that should have been admitted only after the appropriate notice under the Just rules. The state cited the transaction rule in 26-1-103, which provides that when a declaration, act, or omission forms part of a transaction that is itself the fact in dispute or evidence of that fact, then the declaration, act, or omission is admissible as part of the transaction. The Supreme Court agreed with the state. In order for the jury to understand the context of the alleged incest, the victim needed to explain that she had not known or seen her father because he had been incarcerated since she was a small child. Thus, the District Court acted conscientiously and within the bounds of reason in allowing the facts of Bauer's prison incarceration and probationary status into evidence. St. v. Bauer, 2002 MT 7, 308 M 99, 39 P3d 689 (2002).

Introduction of Evidence of Acts Not Referred to in Pretrial Order — Not Grounds for New Trial: As a result of a dispute, the relationship between neighbors Lopez, Monroe, and Josephson deteriorated until assault charges were filed against Josephson. The operative contentions in the pretrial order were that Josephson assaulted Lopez by pointing a firearm at Lopez's face and assaulted Monroe verbally and fired a weapon toward Monroe's property. The District Court found it impossible to determine from the allegations the dates, times, and places that the alleged assaults took place, but the court concluded that the pretrial order nevertheless placed Josephson on notice that he was being accused of assault on multiple occasions over an unspecified period of time. Josephson moved for a new trial on grounds that plaintiffs were improperly allowed to introduce evidence of acts not referred to in the pretrial order, evidence of bad character, and evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts. However, because Josephson waited until the day of trial to clarify which assaults formed the basis of the case against him, rather than using available pretrial motions and rules of discovery, the District Court was not found to have abused its discretion in giving plaintiffs latitude in their proof of the various assaults at trial, including allowing evidence of bad character to impeach Josephson's testimony. The District Court did properly preclude evidence of assaults by Josephson on nonparty persons. Lopez v. Josephson, 2001 MT 133, 305 M 446, 30 P3d 326 (2001).

No Prejudice From Use of Inadmissible, but Simple and Distinct, Evidence: Southern was charged with two counts of kidnapping, one count of burglary, one count of theft, and five counts of sexual intercourse without consent. In moving to sever the nine counts in the information into four separate trials pursuant to 46-13-211, Southern argued that the prejudicial effect of the other crimes evidence substantially outweighed its probative value and thus evidence of the other crimes would not have been admissible in separate trials. It is inevitable that evidence of other crimes will have some prejudicial effect, so under the fourth part of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)), relevant evidence will be inadmissible only when its probity is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Pursuant to St. v. Huether, 284 M 259, 943 P2d 1291, 54 St. Rep. 872 (1997), the prejudicial effect of relevant evidence will substantially outweigh the probative value when the evidence will prompt the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Thus, evidence is inadmissible under the fourth part of the modified Just rule if it arouses the jury's sympathy for one side without regard to its probative value, if it confuses or misleads the jury, or if it distracts the jury from the main issues in the case. Prejudice arising from the use of inadmissible evidence will not be found when the evidence is simple and distinct. Even though the other crimes evidence in Southern's case would have been prejudicial, the jury was instructed that each count was a distinct offense and had to be decided separately. There was nothing in the record to suggest that the jury did not keep the relevant evidence separate. Since the other crimes evidence was simple and distinct and would have been admissible at separate trials, Southern failed to establish that the jury used evidence of guilt on one charge to convict him of other charges on the theory that the evidence would have been inadmissible in trials on the other charges. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999).

Pending Criminal Charges Inadmissible: Clews sued Montana Mining Properties, Inc. (MMPI), for failure to pay him for his consulting services. MMPI argued that the lower court erred in not admitting evidence of pending stock fraud charges in England against Clews and another company principal that were related to the mining project involving Clews and MMPI. The Supreme Court held that evidence of the charges was not probative of the relationship that existed between Clews and the other company principal, that charges do not prove anything, and that therefore their prejudicial value exceeded any probative value. C. Haydon Ltd. v. Mont. Min. Properties, Inc., 286 M 138, 951 P2d 46, 54 St. Rep. 1341 (1997).

Sexual Assault — Evidence of Previous Crimes:

The District Court did not err in admitting evidence that Brooks had previously committed a similar sexual assault upon a youth under similar circumstances (while playing with a youth in the water) because all of the criteria required in St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991), had been met. St. v. Brooks, 260 M 79, 857 P2d 734, 50 St. Rep. 967 (1993).

The District Court did not commit a reversible error by not excluding testimony relating to other incidents of sexual assault. The court had granted a motion to suppress testimony by the minors involved in the other incidents, but the judge specifically restricted his ruling to testimony by, as opposed to testimony relating to, the minors, and the defense attorney did not object. Further, he did not object at the trial when the testimony of the prosecutrix relating to statements made by the defendant was introduced. The testimony was relevant not to prove the occurrence of the incidents but to prove the intent of the accused. The testimony was of sufficient probative value to outweigh any possible prejudicial effect of its introduction. St. v. Patton, 183 M 417, 600 P2d 194, 36 St. Rep. 1731 (1979).

Evidence of Similar Rape Introduced to Prove Identity of Assailant: K.B. was raped by an unknown assailant after she awoke to find the assailant lying next to her on her bed. At trial, the District Court allowed the state to introduce evidence of another rape in a nearby town, in which the victim had found her assailant, identified as the defendant, sitting next to her on her bed when she awoke. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was properly allowed under Rule 404(b) and this rule because it fit within the exception to establish identity and because its probative value was not outweighed by its prejudicial effect. St. v. Kordonowy, 251 M 45, 823 P2d 854, 48 St. Rep. 1148 (1991).

Admission of Evidence of Prior Fires — Improperly Introduced: Defendants were prosecuted and found guilty of criminal mischief in relation to a fire that destroyed their mobile home. At the trial, there was no direct evidence linking defendants with intentionally causing the fire. The state was allowed to introduce evidence of several other fires in buildings owned or occupied by defendants in the previous 7 years. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded on the grounds that the admittance of evidence of the prior fires unfairly prejudiced defendants because no evidence existed that linked them with intentionally causing the prior fires. The prior fires are not other crimes, wrongs, or acts under this rule. St. v. Johnson, 250 M 496, 821 P2d 1039, 48 St. Rep. 1063 (1991), followed in St. v. Enright, 1998 MT 322, 292 M 204, 974 P2d 1118, 55 St. Rep. 1308 (1998), and St. v. Link, 1999 MT 4, 293 M 23, 974 P2d 1124, 56 St. Rep. 13 (1999).

Prior Crimes or Acts — Modified Just Rule: The following basis must be used to determine the admissibility of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts: (1) the other crimes, wrongs, or acts must be similar; (2) the other crimes, wrongs, or acts may not be remote in time; (3) the evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity with such character; but it may be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, or identity or absence of mistake or accident; and (4) although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading of the jury, considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52, 48 St. Rep. 614 (1991), followed in St. v. Brooks, 260 M 79, 857 P2d 734, 50 St. Rep. 967 (1993), St. v. Romero, 261 M 221, 861 P2d 929, 50 St. Rep. 1296 (1993), and St. v. Henderson, 278 M 376, 925 P2d 475, 53 St. Rep. 958 (1996).

Prior Crimes Introduced to Prove Element of Witness Tampering: The defendant was charged with domestic abuse and witness tampering for attempting to coerce his girlfriend not to testify against him on abuse charges. The Supreme Court ruled that the lower court properly admitted evidence of the abuse charge because the state had to prove that there was a pending action in order to prove all elements of witness tampering. St. v. Matt, 245 M 208, 799 P2d 1085, 47 St. Rep. 1988 (1990).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Admission of Prior Sexual Assault Conviction Upheld to Prove Defendant Acted Knowingly: In 1989, the defendant was charged with sexually assaulting his 15-year-old daughter. At trial, the defendant was convicted after evidence of a 1984 conviction of sexual assault upon the same daughter was admitted into evidence. On appeal, the state argued that admission of the 1984 conviction was appropriate to prove that the defendant acted knowingly because it showed the defendant's motive, intent, absence of mistake or accident, and knowledge. The Supreme Court examined the factors required by St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), balanced the probative value of the evidence against the possibility of prejudice, and concluded that evidence of the 1984 conviction was properly admitted by the District Court. St.

v. Medina, 245 M 25, 798 P2d 1032, 47 St. Rep. 1832 (1990), followed in St. v. Brooks, 260 M 79, 857 P2d 734, 50 St. Rep. 967 (1993).

Inadvertent Testimony — No “Just” Notice Required: A police officer testified to other crimes despite a prior agreement and without the required Just notice. The Supreme Court found that no Just notice was required because the County Attorney never intended to introduce evidence of other crimes and the testimony was an inadvertent and unintentional response to a nonsuggestive question. Any error was rendered harmless by the trial court’s cautionary jury instructions, and the motion for a new trial or mistrial was properly denied. St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987), followed in St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950, 46 St. Rep. 512 (1989), St. v. Long, 2005 MT 130, 327 M 238, 113 P3d 290 (2005), and St. v. Moree, 2010 MT 148, 357 Mont. 24, 235 P.3d 585.

Motion Granted to Exclude Evidence Not Specifically Named — Error to Introduce: As defendant was not notified of the state’s intention to introduce evidence of other crimes, the District Court properly granted defendant’s motion in limine to exclude all “evidence items allegedly taken by the defendant which are not specifically named in the informations”. Two items, which were the basis of the misdemeanor charges, were found in a package sent by defendant, along with other items that had no connection with the charges. During trial, despite its ruling, the court allowed the package and its entire contents into evidence. Failure by the court to adhere to its own ruling was an abuse of discretion, prejudicial and harmful to defendant, and constituted reversible error. St. v. Howell, 226 M 148, 734 P2d 214, 44 St. Rep. 542 (1987).

Impeachment — Permissible Scope of Cross-Examination: Defendant was charged with eight counts of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. Defendant, after conviction, appealed, contending he was improperly cross-examined on many separate, collateral crimes or wrongs that were irrelevant. In the alternative, he contended that even if relevant the prejudicial effect upon the jury outweighed probative value. The Supreme Court held that the proper scope of cross-examination is determined by the scope of the direct testimony. Defendant offered direct testimony about specific instances of past conduct. Cross-examination showing that defendant attempted to intimidate his wife went to the heart of the defense theory that the wife had coerced the children and perjured herself in order to frame defendant. The jury was required to resolve a contradiction between the testimony of the defendant and the victim. The cross-examination was no broader than was required to meet the bold assertions and admissions during the direct examination of the defendant. St. v. Clark, 209 M 473, 682 P2d 1339, 41 St. Rep. 833 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994).

Prejudice Stemming From Evidence Held Inadmissible as Irrelevant: In a tort action relating to the explosive failure of a Goodyear K-type split tire rim where the Supreme Court held inadmissible as irrelevant testimony regarding political bribery during Watergate by the defendant Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, the failure of the trial court to exclude such evidence was prejudicial to the defendant and permitted the jury to indulge in improper speculation and guesswork. Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 207 M 37, 673 P2d 1208, 40 St. Rep. 1861 (1983).

Other Similar Conduct of Witness — Impeachment: At trial of defendant convicted of aggravated assault arising from fight outside a bar, it was reversible error for the court to allow the prosecutor to interrogate one of defendant’s witnesses as to past instances of misconduct of the witness at the bar, unconnected to the assault, for the purpose of impeaching the witness. St. v. White, 202 M 491, 658 P2d 1111, 40 St. Rep. 235 (1983).

Testimony on Previous Incarceration — No Showing of Contribution to Conviction — Overwhelming Evidence of Guilt: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, aggravated burglary, and attempted sexual intercourse without consent, contended that a mistrial should have been granted when a witness made reference to the fact that defendant had been in the state penitentiary. Defendant’s motion was denied, but the court struck the material from the record and gave the jury an instruction to ignore evidence stricken from the record. The Supreme Court, applying the test of whether there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction, therefore requiring reversal, held that there was no evidence defendant was denied a substantial right. There was no showing that the reference might have contributed to his conviction in the face of overwhelming evidence directly proving his guilt. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983).

Similar Break-Ins on Same Day Admissible: Defendant was charged with felony theft for stealing a pickup, burglary for a break-in at the Ulm Bar, burglary for a break-in at the Mountain Palace Bar, and theft of personal property from the Ulm Bar break-in. On the same day as these break-ins occurred, the Craig Bar was broken into and burglarized. The District Court denied defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence from similar crimes committed on the same date as those with which defendant was charged. Applying the four-part test set forth in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), on appeal the Supreme Court said that the evidence was admissible, that the proper procedure was followed as to the form and content of the notice, and that the jury was properly instructed. St. v. Van Natta, 200 M 312, 651 P2d 57, 39 St. Rep. 1771 (1982).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Remoteness: Evidence that defendant charged with sexual intercourse without consent had committed a similar act 2½ years before was too remote to fall within the exception to the general rule that evidence of other crimes is not admissible. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980), explained in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Sequence of Events Not Unusual: When the alleged similarities between crimes reveal nothing more than a sequence of events common in the crime charged, the acts are not unusual and distinctive enough to come within the purview of the exception allowing evidence of other crimes to be admitted. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980), explained in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986), and followed in St. v. Rogers, 1999 MT 305, 297 M 188, 992 P2d 229, 56 St. Rep. 1228 (1999).

Similarity of Acts of Intercourse Without Consent: Numerous rapes follow the pattern of barroom pickup, voluntary entry into defendant's vehicle by victim, driving to a remote area, advances, resistance, and forcible intercourse. The sequence of events has no distinctive qualities that distinguish the acts from other rapes as necessary to bring the events within the purview of the similarity element of the "other crimes" admission rule exception. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980), explained in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986), and followed in St. v. Rogers, 1999 MT 305, 297 M 188, 992 P2d 229, 56 St. Rep. 1228 (1999).

Admission of Evidence of Other Crime — Living Upon Earnings of Prostitute: The court did not err in rejecting defendant's contention that a mistrial should have been declared upon his testimony on cross-examination that he lived with and was supported by a female who was a prostitute. The evidence was introduced to show financial status, not that he acted in conformity with his character in committing the crime charged. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224, 36 St. Rep. 2328 (1979).

Other Crime — Prejudice — Limited Use of Evidence: Testimony concerning another crime in the chain of events with the crime of which the defendant is accused, when used for impeachment purposes, may be admissible in a proper case. Since a stipulation stating the nature of the crime committed and the disposition of other prosecutions stemming from the crime had been read to the jury and since the defendant did not carry his burden of affirmatively showing prejudice, this was such a case. St. v. Holliday, 183 M 251, 598 P2d 1132, 36 St. Rep. 1535 (1979).

COMMON SCHEME

Text Messages Properly Admitted — Evidence Showing Conspiracy Involving Defendant Properly Admitted Under Coconspirator Exception — Probative Value Outweighed Danger of Unfair Prejudice — Statements Against Interest and Statements by Party Opponent — Defendant's Jury Instruction Regarding Reasonable Doubt Properly Refused. St. v. Wienke, 2022 MT 116, 409 Mont. 52, 511 P.3d 990.

Common Scheme — Homicide Trial — Prior Similar Acts: In a homicide trial following the shooting of recently divorced ex-wife's boyfriend, ex-wife testified that defendant had often, during the period of from 1 to 3½ years prior to the homicide, pointed guns at her, held a knife to her throat, strangled her, and slapped her. That testimony was admissible under State's theory of prior acts showing a common scheme, plan, or design, i.e., the threat and possible carrying out of violence to intimidate her and those associated with her. The testimony met the tests of similarity to the act charged; nearness in time; and tendency to establish a common scheme, plan, or design. Probative value was not substantially outweighed by prejudice to defendant, and the State gave defendant notice of its intent to introduce the evidence and why. The judge's failure to admonish the jury that the testimony was admitted only for the State's stated purpose was not reversible error because defendant did not object to the failure. Once the State has given notice, the remaining procedures are mandatory only upon defendant's request and/or objection. He cannot consciously plant errors by remaining silent and then objecting on appeal. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Evidence of Much Greater Amount of Marijuana Than Defendant Charged With — Prejudice: County Sheriffs saw defendant place a garbage bag in his truck and drive away from residence that was under surveillance for suspicion of drug-related activity in house. The officers followed defendant, and although he eluded them briefly, they caught up with him and searched his vehicle. Since the officers did not find a garbage bag in the truck, they retraced the truck's route and discovered a garbage bag similar to the bag seen in defendant's possession earlier. The bag contained about 10 pounds of marijuana. Later the officers obtained a warrant to search the house and a vehicle parked in front of it. This search resulted in the seizure of 80 pounds of marijuana, scales for weighing it, and bags for packaging it. The occupant of the house was arrested. During defendant's trial, much evidence concerning the search of the residence was admitted under the state's theory that it was relevant to prove a common scheme or plan. The Supreme Court reversed defendant's conviction of possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell because of prosecutor's failure to comply with rule for determining admissibility of evidence of other crimes or evidence of a common scheme or plan. The court also stated that the evidence may have been inadmissible under this rule. St. v. Stemple, 198 M 409, 646 P2d 539, 39 St. Rep. 1085 (1982).

Common Scheme or Plan Evidence Admissible: Evidence presented by the prosecution concerning two television thefts by the defendants from two different motels introduced in order to link the defendants to a third theft from a third motel has probative value tending to prove common scheme and is not so inherently prejudicial that it is inadmissible and a denial of a fair trial to defendants. The evidence has the effect of helping to prove through circumstantial evidence the commission of the crime and the connection of the defendants with the common scheme. Prejudicial evidence is not always inadmissible evidence. St. v. Strain, 190 M 44, 618 P2d 331, 37 St. Rep. 1763 (1980).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Tendency to Establish Common Scheme: Evidence that the defendant, charged with sexual intercourse without consent, had 2½ years earlier raped another woman after picking her up in a bar and driving her to a remote area did not tend to establish a common scheme, plan, or system. On the first occasion, the defendant and the victim were alone when he allegedly committed the act, and in the crime charged the defendant and the victim were in the company of a third party. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980), explained in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crimes or Acts: The court did not commit error in admitting prosecutrix's uncorroborated testimony of prior uncharged sexual assaults by prosecutrix's stepfather for the limited purpose of showing plan, scheme, or design, as there was no showing of substantial prejudice to the defendant by admitting such evidence. St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957, 36 St. Rep. 1649 (1979), following St. v. Jensen, 153 M 233, 455 P2d 631 (1969), and followed in St. v. Tecca, 220 M 168, 714 P2d 136, 43 St. Rep. 264 (1986), St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986), and in St. v. Fitzgerald, 238 M 261, 776 P2d 1222, 46 St. Rep. 1253 (1989). Just was clarified, with regard to the applicability of the corpus delicti rule, in St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999).

CAUTIONARY INSTRUCTION

Testimony on Previous Incarceration — No Showing of Contribution to Conviction — Overwhelming Evidence of Guilt: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, aggravated burglary, and attempted sexual intercourse without consent, contended that a mistrial should have been granted when a witness made reference to the fact that defendant had been in the state penitentiary. Defendant's motion was denied, but the court struck the material from the record and gave the jury an instruction to ignore evidence stricken from the record. The Supreme Court, applying the test of whether there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction, therefore requiring reversal, held that there was no evidence defendant was denied a substantial right. There was no showing that the reference might have contributed to his conviction in the face of overwhelming evidence directly proving his guilt. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983).

Admissibility of Mug Shots: Defendant was identified as the perpetrator of a burglary by identification of mug shots by the two victims of the burglary and a next-door neighbor. The identifications were made from a mug shot book. The viewings were conducted separately and within a few days of the burglary. The parties did not discuss the identifications with each other. Defendant contended that the mug shots should not have been allowed to be introduced because they implied that he had committed prior criminal acts. The mug shots were booking photographs and merely indicated that defendant had been booked on prior occasions. The photographs were used for identification. No evidence was adduced indicating that defendant had ever been convicted of any crime. The photographs were relevant for purposes of identification. The judge also gave a cautionary instruction regarding the photographs. This instruction dealt with possible prejudicial effect, and it was within the discretion of the trial judge to admit the photographs. St. v. Stokes, 195 M 321, 637 P2d 498, 38 St. Rep. 1889 (1981).

Cautionary Instruction When No Evidence Other Than Photo Identification: Although a special cautionary instruction may be required where identification testimony is the only evidence tending to connect a defendant with commission of the act charged, where there is other evidence, such as similar modus operandi, a cautionary instruction is not required. St. v. Strain, 190 M 44, 618 P2d 331, 37 St. Rep. 1763 (1980).

Witness' Claim of Intimidation by Defense Counsel: Every excited utterance of a witness does not call for a cautionary instruction. There was no prejudice to the defendants when the court failed to issue a cautionary instruction to the jury regarding testimony of a witness in relation to her claim of intimidation by defense counsel. St. v. Strain, 190 M 44, 618 P2d 331, 37 St. Rep. 1763 (1980).

MISCELLANEOUS

Testimony of Victim of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — Defendant Alleged Victim Was Motivated to Falsely Testify to Avoid Jail Time for Violating Conditional Release Terms — Defendant Failed to Clearly Justify or Articulate How 404(b) Evidence Fit Into Chain of Logical Inferences — Victim's DUI Charge Had Potential to Confuse Jury and Waste Court's Time. St. v. James, 2022 MT 177, 410 Mont. 55, 517 P.3d 170.

Error in Failing to Dismiss Charge for Failure to Prove Elements of Crime: The defendant was charged with several crimes, including negligent vehicular assault. The District Court admitted the testimony of the investigating officer as nonhearsay for the purpose of showing the officer's next steps in the investigation. However, the prosecution used this evidence, consisting in part of out-of-court statements by the victim regarding his injuries, to prove the victim was injured, which was a necessary element of the crime charged. This type of evidence cannot be admitted to establish the truth of the matter asserted as was done here, and thus the necessary injury element of negligent vehicular assault was unproven. St. v. Butler, 2021 MT 124, 404 Mont. 213, 487 P.3d 18.

Defendant's Testimony From First Trial Introduced in Second Trial — No Prejudice or Violation of Self-Incrimination: The defendant's conviction on sexual intercourse without consent charges was reversed in St. v. Franks, 2014 MT 273, 376 Mont. 431, 335 P.3d 725. The state retried the defendant in 2016. At the second trial, the defendant gave testimony that was contrary to testimony he had provided at his first trial. The defendant claimed that the admission of the evidence of his statement from the first trial violated his substantial rights because it was overly prejudicial and violated his right against self-incrimination; however, the Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. St. v. Franks, 2017 MT 225, 388 Mont. 486, 402 P.3d 1190.

Relevance — Exclusion of Collateral Evidence Proper — Not Related to Central Issue in Case: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding evidence proffered by the defendant to rebut the plaintiff's breach of contract and damages claims. Allowing the defendant to introduce evidence regarding the plaintiff's business dealings with other businesses would have consumed a substantial amount of time, led to a mini-trial about issues collateral to the case, confused the issues, and was not relevant to the central issues in the case. Additionally, despite the exclusion of some of the defendant's proffered evidence, the defendant was able to present a defense that the plaintiff lost business from other parties because of the plaintiff's own failings and not because of the defendant's actions. S & P Brake Supply, Inc. v. STEMCO LP, 2016 MT 324, 385 Mont. 488, 385 P.3d 567.

Impermissibly Suggestive Identification Still Reliable: The trial court did not err in allowing the victim's in-court identification of the defendant at trial. Considering the totality of circumstances, the Supreme Court held that, although impermissibly suggestive, the in-court identification did not create a substantial likelihood of misidentification. Hence, even though the District Court erred in finding that the in-court identification was not impermissibly suggestive, it correctly determined that the identification was nonetheless reliable, and the decision was affirmed. Billings v. Nolan, 2016 MT 266, 385 Mont. 190, 383 P.3d 219.

Admission of Voice Identification Evidence — Motion to Suppress Properly Denied: The defendant was charged with several counts of committing heinous sexual crimes against several women. One of the victims identified the defendant's voice as the voice of the man who had harmed her. At trial, the defendant moved to suppress the voice identification, which the District Court denied. On appeal, the defendant argued that the identification evidence should not have been introduced because it did not satisfy the totality of the circumstances test under St. v.

Johnson, 207 Mont. 214, 674 P.2d 1077 (1983). The Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that under the circumstances, and given the other overwhelming evidence of guilt, the introduction of the evidence did not violate the defendant's constitutional right to a fair trial. St. v. Griego, 2016 MT 207, 384 Mont. 392, 377 P.3d 1217.

Evidence Not Admitted in Previous Negligence Action Admissible to Show UTPA Violation — No Error by District Court: In a bad faith insurance claim, the District Court allowed the defendant insurer to introduce evidence of a lack of traffic citations, evidence from responding Highway Patrol officers regarding the point of impact, and testimony about the insured's prior driving activity. The evidence had been prohibited from introduction in a federal District Court action on the negligence claim. Distinguishing its holding in Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 Mont. 67, 721 P.2d 303 (1986), the Supreme Court held that in making a determination under the Montana Unfair Trade Practices Act (UTPA), the jury was entitled to evaluate the evidence because it informed the insurer's assessment of the claim and aided the jury's determination of whether a reasonable person, with knowledge of the relevant facts and law, would conclude, for good reason, that the insured was liable for the accident. Peterson v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2010 MT 187, 357 Mont. 293, 239 P.3d 904.

Insurance Law Attorney Allowed to Testify in Bad Faith Insurance Trial — Cautionary Instruction Proper: The plaintiff filed a bad faith insurance claim under the Montana Unfair Trade Practices Act (UTPA) against the insurer. The plaintiff sought to have an attorney who practices in the area of insurance law testify about industry insurance standards. The insurer moved to strike the attorney's expert testimony. The District Court denied the motion. During the trial, the District Court overruled an objection to testimony concerning whether the insurer violated industry standards but issued a cautionary instruction to the jury concerning the testimony. The Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion by allowing the attorney to testify since the insurer was not prejudiced and a cautionary instruction was provided. Peterson v. St. Paul Fire & Marine Ins. Co., 2010 MT 187, 357 Mont. 293, 239 P.3d 904.

Proper Exclusion of Evidence Offered to Impeach Partner or Family Member Assault Victim — Expert Testimony Regarding Battered Woman Syndrome Properly Admitted: Following conviction for partner or family member assault, Bonamarte appealed on grounds that the trial court erred by improperly limiting evidence related to the general health of the parties' business and by allowing expert testimony by a state witness regarding battered woman syndrome. The Supreme Court affirmed. The trial court properly limited evidence concerning the parties' business, which Bonamarte asserted was relevant to the victim's credibility, while allowing Bonamarte to cross-examine the victim and introduce evidence on that point through Bonamarte's own testimony. Further evidence on the issue might have created undue prejudice, confused the issue, misled the jury, or been cumulative. Likewise, the expert testimony was properly limited to general testimony about the dynamics of an abusive relationship, and the expert did not opine about whether the victim was a battered woman, properly leaving to the jury the decision about whether the victim was credible and a victim of abuse. St. v. Bonamarte, 2009 MT 243, 351 M 419, 213 P3d 457 (2009).

No Error in Exclusion of Evidence That Fence Violated Building Codes — Evidence Relevant But Likely to Lead to Confusion: After complaining about their neighbor's yard lights, defendants erected a 26-foot-high fence between the properties and covered the fence with two layers of dark material, ostensibly to block the glare from plaintiffs' yard lights. Plaintiffs brought an action asserting that the fence was a nuisance and sought to introduce evidence that the fence violated county building codes, but the trial court denied introduction of the evidence. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court determined that the evidence, though relevant, was not probative of the central issues in the case and would likely lead to unnecessary confusion, and it was within the sound discretion of the court to exclude the evidence on those grounds. Tarleton v. Kaufman, 2008 MT 462, 348 M 178, 199 P3d 263 (2008).

Admission of Photo Identification Evidence — Due Process Not Violated Absent Substantial Likelihood of Irreparable Misidentification: Lally asserted that his due process rights were violated because the trial court denied his motion to exclude photo identification evidence by a peace officer who identified Lally as the driver of a motorcycle who had eluded arrest. Citing Neil v. Biggers, 409 US 188 (1972), the Supreme Court noted that the right to due process bars the admission of evidence deriving from suggestive identification procedures when there is a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. However, under the totality of the circumstances and the specific facts of this case, the officer's identification of Lally was not so unreliable that admission of the evidence would have violated due process, so the trial court's denial of Lally's motion to exclude the evidence was affirmed. St. v. Lally, 2008 MT 452, 348 M 59, 199 P3d 818 (2008), following St. v. Lara, 179 M 201, 587 P2d 930 (1978), St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043 (1980), and St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548 (1991).

Evidence of Victim's Possession of Pornography Properly Excluded as Irrelevant: Johnson asserted a defense of justifiable use of force in the assault of Heltne. Johnson contended that Heltne invited Johnson into his bedroom, began showing Johnson a pornographic movie, and tried to touch Johnson, but Johnson refused Heltne's advances. Heltne allegedly offered Johnson money and tried to touch Johnson again, at which point Johnson punched Heltne repeatedly and fled the house. Johnson was later arrested and charged with aggravated assault. The trial court refused to allow Johnson to introduce evidence of Heltne's pornography, and on appeal, Johnson asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The physical evidence that Johnson sought to introduce did not relate in any way to the reasonableness of force used by Johnson and was thus irrelevant, while the potential prejudice to Heltne had the evidence been allowed was massive. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in disallowing the irrelevant, prejudicial pornographic evidence. St. v. Johnson, 2008 MT 227, 344 M 313, 187 P3d 662 (2008).

Admission of Evidence Regarding Language on Defendant's Vehicle and Clothing — Relationship to Crime of Assault With Weapon: Cesnik was charged with assaulting a fellow gun club member with a weapon. The trial court admitted evidence regarding phrases on Cesnik's vehicle and clothing. Cesnik contended that the evidence was unrelated to the assault charge and should not have been admitted. The Supreme Court held that the evidence provided further context regarding the animosity between the men and explained why the club member wanted Cesnik removed from the gun club—an issue that Cesnik's counsel broached on direct examination. The evidence was relevant and admissible. St. v. Cesnik, 2005 MT 257, 329 M 63, 122 P3d 456 (2005).

Inadmissibility of Reverse 404(b) Evidence — No Prejudice to State Prosecution: Defendant contended that the trial court improperly excluded character evidence regarding another person, which could have been introduced under the seldom used "reverse 404(b) evidence" theory to identify the other person as the author of various threatening letters. Defendant claimed that exclusion of the evidence violated the right to present a defense and the right to confront witnesses. Even though there was little risk that admitting the reverse 404(b) evidence would prejudice the state, most of the evidence was propensity evidence, and the evidence in question did not meet the modified Just test for admissibility of character evidence, so the District Court did not err in refusing to admit the reverse 404(b) evidence. St. v. Clifford, 2005 MT 219, 328 M 300, 121 P3d 489 (2005).

Evidence of Blood Alcohol Content of Other Vehicle Occupant Properly Excluded: The trial court excluded evidence regarding the blood alcohol content (BAC) of a passenger in Larson's car on grounds that it was irrelevant and not probative of Larson's BAC or level of impairment at the time of an accident. Larson maintained that admission of the evidence would have supported prospective testimony regarding the parties' drinking activities and countered the state's expert regarding Larson's level of impairment. The Supreme Court affirmed. The passenger's actions were not on trial, nor was there evidence suggesting that both parties consumed alcohol in the same amounts at the same times. Any probative value of the evidence was outweighed by its prejudicial effect, and it was properly excluded. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004). See also St. v. Krause, 2002 MT 63, 309 M 174, 44 P3d 493 (2002).

No Dispute Regarding Dangerous Road — Evidence That Highway Signs Erected Following Accident Properly Excluded: The trial court granted the state's motion in limine to exclude evidence of highway signs erected at a frontage road accident scene following the accident unless the evidence was offered to rebut or refute evidence that the state did not consider the accident site to be dangerous. Larson contended that the absence of signs established the roadway's danger and partially vitiated his negligence. The Supreme Court held that granting the motion in limine was not an abuse of discretion. The state conceded that the road was dangerous, and excluding the signs as evidence did not preclude Larson from fully presenting his theory that the road was dangerous, so evidence of signs erected subsequent to the accident would only have substantiated proof already offered at trial. St. v. Larson, 2004 MT 345, 324 M 310, 103 P3d 524 (2004).

Admissibility of Inmate Testimony Regarding Jail Drug Use — Criminal Drug Sale Conviction Affirmed: Defendant was convicted of sale of dangerous drugs after a jail inmate testified that he observed defendant and another inmate taking drugs that could have come only from defendant's prescription in the jail medication box. Defendant contended that the testimony should have been excluded on grounds of relevance, relying on Havens v. St., 285 M 195, 945 P2d 941 (1997). The Supreme Court distinguished Havens because the testimony here was based on eyewitness testimony that was clearly relevant to the state's case against defendant. The exception in this rule for the exclusion of relevant evidence because of prejudicial effect or potentially misleading impact on the jury did not embrace competent eyewitness testimony describing the commission of defendant's offense. The trier of fact is in the best position to determine the weight of the evidence and credibility of witnesses, and a witness's appreciation of the duty to tell the truth is not necessarily diminished by prior violations of the law. Thus, the testimony was properly before the trial court, and defendant's motion in limine to exclude the testimony was properly denied. St. v. Vandersloot, 2003 MT 179, 316 M 405, 73 P3d 174 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005).

One-on-One Showup Identification Impermissibly Suggestive — Witness Testimony Permissible Under Totality of Circumstances: Bingman sought to exclude the testimony of witnesses in a felony DUI trial on grounds that the witnesses' observation of Bingman through a two-way window at the police department was impermissibly suggestive, resulting in an unreliable identification. The suggestive nature of one-on-one showup identifications has been previously recognized. In St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107 (2000), the Supreme Court set out a two-part test for determining whether evidence gained from such an identification is permissible. The state conceded that the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive, satisfying the first part of the Clark test. The second part of the test requires a determination of whether, under the totality of the circumstances, the identification gave rise to a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification. In this case, despite the impermissibly suggestive nature of the showup identification procedure, the certainty with which the witnesses identified Bingman outweighed the likelihood of misidentification, so the District Court did not err in allowing the witnesses' testimony. St. v. Bingman, 2002 MT 350, 313 M 376, 61 P3d 153 (2002).

Evidence of Conduct of Child Abuse Victim Prior to Assault Irrelevant but Not Prejudicial — Conviction Affirmed: The District Court allowed testimony by two counselors who observed a suspected child abuse victim in the family home. The child exhibited inappropriate sexual conduct and made several sexual comments that ultimately led to the removal of the child from the home and charges against and conviction of Thompson for sexual assault of his child. On appeal, Thompson contended that the testimony was erroneously admitted because it pertained to events that occurred before the assault that he was accused of and was therefore not probative of any fact in issue and was irrelevant. The Supreme Court agreed. Neither witness offered an opinion of who might have been responsible for the child's behavior, and there was no evidence that it was caused by Thompson, so the testimony was irrelevant to the issue being tried. However, the objectionable inference from the evidence was that the child had been sexually abused, a fact that Thompson himself conceded through his own witnesses. The testimony was cumulative and merely illustrated a fact that was not in dispute and thus did not affect Thompson's substantial rights or provide grounds for reversal. St. v. Thompson, 2001 MT 119, 305 M 342, 28 P3d 1068 (2001).

Inadmissibility of Evidence of Receipt of Workers' Compensation Benefits — Reversible Error: Mickelson was injured when the fire truck that he was driving was struck by a Montana Rail Link (MRL) train and sought damages. Prior to trial, Mickelson filed a motion in limine to preclude MRL from mentioning or arguing at trial that Mickelson was receiving workers' compensation benefits as a result of the injuries. The District Court denied the motion, concluding that MRL should be allowed to show that Mickelson did not take reasonable steps to mitigate the damages by accepting a retraining employment position because of fear of losing the workers' compensation benefits. At trial, evidence of Mickelson's workers' compensation benefits was allowed throughout the proceedings, and the jury decided for MRL. On appeal, MRL argued that the evidence had significant probative value as to why Mickelson had not returned to work, perhaps even indicating that Mickelson was malingering by not accepting a supported employment position. The Supreme Court noted the District Court's broad discretion in determining the relevance and admissibility of evidence, but recited several prior holdings that evidence of receipt of workers' compensation benefits or other collateral source benefits constitutes prejudicial and reversible error requiring a new trial. Despite MRL's argument to the contrary, introduction of the evidence could not be considered harmless because the evidence could have an impact on the jury's verdict on the issue of liability as well as damages. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded for a new trial. Mickelson v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2000 MT 111, 299 M 348, 999 P2d 985, 57 St. Rep. 446 (2000), following Mydlarz v. Palmer/Duncan Constr. Co., 209 M 325, 682 P2d 695, 41 St. Rep. 738 (1984). See also Goggans v. Winkley, 159 M 85, 495 P2d 594 (1972), Allers v. Willis, 197 M 499, 643 P2d 592, 39 St. Rep. 745 (1982), and Thomsen v. St., 253 M 460, 833 P2d 1076, 49 St. Rep. 533 (1992).

Identification Procedure Impermissibly Suggestive — Motion In Limine to Suppress Witness's In-Court Identification Properly Denied — No Substantial Likelihood of Irreparable Misidentification: The witness stood by defendant's car for several minutes after an accident observing him for injuries and then left to get help when she saw that he appeared drunk and that there was a pistol on the car seat. When the witness and police returned, the defendant and pistol were gone. After many procedural delays and the suppression of evidence of defendant's driver's license taken from the car, the County Attorney's office sent a letter to the witness along with two photographs of defendant in jailhouse attire. The state affirmatively identified the person in the photos as defendant and asked the witness to notify the County Attorney's office if the photos didn't depict the person whom she saw in the car. Defendant's motion in limine to prohibit the witness's identification testimony was denied by the District Court. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that although the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive, considering the totality of the circumstances, it did not create a substantial likelihood of misidentification and the motion was properly denied. St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000).

Testimonial Tape-Recorded Interview Improperly Submitted to Jury — Error Harmless Because of Cumulative Nature of Evidence: Following an automobile accident in which his girlfriend was killed, Bales was interviewed by a highway patrol officer who taped the interview, during which Bales failed the HGN test and made allegedly prejudicial statements. Over Bales' objection, the District Court admitted the tape as an exhibit that the jury could listen to during deliberations. The Supreme Court noted that because the jury had not requested the playing of the tape, 46-16-504 applied, rather than 46-16-503. The Supreme Court found that the tape had a testimonial character and, citing St. v. Harris, 247 M 405, 808 P2d 453 (1991), for the common-law rule against submitting testimonial materials to the jury for unsupervised and unrestricted review during deliberations, held that the District Court abused its discretion in allowing the tape to go to the jury. However, allowing the jury to hear the tape did not unduly emphasize that testimony to the exclusion of other witnesses, nor were statements on the tape inconsistent with statements given by the witnesses at trial. Rather, the tape was merely cumulative of other evidence and did not prejudice Bales, so the error was harmless. St. v. Bales, 1999 MT 334, 297 M 402, 994 P2d 17, 56 St. Rep. 1334 (1999), distinguishing St. v. Morse, 229 M 222, 746 P2d 108, 44 St. Rep. 1919 (1987), and overruling it to the extent that it is inconsistent with Harris regarding the submission of testimonial materials to a deliberating jury. See also St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992), St. v. Evans, 261 M 508, 862 P2d 417, 50 St. Rep. 1431 (1993), and St. v. Greene, 2015 MT 1, 378 Mont. 1, 340 P.3d 551.

Prohibiting Nontreating Doctor's Testimony That Person's Medical Records Did Not Have Certain Information: The decedent medical patient's wife was not allowed to call to the stand a family friend who was a doctor to testify that he found the decedent's medical records, which he examined after the death and at the family's request, devoid of a history and physical exam. Upon defendants' motion to exclude the testimony, the doctor said that he did not recall seeing the history and physical exam documentation in the records, but that it did not mean that they were not there, just that he did not recall seeing them. Assuming that such testimony would be relevant, it was of minimal probative value. Further, plaintiff called other doctors as experts, and allowing the family friend doctor to testify would likely confuse the jury, which might take his testimony to be that of an expert instead of that of a person testifying as to facts. Prohibiting the testimony was proper. Bueling v. Swift, 1998 MT 112, 288 M 472, 958 P2d 694, 55 St. Rep. 441 (1998).

General Standard of Review of Holdings on Admissibility of Evidence: Rulings on the admissibility of evidence are within the sound discretion of the District Court and will not be overturned on appeal absent an abuse of discretion by the trial court. St. v. Mayes, 251 M 358, 825 P2d 1196, 49 St. Rep. 75 (1992).

Admissibility of Extrinsic Evidence Regarding Informant's Drug Use as Relevant to Motive for False Testimony: A trial court's discretion in exercising control and excluding evidence of a witness's bias or motive to testify falsely becomes operative only after the constitutionally required threshold level of inquiry has been afforded the defendant. Therefore, subject to the limitations of Rules 403 and 611, M.R.Ev., a defendant should be afforded latitude in cross-examination and be allowed to introduce extrinsic evidence regarding an informant's alleged habitual drug use as relevant to the informant's motive to testify falsely, if denied by the informant. St. v. Gommenginger, 242 M 265, 790 P2d 455, 47 St. Rep. 681 (1990), followed in St. v. Haskins, 255 M 202, 841 P2d 542, 49 St. Rep. 922 (1992), and St. v. Milton, 280 M 142, 930 P2d 28, 53 St. Rep. 1337 (1996). However, see St. v. Allen, 276 M 298, 916 P2d 112, 53 St. Rep. 403 (1996).

Overheard Conversation — Repetitious: The District Court did not err in excluding testimony from a person not present at the assault who would have testified that she overheard a conversation in which the victim stated that as far as he knew, he had only been hit once. Such testimony would have been repetitious because it would have been consistent with the victim's own testimony at the trial. Sloan v. St., 236 M 100, 768 P2d 1365, 46 St. Rep. 214 (1989).

Parole Violation — Evidence Not Within Scope of Appeal Properly Excluded: Defendant convicted of parole violation contended that tape recordings, which might have shown distress and suicidal tendencies, were useful in his development of a defense of "duress" and "necessity". However, admission of the evidence was properly denied because it was cumulative and irrelevant to the issue of parole violation and revocation of the suspended sentence. St. v. Pease, 233 M 65, 758 P2d 764, 45 St. Rep. 1296 (1988).

Demonstration of Fighting Prowess Disallowed as Cumulative: Defendant contended District Court error in disallowing a demonstration of how he "punches like a woman, blocks like a sissy and why a knife was an appropriate choice" to equalize his opponent's fighting prowess, asserting the evidence would show he could not defend himself without a weapon. The demonstrative evidence was cumulative and its exclusion did not constitute reversible error. St. v. Crazy Boy, 232 M 398, 757 P2d 341, 45 St. Rep. 1145 (1988).

Diagram and Written Rendition of Defendant's Story — Excludable as Repetitious: The trial court did not err in refusing to admit into evidence a document that included diagrams and a written rendition by defendant of his version of the crimes. Defendant claimed the document showed that his story was consistent with earlier versions and that he did not concoct his story; however, the document was disallowed as being repetitious testimony. St. v. Miller, 231 M 497, 757 P2d 1275, 45 St. Rep. 790 (1988).

Tape Recordings — Repetitious Evidence Excluded: The District Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding a tape recording of a conversation between two witnesses when time necessary to hear the tapes would not be judiciously expended because the evidence was merely cumulative and otherwise before the jury. St. v. Short, 217 M 62, 702 P2d 979, 42 St. Rep. 1026 (1985).

Internal Department Memoranda — Relevant to Road Condition: In a wrongful death action plaintiff attempted to introduce into evidence internal Highway Department (now Department of Transportation) memoranda containing evaluations of specific stretches of road within the state, including the location of the accident involved. Plaintiff had a state employee explain the documents and laid a foundation for their admission. The State, a codefendant, contended the documents were irrelevant, confusing, prejudicial, and erroneous. The trial court excluded the evidence. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the exhibits were relevant. They tended to show the general condition of the highway which was a material issue in the plaintiff's case against the State. The contention that the exhibits would confuse or mislead the jury showed a lack of confidence in the intelligence and common sense of the jury. It was error to exclude the exhibits; however, in light of all the evidence admitted concerning the road conditions, the error was harmless. Lindberg v. Leatham Bros., Inc., 215 M 11, 693 P2d 1234, 42 St. Rep. 137 (1985).

Relevancy of "Other Accidents" Evidence — Substantial Similarity Required: In order to prevent the jury from being misled, the party offering "other accidents" evidence bears the burden of showing that the circumstances surrounding the product involved in the other accidents were substantially the same or similar to the accident at issue. Kuiper v. Goodyear Tire & Rubber Co., 207 M 37, 673 P2d 1208, 40 St. Rep. 1861 (1983).

Prior Compromise Settlements Properly Excluded: Plaintiff injured his back when the seat in the locomotive he was operating broke and threw him backward. Plaintiff had had two prior back injuries that had been successfully treated. The District Court excluded evidence relating to plaintiff's previous settlement of claims with defendant. Defendant contended that since the jury heard evidence regarding the previous injuries, it should have been informed of the settlements. The Supreme Court held that compromise settlements for previous injuries do not necessarily reflect the seriousness of the injuries and may confuse the jury. Any probative value was outweighed by possible prejudice. Callihan v. Burlington N., Inc., 201 M 350, 654 P2d 972, 39 St. Rep. 2158 (1982).

Prosecutor Not Required to Stipulate Defendant's Admissions: An admission by a defendant does not prevent the state from presenting separate and independent proof of the fact admitted. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Auto Negligence Suit — Admission of Reinjury Evidence — Denial of Evidence on Workers' Compensation Claim for Reinjury: Evidence that personal injury tort claimant reinjured his back at work some 10 months after accident in which his back was injured as a result of defendant's alleged negligence was properly admitted into evidence, but evidence that he had a pending workers' compensation claim arising from the reinjury was properly excluded by the trial judge. Allers v. Willis, 197 M 499, 643 P2d 592, 39 St. Rep. 745 (1982).

Evidence of Alteration of Accident Scene After Accident Excluded: Evidence of subsequent repairs or improvements by a defendant altering the scene of an accident may not be admitted in evidence to show negligence on the part of the defendant. The evidence erroneously admitted here put before the jury the idea that the State, by constructing an additional guardrail at the scene of the accident after the accident, admitted to antecedent negligence. Cech v. St., 183 M 75, 598 P2d 584, 36 St. Rep. 1348 (1979), affirmed on rehearing, 184 M 522, 604 P2d 97, 36 St. Rep. 2185 (1979).

Exclusion of Testimony—Repetitious: Testimony concerning threats to members of defendant's family made by the victim of the defendant's assault prior to the assault may be excluded if the testimony is repetitious and likely to distract and mislead the jury from the issues actually in controversy. The exclusion of such testimony is within the court's discretion. St. v. Breitenstein, 180 M 503, 591 P2d 233, 36 St. Rep. 403 (1979).

Identification of Criminal Suspects: The test for admissibility of evidence based on a lineup is a determination of whether or not the identification procedure was impermissibly suggestive and, if so, whether or not the procedure, under the totality of the circumstances, would have such a tendency to give rise to a substantial likelihood of irreparable misidentification that to allow the witness to make an in-court identification would violate due process. St. v. Lara, 179 M 201, 587 P2d 930, 35 St. Rep. 1699 (1978), followed in St. v. Schoffner, 248 M 260, 811 P2d 548, 48 St. Rep. 424 (1991), and St. v. Lally, 2008 MT 452, 348 M 59, 199 P3d 818 (2008). See also St. v. Clark, 2000 MT 40, 298 M 300, 997 P2d 107, 57 St. Rep. 185 (2000).

Polygraph Test: The mention by a prosecution witness that he had taken a polygraph test did not prejudice a criminal defendant's case. St. v. McClean, 179 M 178, 587 P2d 20, 35 St. Rep. 1790 (1978).

Character Evidence to Demonstrate Motive in Testifying: The point of Rule 608, M.R.Ev., for the purposes of this appeal is that reference to specific instances of a witness' conduct for the purpose of proving his character for truthfulness or untruthfulness is never permitted on direct examination. This rule, in conjunction with Rules 403 and 405, M.R.Ev., supports the trial court's limitation on impeachment evidence, which defendant argues should have been permitted to establish a prosecution witness' personal habits for marijuana use to demonstrate a profit motive in obtaining a conviction. St. v. McClean, 179 M 178, 587 P2d 20, 35 St. Rep. 1790 (1978).

Unfair Trial—Prosecutorial Misconduct: It is not the duty of the prosecuting attorney to make independent determinations concerning the admissibility of evidence once the court rules such evidence is inadmissible. Willful attempts by the prosecutor in this case to place excluded evidence before the jury resulted in a reversal of conviction because of its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bain, 176 M 23, 575 P2d 919 (1978), followed in St. v. McLeod, 227 M 482, 740 P2d 672, 44 St. Rep. 1251 (1987).

Surprise Testimony Discounted: The Supreme Court rejected defendant's contention that trial testimony constituted surprise and should have been excluded when a witness testifying as to admissions made by defendant quoted certain profane and vulgar language not previously mentioned in a statement provided to defendant by the prosecution. St. v. Hallam, 175 M 492, 575 P2d 55 (1978).

Rule 404. Character evidence not admissible to prove conduct, exceptions; other crimes; character in issue.

Commission Comments

This rule deals only with the admissibility of character evidence. Rule 405 deals with how such evidence may be proven.

(a) Character evidence generally. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 404(a) except that "or in an assault case where the victim is incapable of testifying" is added in (a)(2) to cover a situation to which the Commission believes the rule should logically extend; and "as provided in Article VI" is changed in (a)(3) to delete reference to specific rules.

The Commission intends, with one exception in (a)(2), this subdivision to express the generally accepted rules on the admissibility of character evidence when it is used as circumstantial evidence to infer conduct. The rule provides that such use of character evidence is not admissible unless it falls within one of the exceptions provided in paragraph (1), (2), or (3), which generally limit such evidence to criminal cases.

Paragraph (1) expresses the rule that the accused may introduce evidence of his good character to infer that he did not commit the crime, and the prosecution may rebut the same. Paragraph (2) expresses the two usual rules on the character of the victim in the first clause and an entirely new rule in the second clause. The two usual rules in the first clause, "evidence of a pertinent trait of character of the victim of the crime offered by an accused, or by the prosecution to rebut the same", provide that the accused may introduce evidence of the violent character of the victim to show that the victim was the first aggressor or to show that the accused used a reasonable amount of force in defending himself, and the prosecution may rebut this evidence of violent character with evidence of peaceful character. The new rule in the second clause, "evidence of a character trait of peacefulness of the victim offered by the prosecution...to rebut evidence that the victim was the first aggressor", provides that the prosecution may rebut evidence offered by the accused to show that he acted in self-defense with evidence of the peaceful character of the victim to show who was the first aggressor. Paragraph (3) expresses the usual rule that character evidence may be used to attack or support the credibility of a witness, as provided in Article VI.

This subdivision is generally consistent with Montana law. Section 93-1901-13, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], provides that evidence of good character of a party or witness is not admissible until the character of the party or witness is attacked or unless an issue involves such character. Cases construing and using this statute have expressed this same meaning. In re Williams Estate, 52 Mont. 192, 203, 156 P 1087 (1916); State v. Jackson, 71 Mont. 421, 433, 230 P 370 (1924); Meinecke v. Skaggs, 123 Mont. 308, 311, 213 P2d 237 (1949); and Goggans v. Winkley, 159 Mont. 85, 93, 495 P2d 549 (1972). One reason given for this statute excluding such evidence is that a person is presumed to have good character and there is no need for such evidence until that good character is attacked. Fowlie v. Cruse, 52 Mont. 222, 237, 157 P 958 (1916). A limitation upon this statute can be implied from other cases which do not allow an attack upon character, or character evidence in civil cases. Kornec v. Mike Horse Mining Co., 120 Mont. 1, 13, 180 P2d 252 (1947); Gunderson v. Brewster, 154 Mont. 405, 431, 466 P2d 589 (1970); and Holland v. Biggs, 166 M 278, 532 P2d 411 (1975). While these cases are civil assault cases, it can be implied that the rule would hold true for all civil cases; the apparent reason for exclusion, as expressed in each of the cases, is that evidence of character is not relevant and therefore lacks probative value.

The rule contained in paragraph (1) that the accused may introduce evidence of his good character to show that he did not commit the crime is followed in Montana. State v. Moorman, 133 Mont. 148, 151, 321 P2d 236 (1957); State v. Popa, 56 Mont. 587, 590, 185 P 1114 (1919); and State v. Jones, 48 Mont. 505, 516, 139 P 441 (1914). These cases also stand for the proposition that the prosecution may cross-examine the witnesses for the accused concerning rumors or reports concerning the reputation of the accused which would rebut their good character testimony and may cross-examine the witnesses to determine the sufficiency of grounds upon which they base their testimony. (See Rule 405(a) for further discussion.)

The rules contained in the first clause of paragraph (2), concerning evidence of character of the victim introduced by the accused, are also followed in Montana. Under Montana case law the accused must first lay a foundation that he acted in self-defense before he can introduce evidence of the violent character of the victim. State v. Logan, 156 Mont. 48, 64, 472 P2d 833 (1970). Then evidence of the violent character of the victim may be introduced for two purposes: to show that the victim, not the accused, was the first aggressor, State v. Jones, supra at 519, and to show that the accused acted reasonably or used a reasonable amount of force in defending himself against a victim of violent character. State v. Shadwell, 22 Mont. 559, 572, 57 P 281 (1899). There is a great deal of case law on these rules, much of it relating to methods of proof as applied to each of the two purposes. (See Rule 405 for further discussion.) This paragraph also contains the rule that the prosecution may introduce evidence of the peaceful character of the victim to rebut evidence offered by the accused showing that the victim was the first aggressor. This use of character evidence of the victim has not been recognized by Montana statutes or cases and is therefore new to Montana law. The rule adds a phrase making it applicable to assault cases where the victim cannot testify as well as to homicide cases where the same consideration applies. The Commission does not intend that this subdivision conflict with Section 94-5-503(5), R.C.M. 1947 [45-5-503], which limits use of a rape victim's character to two instances.

The rule contained in paragraph (3) that evidence of the character of the witness may be used to attack or support the credibility of the witness is provided by Section 93-1901-13, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], among other statutes. Cases construing it are In re Williams Estate, supra, and State v. Jackson, supra. It should be noted that evidence of good character is not admissible until the character of the witness has been attacked. State v. Deidtman, 58 Mont. 13, 19, 190 P 117 (1920). (See rules in Article VI dealing with the character of witnesses for further discussion.)

(b) Other crimes, wrongs, acts. This subdivision is identical to Federal Rule 404(b). It states the general rule that evidence of another crime is not admissible to prove a criminal disposition or character trait and therefore that the accused committed the crime for which he is on trial. However, this narrow rule does have its exceptions, for evidence of other crimes is admissible for purposes other than as evidence of a criminal character trait. These purposes are listed by way of example, as indicated by use of the phrase, “such as”. The beginning of the second sentence of the Uniform Rule (1974) 404(b) retains language from an earlier Federal draft which reads: “This subdivision does not exclude evidence when offered for another purpose, such as...”. The Commission concurs in statements of intent concerning this amendment found in the Report of the Senate Judiciary Committee, 93d Cong., 2d Sess., October 18, 1974, pp 24-25 that there is probably “...no necessity in amending the rule...” and that use of the word “may” in the amendment “...is not intended to confer any arbitrary discretion on the trial judge. Rather, it is anticipated that with respect to permissible uses for such evidence, the trial judge may exclude it only on the basis of those considerations set forth in Rule 403...”. The final draft of the Federal Rules was adopted for purposes of uniformity, and the Commission intends that there be no change in the admissibility of such evidence under existing Montana law.

Present Montana law is consistent with this subdivision, although this has not always been true. In State v. Sauter, 125 Mont. 109, 144, 232 P2d 731 (1951), evidence of other sex crimes was held inadmissible for any purpose; this was expanded in State v. Searlye, 125 Mont. 467, 471, 239 P2d 995 (1952) to disallow evidence of other crimes for any reason in a trial for any crime. This unorthodox rule reversed earlier cases in Montana (State v. Simpson, 109 Mont. 198, 208, 95 P2d 761 (1939)) and eventually was overruled in a series of cases: State v. Merritt, 138 Mont. 546, 548, 357 P2d 683 (1960); State v. Teidmann, 139 Mont. 237, 242, 362 P2d 529 (1960); State v. Tully, 148 Mont. 166, 169, 418 P2d 549 (1960); and finally in State v. Jensen, 153 Mont. 233, 238, 455 P2d 63 (1969) where evidence of other sex crimes was held admissible because of similarity, nearness of time, and tendency to establish a common scheme or plan of the other crimes. The list of purposes allowing such evidence to be admitted, found in Tully, compares closely to those found in the rule, but as Jensen indicates, purposes other than those contained in Tully are allowable; therefore, Montana law is consistent with the concept that purposes other than those listed in the rule may be found and used to admit evidence of other crimes. (See also State v. Frates, 160 Mont. 431, 436, 503 P2d 47 (1972); State v. Taylor, 163 Mont. 106, 120, 515 P2d 677 (1973).) It should be noted that State v. Skinner, 163 Mont. 58, 64, 505 P2d 81 (1973) indicated that courts are obliged to examine “the relative probative value of the evidence of other offenses... and weigh this against the prejudice inherent in this type of evidence in light of the actual need to introduce (it)”, factors similar to those found in Rule 403.

(c) Character in issue. This subdivision is original and therefore not identical to any Federal or Uniform Rule (1974). The language, taken from Rules 404(a) and 405(b), is very close to phrases contained in the same Federal and Uniform Rules (1974).

The Federal drafters clearly intended to make character in issue admissible because Federal Rule 405(b) has a provision for proving character in issue; however, the Commission believes that a rule which is meant to deal with the admissibility of character evidence should contain a provision for evidence which most obviously must be admitted, particularly in light of Section 93-1901-13, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and cases construing it. It should be noted that character is not automatically placed in issue under Montana case law: good character of a party to the action is not in issue and therefore not admissible until it is questioned or attacked by the other party. Fowlie v. Cruse, supra, and Meinecke v. Skaggs, supra.

GENERAL

Defendant's Prior Attempt to Marry 13-Year-Old Daughter to Man in Exchange for House and Cell Phone Relevant to Charged Crime of Sexual Abuse of 4-Year-Old Daughter by Same Man — Demonstrative of Motive of Financial Desperation — Admission of Evidence of Marriage Attempt Not Abuse of Discretion. St. v. Mountain Chief, 2023 MT 147, 413 Mont. 131, 533 P.3d 663.

Testimony of Victim of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent — Defendant Alleged Victim Was Motivated to Falsely Testify to Avoid Jail Time for Violating Conditional Release Terms — Defendant Failed to Clearly Justify or Articulate How 404(b) Evidence Fit Into Chain of Logical Inferences — Victim's DUI Charge Had Potential to Confuse Jury and Waste Court's Time. St. v. James, 2022 MT 177, 410 Mont. 55, 517 P.3d 170.

Probative Value Outweighed by Prejudicial Irrelevant Evidence of Defendant's Prior Comments on Sexual Abuse — New Trial Granted. St. v. Lake, 2022 MT 28, 407 Mont. 350, 503 P.3d 274.

Probative Value in Partner or Family Member Assault Case: A defendant convicted of assaulting his girlfriend challenged on appeal the admission of evidence regarding his verbal abuse and financial manipulation, and challenged the admission of testimony and text messages in which racial slurs had been used. The Supreme Court affirmed admission of the evidence regarding verbal abuse and financial manipulation, finding that its probative value in establishing the motives of the defendant and in explaining the actions of the victim outweighed the risk of unfair prejudice. Likewise, the Supreme Court affirmed the admission of the testimony and text messages with racial slurs, finding that they had probative value for establishing rising tension between the defendant and the victim and for containing an admission of guilt based on the facts and that they did not result in an unfair trial. St. v. Haithcox, 2019 MT 201, 397 Mont. 103, 447 P.3d 452.

Evidence of Past Acts Admissible to Show Motive: The defendant staged a crime scene in order to implicate a local detective. He was charged with one count of arson, two counts of tampering with or fabricating physical evidence, and one count of impersonating a public servant. The detective had investigated the defendant on multiple prior occasions, resulting in two prior convictions, and following the convictions the defendant and his family had filed a civil lawsuit against the detective, alleging intimidation and intentional infliction of emotional distress. The defendant moved to exclude certain evidence of the defendant's past acts. The District Court denied the motion insofar as it related to the defendant's past acts relating to the detective, and the defendant was convicted on all but the arson charge. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed in part, finding that allowing the evidence was proper under both Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., and 26-1-103, known as the transaction rule. Regarding Rule 404(b), the Supreme Court stated that the existence of prior cases involving the defendant and the involvement of the detective and interactions between the defendant and the detective related to those cases provided necessary background for understanding the defendant's attempt to frame the detective. St. v. Ellison, 2018 MT 252, 393 Mont. 90, 428 P.3d 826.

Evidence of Internet Searches Regarding Incest and Child Pornography Used to Prove Identity Not Violative of Rule: At the defendant's retrial on charges of incest, sexual intercourse without consent against a minor, and sexual assault, the District Court admitted evidence of the defendant's repeated internet searches regarding incest and child pornography. On appeal, the defendant asserted that the internet searches were improperly used as propensity evidence in violation of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. The Supreme Court disagreed, noting that the defendant had raised the issue of the identity of the perpetrator at trial and thus evidence of his pervasive and specific sexual interest in incest and sexual abuse-related child pornography was relevant and probative of his identity as the perpetrator of incest against his daughter. St. v. Colburn, 2018 MT 141, 391 Mont. 449, 419 P.3d 1196.

Defendant's Letters to Victim Mentioning Prior Bad Acts — Probative Value Not Substantially Outweighed by Prejudice: Several letters were admitted at trial from the defendant to the alleged victim that contained the defendant's apologies, near admissions to the charges, requests that the victim drop the charges, and indications of the defendant's abusive, controlling relationship with the victim. Although the defendant mentioned prior bad acts, the references were minimal, vaguely stated, and closely woven with his promises to change his behavior. The District Court issued a cautionary instruction concerning the prior acts. The probative value of the letters was substantial, demonstrating his consciousness of guilt and tending to corroborate the victim's version of the incidents, demonstrating a typical domestic violence cycle of abuse, and helping explain why the victim delayed reporting the criminal incidents for 9 months. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the letters or by concluding that the letters' probative value was not substantially outweighed by prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Ankeny, 2018 MT 91, 391 Mont. 176, 417 P.3d 275.

Defendant's Wages Garnished Prior to Alleged Staged Workplace Injury — Evidence of Bad Act Admitted — Prejudice Outweighed by Probative Value: The defendant was alleged to have staged an injury to receive workers' compensation benefits and was charged with theft. At trial, the defendant filed a motion in limine to exclude evidence that his wages had been garnished the week before his injury occurred, arguing that it constituted a prior bad act. The District Court denied the motion and admitted the evidence to prove motive. Following conviction, the defendant appealed to the Supreme Court, which agreed with the District Court that the probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect and affirmed the denial of the motion in limine. St. v. Ailer, 2018 MT 18, 390 Mont. 200, 410 P.3d 964.

Admission of Evidence of Prior Conviction Upheld: The defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide resulting from the death of his 53-day-old daughter. At trial, the District Court admitted evidence about his prior partner family member assault conviction under Rule 404, M.R.Ev. The defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court abused its discretion in admitting the prior conviction and that the written judgment was nonconforming because it omitted credit for days of time served. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court's admission of the conviction, holding that the state properly offered the evidence to show motive, identity and pattern, and absence of mistake or accident, and the District Court properly applied the Rule 403, M.R.Ev., balancing test by providing a cautionary jury instruction. St. v. Blaz, 2017 MT 164, 388 Mont. 105, 398 P.3d 247.

Evidence of Earlier Encounter With Arresting Officer Allowed — Reliance on Evidence by Both Parties — No Abuse of Discretion: The defendant was charged with and convicted of improper influence of an official for threatening to kill a police officer and his family as he was being taken to jail by the officer for disorderly conduct. The defendant had been arrested by the same officer earlier, and the state was allowed to introduce evidence of the previous encounter. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing evidence of that encounter. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed, ruling that the defendant had not demonstrated that the danger of unfair prejudice had outweighed the evidence's probative value. St. v. Spottedbear, 2016 MT 243, 385 Mont. 68, 380 P.3d 810.

Constructive Discharge Upheld Despite Error in Admission of Evidence: Admission of evidence of the settlement amount in another employment case against the same defendant was in error. Since there was only one other employment case against this defendant, evidence of the settlement amount did not demonstrate a habitual pattern, and the danger of prejudice exceeded the probative value. However, in light of the other evidence presented by the plaintiff and the damage limitations in the Wrongful Discharge from Employment Act, the court concluded that introducing the settlement amount of a separate employment claim did not significantly alter the result of the trial. Harrell v. Farmers Edu. & Co-op Union, 2013 MT 367, 373 Mont. 92, 314 P.3d 920.

Sexually Provocative and Explicit Photographs Not Inadmissible Propensity Evidence: Sexually explicit photographs taken by the defendant of his daughter, the victim, established the existence of a sexual dynamic in their relationship that supported the permissible inference that the defendant engaged in sexual contact with her. St. v. Stewart, 2012 MT 317, 367 Mont. 503, 291 P.3d 1187.

Evidence of Victim Being a "Cutter" Inadmissible — Right to Present Defense Not Infringed: Following the defendant's convictions on charges stemming from altercations between the defendant and his girlfriend, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court erred when it prohibited the defendant from testifying that an altercation was caused by the defendant walking in on his girlfriend purposely cutting herself, thereby denying the defendant his constitutional right to present a defense. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the girlfriend's "cutting" constituted character evidence that was inadmissible under the facts of the case. Because the defendant's justifiable-use-of-force defense was that after he entered a room, his girlfriend came at him with the knife, the reason the knife was in his girlfriend's possession was irrelevant. St. v. Hauer, 2012 MT 120, 365 Mont. 184, 279 P.3d 149.

Homicide Where Defendant Does Not Claim Self Defense — Evidence of Victim's Character Not Relevant to Accidental Shooting: A jury convicted the defendant of deliberate homicide for shooting a neighbor who owed him $35. Throughout the trial, however, the defendant claimed that the shooting was accidental. On appeal, the defendant challenged a number of the District Court's evidentiary rulings, alleging they resulted in a cumulative error that warranted a reversal of his conviction. For instance, the defendant had wanted to introduce evidence about why he armed himself before going to the victim's home and evidence that the victim was high on methamphetamine at the time of the shooting. The District Court excluded the evidence because it was irrelevant given the defendant's claim that the shooting was accidental. The District Court also admitted a picture of the defendant holding a gun over the defendant's objection that the photo was irrelevant. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court that evidence of the victim's character was irrelevant because the defendant claimed the shooting was accidental. As for the picture, the Supreme Court concluded that since the defendant had testified that he owned a gun and brought it to the victim's home, admitting the picture of him with a gun was harmless error and did not contribute to his conviction. St. v. Hardman, 2012 MT 70, 364 Mont. 361, 276 P.3d 839.

Defendant's Offensive Sexual Photos Prejudicial Despite Cautionary Jury Instruction: The admission of inadmissible sexually explicit photos was not harmless error since the state could not establish that there was no reasonable possibility their admission might have contributed to the defendant's conviction and it was not possible to conclude that cautionary jury instructions mitigated the prejudicial impact. St. v. Sage, 2010 MT 156, 357 Mont. 99, 235 P.3d 1284.

Explicit Photographs Inadmissible Under Transaction Rule: Sexually explicit photos that underscored the defendant's interest in the alleged victim and women in general provided context to the circumstances under which the offense occurred but were not evidence of facts in dispute and did not explain how the defendant had sexual intercourse without consent or committed sexual assault. As such, the Supreme Court concluded that the photos were not intrinsic to or inextricably intertwined with the charges and that the District Court erroneously admitted them under the transaction rule. St. v. Sage, 2010 MT 156, 357 Mont. 99, 235 P.3d 1284.

Incidents Unknown at Time of Homicide Not Admissible as Character Evidence: In a prosecution for mitigated deliberate homicide where the victim's character was an essential element of the defense or related to self-defense, incidents involving the victim that were not known by the defendant until after the victim's death were not admissible because the knowledge of the incidents could not have led to the use of force. St. v. Henson, 2010 MT 136, 356 Mont. 458, 235 P.3d 1274.

Admissibility Under Transaction Rule of Evidence of Uncharged Violent Acts by Defendant Against Mother and Brother of Sexual Abuse Victim: Guill contended that the District Court erroneously interpreted and applied the transaction rule by admitting evidence of uncharged misconduct and violence against Guill's wife and son during the state's case of sexual misconduct by Guill against his daughter. The District Court interpreted the transaction rule as allowing evidence that is inextricably linked to the charged allegations, and the Supreme Court agreed. The rationale for admitting transaction evidence is that it is theoretically difficult to subdivide a course of conduct into discrete criminal acts and other conduct and that it is practically difficult for a witness to testify coherently to an event if the witness is permitted to reference only the minutely defined elements of a crime, so it is legitimate to admit properly limited evidence that is inextricably intertwined with a charged crime. The District Court also properly applied the transaction rule by dividing the challenged evidence into incidents of which the victim was aware, which was allowed, and incidents of which the victim was not aware, which was not allowed unless Guill himself opened the door to the testimony. St. v. Guill, 2010 MT 69, 355 Mont. 490, 228 P.3d 1152, distinguishing St. v. Lacey, 2010 MT 6, 355 Mont. 31, 224 P.3d 1247.

Relevance of Criminal and Character Evidence in Wrongful Discharge: Dean's employment as an administrative assistant to the Board of County Commissioners was terminated following the discovery of Dean's involvement in a marijuana business and subsequent arrest. Dean subsequently sued the county for its negligent hiring of the officer who was involved in the drug investigation, for unlawful arrest and imprisonment, for wrongful discharge, and for malicious prosecution. A jury found for the county on all claims, and Dean appealed. The Supreme Court considered the evidence related to each claim and affirmed. The county's actions in hiring the officer who was involved in the investigation were irrelevant as to whether Dean was falsely arrested, and evidence related to the hiring was properly excluded. Likewise, evidence gathered after Dean's arrest concerning Dean's personal drug use, although not admissible as evidence of false arrest, was relevant to a determination of whether Dean was wrongfully discharged or terminated for good cause and was properly admitted. Evidence in the record was substantial that probable cause existed to arrest Dean, and the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of Dean's drug use and connection to persons involved in the marijuana business. Dean v. Sanders County, 2009 MT 88, 350 M 8, 204 P3d 722 (2009).

Limit of Defendant's Cross-Examination of Witness to Elicit Propensity Evidence Proper: At Giddings' homicide trial, he sought to introduce character evidence of a witness by raising issues related to the witness's criminal history and drug activity. The District Court disallowed the cross-examination, and following conviction Giddings appealed on grounds that his due process rights were violated. The Supreme Court disagreed and affirmed. A defendant may introduce "reverse 404(b)" evidence to inculpate another person, thus exculpating defendant, but defendant must clearly articulate which of the prior bad acts evidence fits into a chain of logical inferences, and no link of the chain may be the inference that defendant has a propensity to commit the crime charged. Additionally, the evidence may not be introduced if it lacks connection with the crime, is speculative or remote, or does not tend to prove or disprove a material fact in issue at defendant's trial. In this case, the type of character evidence Giddings sought to introduce regarding the witness was speculative, inadmissible propensity evidence that was not related to the homicide, and the District Court did not err in disallowing the cross-examination. St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009), following St. v. Clifford, 2005 MT 219, 328 M 300, 121 P3d 489 (2005), and Holmes v. S. C., 547 US 319 (2006).

No Mistrial Based on Alleged Violation of Order In Limine Regarding Murder Victim's Fear of Defendant: At Giddings' homicide trial, the trial court issued an order in limine prohibiting the use of testimony or evidence concerning whether the victim disliked or was afraid of Giddings. Giddings claimed on appeal that the state violated the order three separate times during trial, warranting a mistrial, but the Supreme Court disagreed. The disputed testimony constituted only small parts of a complex 3-week trial and could not be considered the type of direct evidence of other crimes that involved prejudice to Giddings, nor did the testimony individually or collectively deny Giddings a fair trial. The District Court did not err in denying Giddings' mistrial motion. St. v. Giddings, 2009 MT 61, 349 M 347, 208 P3d 363 (2009).

No Connection Between Character Evidence and Facts of Case — Character Evidence Properly Disallowed: Plaintiff bank sought to recover money due on defendants' indebtedness incurred from bank loans for defendants' clothing business. The trial court granted defendants' motion in limine prohibiting testimony that one defendant had previously pleaded guilty to an unrelated felony and had invoked his fifth amendment rights during a deposition in a prior civil case. On appeal, plaintiff contended that excluding the defendant's prior criminal history prohibited plaintiff from effectively impeaching the defendant. The Supreme Court found no error in excluding the evidence because admission of the character evidence was prohibited by Rules 404(b) and 609, M.R.Ev., and because there was no connection between the evidence sought to be disclosed and the facts of the case. First Citizens Bank v. Sullivan, 2008 MT 428, 347 M 452, 200 P3d 39 (2008), distinguishing Cooper v. Rosston, 232 M 186, 756 P2d 1125 (1988).

Failure to Preserve Issue for Appeal by Failure to Object at Trial — Plain Error Review Inappropriate Absent Implication of Defendant's Fundamental Rights: At Price's trial for assault with a weapon, a stun gun, the trial court allowed evidence of Price's prior conviction for intimidation. Following conviction, Price appealed on grounds that the evidence was improperly introduced because the state failed to give notice of the intent to introduce other crimes evidence in violation of Price's due process rights. The state contended that Price waived the right to appeal the issue by failing to object to introduction of the evidence and by actively participating in its introduction. The Supreme Court declined to review the issue because Price failed to object to the evidence at trial and thus did not preserve the issue for appeal. Further, plain error review was inappropriate because Price's fundamental constitutional rights were not implicated by introduction of the evidence. St. v. Price, 2007 MT 269, 339 M 399, 171 P3d 293 (2007), followed in St. v. Stearns, 2008 MT 356, 346 M 348, 195 P3d 794 (2008), and St. v. Thorp, 2010 MT 92, 356 Mont. 150, 231 P3d 1096.

No Error in Admitting Evidence of Past Deviant Sexual Acts as Grooming for Future Sexual Abuse: At Marshall's trial for attempted sexual abuse of children, the trial court admitted evidence of Marshall's prior deviant sexual acts and comments over Marshall's objection that the prior acts were too spread out to constitute the same transaction and because the requirements of subsection (b) of this rule were not met. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was admissible as grooming, defined as the process of cultivating trust with a victim and gradually introducing sexual behaviors until reaching the point at which it is possible to perpetrate a sex crime against the victim. Thus, even though Marshall's prior acts may have been remote in time, grooming by definition must occur over a period of time, so the acts were inextricably linked to the charged offense. St. v. Marshall, 2007 MT 198, 338 M 395, 165 P3d 1129 (2007), followed in St. v. Bieber, 2007 MT 262, 339 M 309, 170 P3d 444 (2007), to the extent that evidence of defendant's legal acts was inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense and therefore admissible, notwithstanding the rules related to admissibility of evidence of other acts, and St. v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 M 344, 220 P3d 640 (2009). See also St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006).

Exclusion of Assault Victim's Prior Assault Record — Probative Value Outweighed by Prejudicial Effect: Grixti was arrested for family member assault against his wife. At trial, Grixti sought to introduce evidence of the wife's prior family member assault against Grixti, but the trial court granted the state's motion in limine excluding evidence of the wife's prior assault. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that evidence of a witness's prior crimes and wrongs is inadmissible to show action in conformity with the prior crime under Rule 403, M.R.Ev., but may be admissible under this rule, to prove motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident and under Rule 608, M.R.Ev., to attack a witness's character if probative of truthfulness or untruthfulness. However, in this case, the trial court found that the potential prejudicial effect of the wife's prior arrest record likely outweighed any probative value regarding the wife's character for truthfulness or untruthfulness. The Supreme Court deferred to the trial court's discretion in making evidentiary character determinations and affirmed the grant of the motion in limine. St. v. Grixti, 2005 MT 296, 329 M 330, 124 P3d 177 (2005).

Inadmissibility of Reverse 404(b) Evidence — No Prejudice to State Prosecution: Defendant contended that the trial court improperly excluded character evidence regarding another person, which could have been introduced under the seldom used "reverse 404(b) evidence" theory to identify the other person as the author of various threatening letters. Defendant claimed that exclusion of the evidence violated the right to present a defense and the right to confront witnesses. Even though there was little risk that admitting the reverse 404(b) evidence would prejudice the state, most of the evidence was propensity evidence, and the evidence in question did not meet the modified Just test for admissibility of character evidence, so the District Court did not err in refusing to admit the reverse 404(b) evidence. St. v. Clifford, 2005 MT 219, 328 M 300, 121 P3d 489 (2005).

Failure of Defendant to Establish Knowledge of Victim's Past as Element of Justifiable Use of Force — Evidence of Victim's Violent History Inadmissible: At Montgomery's negligent homicide trial, Montgomery relied on a justifiable use of force defense. Anticipating that Montgomery would seek to introduce evidence of the victim's prior acts of violence and reputation for violence, the state requested and was granted a motion in limine prohibiting use of the victim's criminal history or reputation. Following conviction, Montgomery appealed on grounds that the victim's character evidence should not have been prohibited. However, trial testimony showed that Montgomery's fear of the victim was based on the victim's behavior just before the shooting, and Montgomery failed to establish that knowledge of the victim's past led him to use lethal force. Thus, evidence of the victim's alleged violent past was irrelevant and inadmissible, and the motion in limine was properly granted. St. v. Montgomery, 2005 MT 120, 327 M 138, 112 P3d 1014 (2005). See also St. v. Daniels, 2011 MT 278, 362 Mont. 426, 265 P.3d 623, which held that although the burden of proving the absence of justification in a justifiable use of force case may shift to the state under 46-16-131, this shift does not eliminate the need for the defendant to satisfy foundational requirements under the Montana Rules of Evidence.

Photographs of Nonvictim Children Not Considered Prejudicial or Character Evidence — Probative Value Warranting Admissibility: In Bar-Jonah's aggravated kidnapping, sexual assault, and assault with a weapon trial, the trial court allowed the admission of hundreds of photographs of children seized during a search of Bar-Jonah's residence. Bar-Jonah contended that the photographs were: (1) improperly admitted because only a few were images of the victims; and (2) unfairly prejudicial and tended to erroneously reflect on Bar-Jonah's character. The Supreme Court disagreed. The photographs were relevant by linking them to Bar-Jonah's motive for befriending the victims, for enhancing the credibility of the victims, and to rebut Bar-Jonah's asserted defenses. Even if the photographs could be construed to reflect on Bar-Jonah's character, they were not introduced for that purpose, but rather to prove motive. Any prejudice to Bar-Jonah through introduction of the photographs was outweighed by their probative value, which did not present evidence of other crimes or acts. St. v. Bar-Jonah, 2004 MT 344, 324 M 278, 102 P3d 1229 (2004).

Character Evidence Improperly Admitted — Harmless Error: Defendant was charged with manufacture of dangerous drugs and sex crimes. The drug charge was severed, and defendant was convicted. When the sex crimes came to trial, the District Court allowed evidence of defendant's drug use. Defendant contended that the evidence was improperly admitted as bad character evidence because the state failed to meet the procedural requirements of the modified Just rule. The state asserted that the evidence was not admitted as character evidence, but rather admitted pursuant to the transaction rule because the drug use explained the circumstances surrounding the alleged sex offenses. The Supreme Court held that although the challenged evidence may have been relevant to explain the transaction, the evidence was improperly admitted in this case because the District Court had earlier determined that the charges were sufficiently distinct to warrant separate trials, so admission of drug use evidence in the sex crimes trial somewhat undermined the benefit that defendant gained from the earlier granting of the request for severance. Having defended against the drug charges in the first trial, defendant was faced with the evidence again. However, the Supreme Court then went on to apply the test in St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), to determine if admission of the evidence prejudiced defendant's right to a fair trial and found that the error was harmless. The evidence of drug use did not go to the proof of an element of the sex crimes, and only brief mention was made of drug use in closing arguments and then only in conjunction with other admissible evidence related to the transaction. Thus, the impact of the tainted evidence was minimal, and given other ample evidence upon which the state could develop its case, there was no reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence contributed to the conviction, which was therefore affirmed. St. v. Insua, 2004 MT 14, 319 M 254, 84 P3d 11 (2004).

Generalized Motion In Limine Insufficient to Preserve Appeal of Issue of Admissibility of Specific Prior Bad Conduct Absent Objection: Vukasin's generalized motion in limine to exclude evidence of prior crimes and bad acts was granted. Vukasin later contended that the prosecution introduced improper witness testimony of prior violent conduct that was prejudicial and prevented a fair trial. The Supreme Court noted that while a motion in limine may preserve a specification of error for appeal, the mere act of filing the motion does not negate the obligation to object and to make the basis and grounds for the objection clear to the trial court and that a trial court will not be put in error when that court does not have the opportunity to rule on the admissibility of the evidence and to correct itself. Here, Vukasin made no objection when the evidence was introduced, nor was the broad motion in limine specific enough in itself as to the basis for an objection. The motion did not identify either the specific witness or testimony to which Vukasin later objected on appeal, so the trial court was not alerted by the motion that Vukasin was objecting to the testimony given. Thus, the motion was a generalized objection that did not preserve the evidentiary issue, so appeal of the issue was waived. St. v. Vukasin, 2003 MT 230, 317 M 204, 75 P3d 1284 (2003), followed in St. v. Ferguson, 2005 MT 343, 330 M 103, 126 P3d 463 (2005), and St. v. Paoni, 2006 MT 26, 331 M 86, 128 P3d 1040 (2006). See also St. v. Stuit, 277 M 227, 921 P2d 866 (1996).

Tainted Character Evidence Considered Prejudicial — New Trial Warranted: During Nolan's trial for resisting arrest, criminal endangerment, and bail-jumping, Nolan was asked why he did not appear on the original trial date and jumped bail instead. Nolan stated that he was taking pain medication for a bad tooth and overslept, and had just started a new job and did not want to miss work because he needed the money to pay the bills and feed his children, whom he loved. Over objection, the prosecutor pursued an extended series of questions regarding Nolan's job history and personal relationships, which revealed that Nolan had fathered a number of children by several women, none of whom he had married, and that he did not pay child support because none had been ordered. Other testimony related to Nolan's character, including rebuttal testimony from one woman that Nolan acted as pimp for her prostitution activities. The state contended that Nolan opened the door to the questioning by asserting that he was a decent man and member of the community who cared about his family. Nolan contended that the cross-examination and rebuttal evidence forced him to defend his lifestyle choices and impermissibly turned a bail-jumping trial into a trial of his morals. The Supreme Court agreed with Nolan. The state's right to a full cross-examination of a defendant's character traits, once placed at issue, is not limitless. Here, the prosecutor went beyond permissible cross-examination and rebuttal and ended up trying Nolan's character. Because trial error is not presumptively prejudicial, the Supreme Court reviewed the error under 46-20-701 to determine whether the error prejudiced Nolan's case. The court concluded that the evidence was highly inflammatory and presented a significant possibility that the qualitative effect of the cross-examination and rebuttal contributed to Nolan's conviction. Because of the prejudice involved, Nolan's conviction was reversed and the case was remanded for further proceedings related to the charges. St. v. Nolan, 2003 MT 55, 314 M 371, 66 P3d 269 (2003).

Statement and Letter Related to Incest Charge Properly Admitted as Evidence: In Rodarte's incest trial, he sought to exclude statements that he made to his wife's brother that he thought that his own daughter was "hot" and that he didn't worry about sex because he could just go to another bedroom, as well as letters that he sent to his wife stating that if she and his daughter did not show up in court, he could "get off and get out". The District Court allowed the evidence, and Rodarte appealed, contending that the evidence was neither a part of the case nor an admission or confession, and thus was inadmissible. The Supreme Court disagreed. The prosecution is permitted to introduce evidence that tends to explain the circumstances surrounding the alleged offense if the evidence is relevant, probative, and competent. The evidence in this case was not wholly independent of the crime charged and tended to show guilt, so it was admissible, and Rodarte's motion for a mistrial on those grounds was properly denied. St. v. Rodarte, 2002 MT 317, 313 M 131, 60 P3d 983 (2002).

Evidence of Other Crimes, Though Prejudicial, Admissible Unless Prejudicial Effect Substantially Outweighs Probative Value: Hart argued that the lower court erred in allowing testimony alleging that he owned a cattle prod used in an assault because he made his money by shoplifting and had the prod in case he was detected stealing. The Supreme Court ruled against Hart and held that, in general, all evidence of other crimes is prejudicial, but as in the case before it, the evidence was not inadmissible under the fourth part of the modified Just rule unless its prejudicial effect substantially outweighed its probative value. St. v. Hart, 2000 MT 332, 303 M 71, 15 P3d 917, 57 St. Rep. 1398 (2000).

Only Defendant Allowed to "Open the Door" to Rebuttal Character Evidence: Gowan was charged with two felony counts of criminal sale of dangerous drugs. The state indicated that it would not rely on Gowan's prior acts or convictions. The trial court ruled that although direct evidence of a prior conviction was not admissible, the state would be allowed to ask Gowan, if he chose to testify, only if he had lied under oath in the past. At trial, Gowan's girlfriend testified, but not as a character witness. On direct examination, she offered no character testimony, but on cross-examination, she testified as to Gowan's honesty. The trial court concluded that she had opened the door to character evidence, even though the testimony was in response to cross-examination, and allowed the state to inquire whether she was aware of Gowan's perjury conviction, probation, and a suit against him for failure to deliver a vehicle title. Gowan was convicted, contending on appeal that the trial court erred in holding that the defense witness's gratuitous statement in response to cross-examination opened the door for rebuttal character evidence. The Supreme Court concluded that although a defendant can open the door with statements made during either direct or cross-examination and a defense witness can open the door on direct examination, a defense witness cannot inadvertently open the door to character evidence on cross-examination. Under subsection (a)(1) of this rule, only the accused can open the door for the prosecution to introduce rebuttal character evidence. The state argued that once the statement was made, it was necessary to counter its effect on the jury and that, as a general rule, a wide latitude should be permitted in cross-examination of an adverse witness. However, the right to a full cross-examination of a defendant's character traits, once placed at issue, is not limitless. Unless and until the accused places character at issue, the door is closed to the state to enter evidence of the defendant's character because the dangers of prejudice, confusion, and time consumption outweigh the probative value. Inquiry into the defendant's character is not rejected because character is irrelevant, but rather because it weighs too much with the jury members as to overpersuade them to prejudge a person with a bad general record and deny the opportunity to defend against a particular charge. In this case, rather than introducing rebuttal character evidence, the state should have requested that the witness confine her answers to the questions asked and that her statement be stricken from the record. Because only a defendant can open the door to rebuttal character evidence, the trial court erred in holding that the defense witness could do so in a statement made during cross-examination, something defendant had no control over. The conviction was reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial. St. v. Gowan, 2000 MT 277, 302 M 127, 13 P3d 376, 57 St. Rep. 1155 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373 (1982), and followed in St. v. Hayden, 2008 MT 274, 345 M 252, 190 P3d 1091 (2008). See also St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428.

Question of Gun Ownership — Pawnshop Records Allowed as Rebuttal to Character Evidence Regarding Defendant's Credibility: Weitzel was charged with felony assault. The state's witnesses testified that Weitzel had assaulted Brewer with a handgun. As part of Weitzel's character evidence, he testified that he did not presently own a handgun, but went on to describe how he had purchased a handgun as a gift for his brother several years earlier. Weitzel's brother confirmed that he had received a gun as a gift and corroborated that Weitzel did not presently own a handgun. Over Weitzel's objection, the District Court allowed the state to introduce, as rebuttal evidence, pawnshop records showing that Weitzel had pawned a handgun in 1996 and then retrieved it, ruling that the evidence was very relevant to Weitzel's credibility. On appeal, Weitzel alleged error in the introduction of the pawnshop records, contending that there was no basis in the record for the introduction and that the state failed to follow 46-15-322 and subsection (b) of this rule when it did not disclose the records in advance of trial. The Supreme Court held that Weitzel opened the door to the rebuttal testimony by choosing to testify as to his gun ownership. The records were properly introduced to rebut the misimpression that Weitzel had purchased only one handgun in the past, as a gift for his brother. Further, the state was not obligated to disclose its knowledge of the records before trial because the prosecution is under no statutory duty to provide pretrial notice of a witness called to impeach the credibility of a defense witness. The rebuttal evidence did not become relevant until Weitzel and his brother testified, and the state had no reason to know in advance of trial that Weitzel would defend against the charges by testifying that he did not own or possess any handguns. Once Weitzel opened the door to the question of his character, the state was not precluded from presenting rebuttal testimony without adhering to the notice requirements. St. v. Weitzel, 2000 MT 86, 299 M 192, 998 P2d 1154, 57 St. Rep. 368 (2000), following St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994), and followed in St. v. Dobrowski, 2016 MT 261, 385 Mont. 179, 382 P.3d 490.

Evidence of Victim's Statements as to Perpetrator of Crime Not Within Concept of Corpus Delicti or Res Gestae — Use of Terms "Corpus Delicti" and "Res Gestae" Discouraged: The Supreme Court extensively reviewed the use of the terms "corpus delicti" and "res gestae", examining definitions and the historical development of Montana case law referencing the concepts. Here, statements by the victim to family members and friends regarding her troubled relationship with her husband, were not within the bounds of the concept of the corpus delicti because they tended to establish the perpetrator of the crime, which is not an element of the corpus delicti, and should not have been admitted under that rule. The statements were also inadmissible under the concept of res gestae. However, the admission of the victim's statements was merely cumulative and constituted harmless error. The Supreme Court urged that these vague and imprecise terms not be used in the future and advised that the court will henceforth review claims of error in the admission of evidence by determining whether the evidence was admissible under some provision of the Montana Code Annotated or under the Montana Rules of Evidence. St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999), clarifying numerous Montana cases that have properly or improperly applied the concepts.

No Prejudice From Use of Inadmissible, but Simple and Distinct, Evidence: Southern was charged with two counts of kidnapping, one count of burglary, one count of theft, and five counts of sexual intercourse without consent. In moving to sever the nine counts in the information into four separate trials pursuant to 46-13-211, Southern argued that the prejudicial effect of the other crimes evidence substantially outweighed its probative value and thus evidence of the other crimes would not have been admissible in separate trials. It is inevitable that evidence of other crimes will have some prejudicial effect, so under the fourth part of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)), relevant evidence will be inadmissible only when its probity is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice. Pursuant to St. v. Huether, 284 M 259, 943 P2d 1291, 54 St. Rep. 872 (1997), the prejudicial effect of relevant evidence will substantially outweigh the probative value when the evidence will prompt the jury to decide the case on an improper basis. Thus, evidence is inadmissible under the fourth part of the modified Just rule if it arouses the jury's sympathy for one side without regard to its probative value, if it confuses or misleads the jury, or if it distracts the jury from the main issues in the case. Prejudice arising from the use of inadmissible evidence will not be found when the evidence is simple and distinct. Even though the other crimes evidence in Southern's case would have been prejudicial, the jury was instructed that each count was a distinct offense and had to be decided separately. There was nothing in the record to suggest that the jury did not keep the relevant evidence separate. Since the other crimes evidence was simple and distinct and would have been admissible at separate trials, Southern failed to establish that the jury used evidence of guilt on one charge to convict him of other charges on the theory that the evidence would have been inadmissible in trials on the other charges. St. v. Southern, 1999 MT 94, 294 M 225, 980 P2d 3, 56 St. Rep. 395 (1999).

Evidence of Unrelated Assault Allowed Because of Defense Opening Door: The defense questioned a state witness about the witness's frequent moves, implying that the witness moved because of involvement in the drug culture. The state on redirect examination allowed the witness to testify that she moved often because the defendant had assaulted her once because of her knowledge of the defendant's guilt. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's admission of the testimony on the grounds that the defense had opened the door during its cross-examination of the witness. St. v. Berger, 1998 MT 170, 290 M 78, 964 P2d 725, 55 St. Rep. 686 (1998).

Evidence of Victim's Character and Prior Violent Act Inadmissible as Element of Self-Defense: Sattler claimed that his homicide of Martinson was in self-defense and sought to introduce evidence of a prior act of violence that was committed by Martinson 8 years before his death as proof of Martinson's aggressiveness and Sattler's need to use force in his defense. However, nothing in 45-3-102 relates directly to the question of the identity of the aggressor as an essential element of the justifiable use of force defense. Further, evidence of the prior act did not support any claim that the force used against Martinson was reasonable based on Sattler's knowledge of Martinson's history of violence. Also, the act was remote in time, and the lapse of time between the prior act and Martinson's death rendered the probity of the act minimal at best. Refusing to admit the evidence would not have resulted in prejudicial and reversible error or affected Sattler's substantial rights in light of the other evidence of record. Thus, reversal was not warranted. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998). See also St. v. Benton, 251 M 401, 825 P2d 565 (1992).

In St. v. Branham, 2012 MT 1, 363 Mont. 281, 269 P.3d 891, the defendant asserted the defense of justifiable use of force and argued that evidence of the victim's character that was unknown to the defendant when he committed the offense was admissible to show that the victim was the aggressor. The Supreme Court concluded that evidence of the victim's character was limited to facts known to the defendant at the time he committed the offense and overruled St. v. Harville, 2006 MT 292, 334 Mont. 380, 147 P.3d 22, St. v. Russell, 2001 MT 278, 307 Mont. 322, 37 P.3d 678, and St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 Mont. 79, 956 P.2d 54, to the extent that those cases held that the identity of the aggressor is an essential element of the defense of justifiable use of force.

Evidence of Son's SIDS Death Relevant in Homicide Trial Following Daughter's Death — Just Notice Not Required: The prosecution sought to introduce evidence that, only 7 months prior to the death of his infant daughter, Huether's 7-month-old son had died of sudden infant death syndrome (SIDS) while in Huether's care. The trial court allowed the evidence pursuant to subsection (b) of this rule. On appeal, the Supreme Court found that the evidence was improperly admitted pursuant to subsection (b) because the trial court misconstrued the evidence, which did not pertain to other crimes, wrongs, or acts. However, the evidence was nevertheless admissible pursuant to Rule 402, M.R.Ev., because it was relevant to the question of whether Huether, in caring for his daughter, consciously disregarded a risk of which the death of his son should have made him aware. The probative value of the evidence outweighed its prejudicial effect. Because the evidence was not subsection (b) "other crimes" or character evidence but, rather, relevant circumstantial evidence, the prosecution was not required to comply with the Just notice provisions. St. v. Huether, 284 M 259, 943 P2d 1291, 54 St. Rep. 872 (1997).

Admission of Evidence of Prior Game Farm (now Alternative Livestock Ranch) Acts Proper: The District Court did not err in admitting evidence of prior game farm (now alternative livestock ranch) acts and in limiting references to those acts and not to any subsequent convictions since the earlier case was still pending on appeal because: (1) the prior acts were sufficiently similar, although not identical, to those for which defendant was presently charged; (2) the acts, although occurring 3 years prior, were not so remote as to be inadmissible because of the similarity of the acts; and (3) the state's purpose in introducing the evidence was to establish absence of mistake or accident regarding defendant's possession of unlawfully taken wildlife. St. v. Brogan, 272 M 156, 900 P2d 284, 52 St. Rep. 636 (1995). See also St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991), and St. v. Romero, 261 M 221, 861 P2d 929 (1993).

Denial of Motion In Limine in Presence of Jury Without Comment on Evidence — No Error: Before the state began to question a sexual assault victim about similar assaults by defendant, the trial court ruled against defendant's motion in limine to exclude the evidence, in the presence of the jury, and then properly instructed the jury that it could not consider the evidence to prove defendant's character in order to show that he acted in conformity with that character in the charged offense. Defendant claimed that ruling on the motion in the jury's presence constituted an improper comment on the evidence, pursuant to St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918 (1984). The Supreme Court distinguished Liddell because the court's statement in this case was not an obvious comment on the evidence and did not improperly draw the jury's attention to the evidence. Denial of the motion in limine in the jury's presence was not error. St. v. Hildreth, 267 M 423, 884 P2d 771, 51 St. Rep. 1086 (1994).

Admission of Evidence of Prior Fires — Improperly Introduced: Defendants were prosecuted and found guilty of criminal mischief in relation to a fire that destroyed their mobile home. At the trial, there was no direct evidence linking defendants with intentionally causing the fire. The state was allowed to introduce evidence of several other fires in buildings owned or occupied by defendants in the previous 7 years. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded on the grounds that the admittance of evidence of the prior fires unfairly prejudiced defendants because no evidence existed that linked them with intentionally causing the prior fires. The prior fires are not other crimes, wrongs, or acts under this rule. St. v. Johnson, 250 M 496, 821 P2d 1039, 48 St. Rep. 1063 (1991), followed in St. v. Enright, 1998 MT 322, 292 M 204, 974 P2d 1118, 55 St. Rep. 1308 (1998), and St. v. Link, 1999 MT 4, 293 M 23, 974 P2d 1124, 56 St. Rep. 13 (1999).

Community Involvement of Developer as Inadmissible Evidence in Real Estate Transaction Suit: This rule has no application in a civil case unless the character trait sought to be placed in evidence is an essential element of the charge, claim, or defense. In a suit involving a complex three-way property exchange between defendants (developer and builders) and plaintiff purchasers, it was error to allow developer to testify as to his community activities. Developer's character was not at issue, and the testimony was thus irrelevant. Vestre v. Lambert, 249 M 455, 817 P2d 219, 48 St. Rep. 769 (1991).

Character Testimony on Rebuttal: When defendant had his aikido instructor testify as to defendant's training and nonaggressiveness, the state could offer testimony of defendant's prior crimes and alleged acts. Character having been put in issue, it was properly rebutted under subsection (a)(1) of this rule. St. v. Baker, 249 M 156, 815 P2d 587, 48 St. Rep. 685 (1991), followed in St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Evidence of Prior Misconduct — Single Similar Act Admissible: In a trial for deliberate homicide, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in allowing evidence of an incident that occurred 3 years prior to the crime when defendant threatened suicide over the breakup of his marriage and when he momentarily pointed a gun at a police officer. The linchpin for determining whether a single instance of prior conduct is sufficient to prove intent is relevancy based on similarity. St. v. Sadowski, 247 M 63, 805 P2d 537, 48 St. Rep. 93 (1991), discussed in St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1, 52 St. Rep. 729 (1995).

Letter From Prison Not Evidence of Other Crimes Warranting Inadmissibility of Letter: Defendant admitted in a letter written to his wife from prison that he intimately touched his stepdaughter. The letter was later introduced on direct examination of his wife to prove authenticity of the letter. His imprisonment was mentioned three times at trial; however, the underlying offense was never mentioned. The fact that he was in prison when he wrote the letter was not introduced to prove his character, and the references to his imprisonment were insignificant and nonprejudicial in light of the entire record. Therefore, the District Court properly admitted the fact that defendant was in prison when he wrote the letter. St. v. Kao, 245 M 263, 800 P2d 714, 47 St. Rep. 2100 (1990).

Evidence of Prior Acts Admissible for Rebuttal: The defendant argued that testimony of his ex-wife that he did have an interest in anal intercourse was inadmissible as evidence of other acts. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was introduced to rebut the defendant's contention that he had no interest in anal sex and therefore was admissible. St. v. Newman, 242 M 315, 790 P2d 971, 47 St. Rep. 711 (1990).

Character Not Put Into Issue by Defendant — Evidence as to Reputation Reversible Error: When the defendant did not put his character or community reputation into issue so as to open the door and allow the state to present character evidence in its case in chief, it was improper to admit hearsay, opinion, and reputation evidence of the defendant's bad character as relating to his disposition to commit the crime with which he was charged. Admission of the evidence constituted reversible error. St. v. Gommenginger, 242 M 265, 790 P2d 455, 47 St. Rep. 681 (1990). However, see St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992), in which even though admission of character testimony offered by the prosecution was error, conviction was affirmed because the testimony was not prejudicial and the error was therefore harmless. Bower was followed in St. v. Carter, 285 M 449, 948 P2d 1173, 54 St. Rep. 1235 (1997).

Admissibility of Evidence of Similar Injury Occurring Six Years Before: A railroad employee sued the railroad for injuries he received on the job. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's admission of evidence of a similar accident that happened 6 years prior to the plaintiff's injury. The court found that both accidents involved a laborer working under the same foreman, lifting rail ties manually and thereby injuring his back. The evidence was held admissible to show the existence of danger and notice thereof. Kalanick v. Burlington N. RR Co., 242 M 45, 788 P2d 901, 47 St. Rep. 532 (1990).

Error in Admission of Evidence Cured Upon Jury Admonishment: An error in the admission of evidence may be cured if the jury is admonished to disregard it. St. v. Conrad, 241 M 1, 785 P2d 185, 47 St. Rep. 32 (1990), followed in St. v. Ford, 278 M 353, 926 P2d 245, 53 St. Rep. 947 (1996).

Motion In Limine Regarding Character Evidence — Opening Door by Defense: Prior to trial, defendant filed a motion in limine requesting in part that the state be precluded from offering evidence of any character trait of defendant, other than credibility. The motion was granted with the understanding that the state might use such evidence for cross-examination or rebuttal, after obtaining the court's permission outside the presence of the jury. When the defense first raised the issue of defendant's character, his use of alcohol, and his state of mind on the night in question, it was not a violation of the motion in limine for the state to respond to that evidence on cross-examination. The evidence was held nonprejudicial by the trial court because: (1) it was character evidence of a general nature; and (2) defense counsel did not object until the questions had been asked and answered. St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 860, 45 St. Rep. 1901 (1988).

Reciprocal Duty of Good Faith and Fair Dealing Between Employer and Employee — Character of Employee Relevant to Expectation of Job Security: The Supreme Court applied the holding in Los Angeles Mem. Coliseum Comm'n v. NFL, 791 F2d 1356 (9th Cir. 1986), in finding that the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing mandated a reciprocal duty in the employment relationship, applicable to both employer and employee. Breach by one party served to negate any breach by the other party, so that neither party was entitled to recovery. This rule applied only narrowly to factual contexts where both breaches concerned the same issue and occurred during one episode of the relationship. In the present case, an employee who breached the covenant could not then complain of unfair dealing by the employer. The District Court improperly excluded evidence of specific misconduct related to the employee's character because the alleged misconduct was relevant to whether the employee had a reasonable expectation of job security and could thus claim protection under the covenant. Barrett v. ASARCO Inc., 234 M 229, 763 P2d 27, 45 St. Rep. 1865 (1988). See also Story v. Bozeman, 259 M 207, 856 P2d 202, 50 St. Rep. 761 (1993), Flanigan v. Prudential Fed. S&L, 221 M 419, 720 P2d 257, 43 St. Rep. 941 (1986), and Dare v. Mont. Petroleum Mktg. Co., 212 M 274, 687 P2d 1015, 41 St. Rep. 1735 (1984).

Adequacy of Notice of Intent to Introduce Evidence of Prior Acts Six Days Prior to Trial: The state's notice of intent to introduce evidence of prior acts, which was given 6 days prior to trial, met the requirement of timely notice. St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987).

Defendant Portrayed as Loving Husband — Videotaped Testimony Concerning Extramarital Affair Admissible: The District Court did not err in allowing videotaped testimony of defendant's former lover concerning an extramarital affair when defendant himself opened the door on the relevance of character evidence by portraying himself as a loving husband. The videotaped testimony was relevant to rebuttal and motive. St. v. Atlas, 224 M 92, 728 P2d 421, 43 St. Rep. 2042 (1986).

Expert Testimony — Character Evidence: A physician's expert testimony about the defendant dentist's ability to recognize and treat infections and his capability and conscientiousness as a dentist was not impermissible character evidence and was properly admitted on cross-examination. Ostermiller v. Alvord, 222 M 208, 720 P2d 1198, 43 St. Rep. 1180 (1986).

Pretrial Order Allowing Use of Evidence of Other Crimes Appealable: A pretrial order denying a motion in limine to preclude the state from using evidence of other crimes pursuant to Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., is appealable within the scope of 46-20-103. St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986).

Cross-Examination of Character Witness — Reference to Prior Acts: Defendant's character witness was a private investigator who testified that defendant was truthful and had no prior criminal record. On cross-examination, the witness volunteered that he checked out a charge against defendant in another state and that "it came back negative". On appeal, defendant asserted that the cross-examination was improper under Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., and constituted grounds for mistrial. The court disagreed, holding that defendant put his character at issue and that it was a proper subject for cross-examination by the state under Rule 404(a), M.R.Ev. Defendant attempted to prove his reputation under Rule 405, M.R.Ev., by testimony of a private investigator. The District Court did not err in allowing cross-examination on the issue of defendant's purported lack of prior crimes. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985).

Character Evidence in Civil Case: In a wrongful death action arising out of a head-on collision, plaintiff attempted to introduce evidence that the driver of the truck had been fired from a bus driving job for being late for work. This evidence is relevant only to prove a character trait of the driver. Character evidence of this nature is specifically proscribed. In a criminal case, the accused may introduce evidence of his good character and the prosecution may introduce rebuttal evidence. This rule has no application in civil cases unless the character trait is an essential element of the charge, claim, or defense. A character trait of tardiness is not an essential element of an action alleging negligent driving. Lindberg v. Leatham Bros., Inc., 215 M 11, 693 P2d 1234, 42 St. Rep. 137 (1985).

Doctor's Testimony Concerning Defendant's State of Mind — Not Character Evidence: A doctor's testimony that, in his opinion, the defendant had the capacity to act purposefully and knowingly at the time of the crime was properly admissible as his professional opinion as an expert witness. The doctor's testimony was not character evidence. St. v. Doll, 214 M 390, 692 P2d 473, 42 St. Rep. 40 (1985).

Factual Testimony Not Offered to Prove Character Traits: Testimony of the defendant's father concerning the defendant's childhood circumstances, marital history, and education level was not inadmissible as evidence of the defendant's character or a trait of his character; it was not prejudicial to him, nor was evidence of the defendant's extramarital affair. It was properly offered to negate the defendant's claim of mitigating circumstances in his trial for deliberate homicide. St. v. Doll, 214 M 390, 692 P2d 473, 42 St. Rep. 40 (1985).

Sex Crime Defendant's Character Testimony — Rebuttal by Minor Nonvictim Female: The major aim of the testimony for defendant charged with sexual assault was that he never engaged in improper sexual activity with the victims or anyone else and that he was a person of high morality. Thus the State could use the testimony of a minor nonvictim female to rebut his testimony. She testified to sleeping in defendant's bed while he was present and naked. St. v. Anderson, 211 M 272, 686 P2d 193, 41 St. Rep. 1357 (1984).

Deliberate Homicide — Prior Acts of Discipline Toward Child Admissible: Defendant was charged with and convicted of the deliberate homicide of the 19-month-old child of the woman with whom he was living. On appeal, defendant attacked the testimony of witnesses relating to other crimes, wrongs, or acts by him toward the child on the grounds that the elements required in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), were not met. The Supreme Court said, when a battered child is the victim, the pattern of conduct exhibited by the defendant-caretaker toward the child victim is within the scope of the issues before the court. The only available link between the specific nature of the child's injuries and the caretaker may be the evidence of prior abusive conduct by the caretaker. Under Rule 406, M.R.Ev., the acts habitually performed by defendant in response to his perceived need for discipline of the child were admissible. As a matter of habit, his discipline of the child was excessively harsh. There was no error in allowing witnesses to testify to the disciplinary acts administered by defendant to the child. St. v. Sigler, 210 M 248, 688 P2d 749, 41 St. Rep. 1039 (1984), followed in St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987), and St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 483, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Imputing Criminal Record — Unrelated to Relevant Character — Denial of Fair Trial: Defendant was convicted of the felony theft of an air compressor. On appeal, defendant contended that the suggestion by the prosecution on cross-examination that he had an FBI criminal record was prejudicial. The Supreme Court held that imputing to a defendant by implication a criminal record unrelated to any trait of character involved in the offense charged denied the defendant a fair trial. St. v. Kramp, 200 M 383, 651 P2d 614, 39 St. Rep. 1819 (1982).

Evidence of Threats Against Homicide Defendant — Showing of Self-Defense a Necessary Foundation: Defendant charged with deliberate homicide did not admit the killing, and therefore no issue of whether he acted in self-defense was raised at the trial. Before he could introduce evidence that victim and members of her family had in the past made threats against defendant, he had to introduce evidence that he acted in self-defense. Thus, the trial court properly refused to admit evidence of the threats. St. v. Cartwright, 200 M 91, 650 P2d 758, 39 St. Rep. 1598 (1982).

Child Beating Death — Common Design — Other Acts: Defendants were members of a religious sect that practiced violent child discipline techniques. While caring for a child at different times, each of four defendants engaged in incidences of child beating, eventually leading to the child's death. It was not error to admit evidence of the acts by church members other than defendants and acts by the defendants against children other than the victim to show the common design toward disciplining children by beatings arising out of the church policy. The evidence also provided proof of defendants' motive, intent, and plan. St. v. Powers, 198 M 289, 645 P2d 1357, 39 St. Rep. 989 (1982).

Admissibility of Character and Other Crimes Evidence When Defendant "Opens Door" on Cross-Examination: Where defendant on cross-examination stated he was not the kind of person who could commit the crime of which he was accused, evidence of character was admissible because defendant opened the door to rebuttal evidence by his statement. When defendant on cross-examination further stated he had never committed a burglary, evidence of prior burglary conviction was admissible for the same reason. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982).

Testimony That Defendant Smoked Marijuana With County Attorney — Other Offense — Inadmissible: The State moved to exclude defendant's testimony that he had smoked marijuana with the County Attorney the night before the offense (deliberate homicide and obstructing justice). The trial court in excluding the offered evidence reasoned that it was not relevant, or if relevant, that its probative value was outweighed by its prejudicial effect. The Supreme Court affirmed the District Court. St. v. Beachman, 189 M 400, 616 P2d 337, 37 St. Rep. 1558 (1980).

Evidence of Party's Companion's Criminal Record: After a jury found plaintiff not guilty of shoplifting, she brought a false arrest suit against Buttrey Food, Inc. In the false arrest suit, Buttrey was allowed to introduce evidence of plaintiff's companion's reputation and past criminal record for shoplifting. On appeal, the Supreme Court said that the right to detain and arrest by a merchant depends on reasonable cause for belief that shoplifting has occurred and not merely on the ground that one of the persons has a reputation for shoplifting. The evidence should have been excluded. Duran v. Buttrey Food, Inc., 189 M 381, 616 P2d 327, 37 St. Rep. 1545 (1980).

Evidence of Prior Wrongs: Evidence that defendant had full knowledge of revocation of outfitting license was admissible under subsection (b) of this rule to show defendant was not acting under mistake or accident. St. v. Leighty, 179 M 366, 588 P2d 526, 35 St. Rep. 2017 (1978).

OTHER CRIMES — GENERALLY

Motive Proper Basis for Admission of Evidence of Similar Crime Committed Out-of-State — Evidence Admissible to Establish Defendant's Specific Pattern of Behavior. St. v. Stryker, 2023 MT 63, 412 Mont. 1, 527 P.3d 606.

Improper Prosecutorial Misconduct — Inadmissible Evidence — No Prejudicial Impact to Fair Trial — No Abuse of Discretion: In a trial concerning a defendant who pulled a knife on two probation and parole officers, the District Court did not abuse its discretion in denying a motion for mistrial for an assault on a peace officer based on a prosecutor's opening statement referencing the defendant's "felony probation" and a later remark by a prosecution witness about the defendant's prior prisoner incarceration. Although the prosecutor's remark invited the jury to speculate about the defendant's prior felony, and although the prosecutor prompted the prosecution witness, eliciting improper and irrelevant information about the defendant's prior time in prison, the effect of the improper statements did not prejudice the defendant's right to a fair and impartial trial because admissible evidence allowed the inevitable inference that the defendant had previously been incarcerated, there was ample evidence of the defendant's violent actions in the probation office, and the District Court issued a cautionary instruction advising the jury not to convict the defendant based on perceived criminal propensity. St. v. Erickson, 2021 MT 320, 406 Mont. 524, 500 P.3d 1243.

Unfair Prejudice Can Outweigh Probative Value: A defendant bought alcohol for an 18-year-old, who became so intoxicated he required hospitalization. At the defendant's trial for criminal endangerment, the jury was presented with evidence that the defendant had previously provided alcohol to minors, which led to a drunk driving car accident that killed one of the minors. The prior conviction was limited to establishing the defendant's knowledge that providing alcohol to persons under age 21 is dangerous. However, the Supreme Court noted the presentation of the information of the past death was too prejudicial to be overcome by a cautionary instruction and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Fleming, 2019 MT 237, 397 Mont 345, 449 P.3d 1234.

Bifurcation of Trial for Aggravated DUI — Appropriate When Aggravating Factor Is Prior DUIs: The defendant in a trial for aggravated DUI had two prior DUI convictions. She requested that the trial be bifurcated so that if the jury found her guilty of driving under the influence of alcohol in the particular instance at issue in the first phase of trial, then the state could introduce evidence of her prior convictions in the second phase of trial. The Justice Court denied the request and allowed the state to discuss the prior DUIs in the opening and closing statements and during testimony. The District Court affirmed the Justice Court's decision. The Supreme Court reversed and remanded, concluding that the introduction of the prior convictions was inherently prejudicial under Rules 403, 404(b), and 609, M.R.Ev. Because the aggravated DUI statute requires the commission of a "standard" DUI plus the existence of an aggravating factor, the Supreme Court found that bifurcation was a solution that would both remove unfair prejudice from the defendant and allow the state to present each element of the defense to the jury. St. v. Holland, 2019 MT 128, 396 Mont. 94, 443 P.3d 519.

Evidence of Other Crimes to Show Character — Admissible After Contradictory Testimony Elicited by Defense on Cross-Examination: Over the defendant's objection, the state offered evidence of the defendant's prior assault against the victim's brother. The Supreme Court agreed with the District Court's finding that counsel for the defense opened the door by implying through cross-examination that the victim was not afraid of the defendant and did not believe it was unsafe to return home after disclosing to her mother that she had been sexually assaulted by the defendant. The evidence of the prior assault was necessary in order to explain the relationship between the victim and the defendant and to “correct a misimpression”. St. v. Clemans, 2018 MT 187, 392 Mont. 214, 422 P.3d 1210.

Transaction Rule — Evidence of Defendant’s Gang Affiliations Properly Admitted — Evidence of Outstanding Warrant Not Grounds for Mistrial: The defendant was convicted of aggravated burglary and four counts of assault with a weapon. The crimes related to the defendant’s attempts to recruit a former gang member to commit gang-related crimes. The defendant appealed the conviction, arguing that the District Court should not have admitted evidence relating to his gang affiliation because the prejudicial effect outweighed its probative value. The defendant also argued that the District Court should have granted his motion for a mistrial, following disclosure by a law enforcement witness that the defendant had an active warrant. The Supreme Court upheld the conviction, holding that evidence of the defendant’s gang affiliation was central to the jury’s understanding of what transpired, was allowed under the transaction rule, and was inextricably linked to and explanatory of the state’s charges against him and the danger of unfair prejudice was not outweighed by its probative value. The court further held that the mention of the defendant’s outstanding warrant was properly cured by an instruction from the District Court and there was no reasonable possibility that inadmissible evidence contributed to the defendant’s conviction. St. v. Michelotti, 2018 MT 158, 392 Mont. 33, 420 P.3d 1020.

Admission of Subsequent Drug Charges in Another State Highly Prejudicial — Failure to Exclude Charges Reversible Error — New Trial Required: The defendant was arrested in Montana and charged with four drug-related charges. Prior to his trial in Montana, the defendant was charged in Utah for other drug charges. At trial, the defendant objected to the admittance of the Utah drug charges, which were admitted to prove an element of an offense: that the money the defendant had in his vehicle at the time of his arrest in Montana was to be used in the distribution of drugs. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed with the defendant that the Utah drug charges’ prejudicial nature substantially outweighed the probative value of the evidence. Because the state could not point to any admissible evidence that would prove the same facts as the tainted evidence, the Supreme Court held there was a reasonable probability that the admission of the Utah drug charges contributed to the defendant’s conviction, and the state failed to demonstrate that the error was harmless. The Supreme Court held that the District Court abused its discretion in admitting the Utah drug charges and reversed and remanded the case for a new trial. St. v. Buckles, 2018 MT 150, 391 Mont. 511, 420 P.3d 511.

Evidence of Plea Agreement for Previous Incident Excluded — Defendant Unable to Impeach Witness With Motive to Testify Falsely — Mistrial Declared: Prior to trial, a defendant driver filed notice of his intent to use a passenger’s plea agreement and prior drug charges to prove the contraband at issue belonged to the passenger and not the driver. The passenger had faced a potential 147-year sentence for a previous incident combined with the incident at issue and had received an agreement from the state for 7 years with 2 years suspended. The sentencing judge was not bound by the agreement, and the passenger had not been sentenced at the time of the defendant driver’s trial. During the trial, the District Court erred by excluding evidence of the plea agreement and curtailing cross-examination of the passenger after the passenger stated she had not received a favorable deal because the plea agreement was offered not to show the passenger’s criminal disposition but rather to impeach the passenger’s credibility and show her motive for testifying against the driver. Because the error was prejudicial, the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Flowers, 2018 MT 96, 391 Mont. 237, 416 P.3d 180.

Brief Reference to Defendant’s Past Conduct — Denial of Motion for Mistrial — No Error: At trial, a deputy made a single reference to knowledge of the alleged victim that the defendant had been violent in the past. The District Court gave a cautionary instruction explaining that the reference was not an attempt to prove conformity to character but to demonstrate that the victim’s state of mind caused her to act as she did, including a 9-month delay in reporting the assault. Because the defendant’s arguments did not establish that he was denied a fair and impartial trial, the District Court did not err in denying the defendant’s motion for a mistrial. St. v. Ankeny, 2018 MT 91, 391 Mont. 176, 417 P.3d 275.

Defendant’s Letters to Victim Mentioning Prior Bad Acts — Probative Value Not Substantially Outweighed by Prejudice: Several letters were admitted at trial from the defendant to the alleged victim that contained the defendant’s apologies, near admissions to the charges, requests that the victim drop the charges, and indications of the defendant’s abusive, controlling relationship with the victim. Although the defendant mentioned prior bad acts, the references were minimal, vaguely stated, and closely woven with his promises to change his behavior. The District Court issued a cautionary instruction concerning the prior acts. The probative value of the letters was substantial, demonstrating his consciousness of guilt and tending to corroborate the victim's version of the incidents, demonstrating a typical domestic violence cycle of abuse, and helping explain why the victim delayed reporting the criminal incidents for 9 months. Thus, the District Court did not abuse its discretion by admitting the letters or by concluding that the letters' probative value was not substantially outweighed by prejudice to the defendant. St. v. Ankeny, 2018 MT 91, 391 Mont. 176, 417 P.3d 275.

Deceptive Practices — Proper Introduction of Evidence of Prior Convictions to Show Lack of Mistake and Intent to Deceive: The defendant was charged with felony deceptive practices for cashing several thousand dollars in dishonored checks. At trial, the prosecution introduced evidence of the defendant's two prior convictions for fraudulent deceptive practices over her objection. She argued that the evidence did not show that she knew she had acted fraudulently or deceptively; however, the state successfully maintained that the evidence demonstrated her history of victimization. Following her conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the District Court had abused its discretion in allowing evidence of her prior convictions. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that evidence of her prior convictions was relevant to knowledge, intent, and absence of mistake under Rule 401, M.R.Ev. St. v. Reopelle, 2017 MT 196, 388 Mont. 271, 399 P.3d 903.

Evidence of Prior Convictions — Aggravated DUI — No Unlawful Prejudice at Trial: Evidence of a prior DUI conviction in an aggravated DUI proceeding is a substantive requirement that the state must prove beyond a reasonable doubt to secure a conviction, rather than a recidivism element used as a sentencing consideration. Therefore, although it was prejudicial, the defendant's driving record indicating his prior DUI convictions was not erroneously admitted at trial because it was proof of a statutory element of the offense. St. v. Meyer, 2017 MT 124, 387 Mont. 422, 396 P.3d 1265, distinguished in St. v. Holland, 2019 MT 128, 396 Mont. 94, 443 P.3d 519, in which the introduction of prior DUI convictions was found unduly prejudicial. However, see St. v. Zimmerman, 2018 MT 94, 391 Mont. 210, 417 P.3d 289, distinguishing Meyer when a defendant stipulates to his prior DUI convictions as an element of the offense and holding that the District Court erred by admitting evidence of prior DUI convictions to establish the offense of aggravated DUI under those circumstances.

Evidence Showing Motive, Purpose, Mental State, Particular Patterns — No Abuse of Discretion: By admitting evidence of the defendant's lengthy and detailed process to systematically obtain control over victims, groom them for abuse, abuse them, and coerce secrecy about the abuse, the District Court did not abuse its discretion because the defendant's longstanding sexual fixation with underage teen girls showed motive, the defendant's actions intended to set up or abuse the victims showed both purpose and mental state, and the evidence showed that the defendant employed particular patterns to enable sexual assault. In admitting the evidence, the District Court properly fulfilled its gatekeeping function. St. v. Daffin, 2017 MT 76, 387 Mont. 154, 392 P.3d 150.

Character Evidence Allowed After Defense Elicits Contradictory Testimony: The defendant, who was charged with homicide, argued that the District Court had abused its discretion by admitting evidence of a prior assault against his wife. Although the state and the defense had stipulated that the evidence would not be introduced, at the trial the defense counsel solicited testimony from the defendant's wife on direct examination that the defendant was "the protector of the family" and that he was "old-school" and "very traditional". The state then argued that the defense had opened the door to the defendant's character, and the District Court allowed it to examine the wife about the assault. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, agreeing that the defense had elicited testimony about the defendant's character, which then allowed the state to rebut it with evidence of the assault. St. v. Kaarma, 2017 MT 24, 386 Mont. 243, 390 P.3d 609.

Testimony Related to Abuse Two Decades Earlier Relevant — Motion in Limine Properly Denied: The defendant was charged with sexually abusing a child. During discovery, the state notified the defendant that it would call the defendant's sister to testify about his sexual abuse of her as a child, for which he was convicted in 1995. The defendant filed a motion in limine to exclude her testimony under Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. The state argued that the sister's testimony was relevant to prove the defendant's intent and absence of mistake. The defendant argued that the sister's assault was remote in time and not similar to the current crime. The District Court denied the motion, and the defendant was convicted of sexual assault. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed the denial of the motion in limine, ruling that the sister's testimony was relevant and that its probative value was not outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice regardless of how long ago the abuse had occurred. St. v. Given, 2015 MT 273, 381 Mont. 115, 359 P.3d 90.

Testimony Regarding Prior Charges of Which Defendant Was Acquitted — Use of Testimony Prejudicial: The defendant was charged with sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault of an 11-year-old girl. During the defendant’s trial, the prosecutor sought to introduce evidence of an earlier charge against the defendant of sexually assaulting a 5-year-old, of which he had been acquitted. Against the defendant’s objection, the court allowed testimony regarding the other charge to help explain why the victim had waited for 4 years before coming forward with her allegations. However, at trial, the prosecution expanded the use of the testimony and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court agreed with the defendant that he was entitled to a new trial given the misuse of this highly inflammatory testimony, which was unfairly prejudicial to the defendant. St. v. Franks, 2014 MT 273, 376 Mont. 431, 335 P.3d 725, distinguished in St. v. Colburn, 2018 MT 141, 391 Mont. 449, 409 P.3d 1196.

Defense Claims Brutal Rape Accidental — Evidence of Prior Bad Acts Admissible to Refute Argument: The defendant was charged with brutally raping his girlfriend. During discovery, the state informed the defendant that it intended to introduce earlier police reports of alleged physical abuse by the defendant against the victim and his former girlfriend. At trial, the defendant made a motion in limine to prevent the prosecutor from presenting evidence regarding prior bad acts. The District Court denied the motion and the defendant was convicted. On appeal, the defendant argued that the District Court had erred in allowing the evidence, but the Supreme Court disagreed. Because the defendant had argued that he and the victim had consensual but very rough sex and that any harm to her was accidental, evidence of prior bad acts was probative to refute his claim. St. v. Crider, 2014 MT 139, 375 Mont. 187, 328 P.3d 612.

Evidence of Prior Rape Conviction Introduced at Trial — Violation of Right to Fair Trial: During his trial on charges of sexual intercourse without consent, the defendant gave notice that he intended to establish that the victim, with whom he had been in a long-term relationship, had a violent character. The defendant was advised that were he to discuss her character, his own full criminal history could be discussed at trial. During the trial, the prosecutor mentioned the defendant’s prior rape conviction. After his conviction, the defendant appealed, arguing that the discussion of his prior rape conviction violated his right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court agreed, noting that there was a reasonable possibility that the evidence of his prior rape conviction had influenced the defendant’s conviction, and remanded the matter for a new trial. St. v. Rogers, 2013 MT 221, 371 Mont. 239, 306 P.3d 348.

Single Unsolicited Comment About Felony DUI by Witness — No Grounds for Mistrial: The defendant was convicted of his fifth DUI. Prior to the trial, the District Court had granted the defendant’s motions in limine to prohibit any reference to the charge as a felony or any discussion of prior bad acts of the defendant. During the trial and unsolicited by the state, an officer started to testify about what he usually did in felony DUI cases. The defendant objected and moved for a mistrial based on the officer’s comment. The District Court denied the motion and the defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that in light of the compelling evidence against the defendant, the officer’s solitary comment did not contribute to the defendant’s conviction. St. v. Bollman, 2012 MT 49, 364 Mont. 265, 272 P.3d 650.

Effective Assistance — No Prejudice From Mention of Potential DUI Charge: The defendant appealed her conviction of assault on a peace officer, claiming that she received ineffective assistance of counsel when her attorney failed to move for a mistrial after the state’s witnesses referenced the defendant’s potential DUI charge. The Supreme Court affirmed, concluding that the defendant’s defense was not prejudiced by a reference to her potential DUI charge because she was on trial only for assault on a peace officer and failed to demonstrate that she was prejudiced by her counsel’s alleged deficiency. Overwhelming evidence of the defendant’s guilt overcame any prejudice resulting from the witnesses’ testimony, and admonitions to the jury to not consider the witnesses’ testimony relating to the DUI helped cure any minor prejudice. St. v. Miner, 2012 MT 20, 364 Mont. 1, 271 P.3d 56.

Just/Matt Rule Overruled: Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., does not contain a notice provision as required by the Just/Matt precedent, and thus the Just/Matt precedent is overruled with respect to the notice requirements. In contrast, Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., prohibits a theory of admissibility that specifically uses evidence of other crimes, wrongs, acts, or propensity to show a defendant’s character or actions in conformity with that character on a particular occasion. St. v. 18th Judicial District Court, 2010 MT 263, 358 Mont. 325, 246 P.3d 415. See also St. v. Stewart, 2012 MT 317, 367 Mont. 503, 291 P.3d 1187.

No Requirement That All Uncharged Acts Be Similar or Near In Time to Charged Act: When a defendant raises a Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., objection, the court should analyze whether the evidence is relevant for a purpose that does not involve drawing an impermissible inference of action in conformity with a trait of character. St. v. 18th Judicial District Court, 2010 MT 263, 358 Mont. 325, 246 P.3d 415.

Other Acts Under Modified Just Rule Limited to Acts of Defendant: In a trial in which the defendant was charged with felony assault with a weapon, the District Court erred in admitting evidence that the defendant's wife had abused one of the couple's sons as evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts pursuant to the modified Just rule. All four criteria of the modified Just rule must be satisfied in order to admit evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts, and unless the defendant is attempting to inculcate another person for the crime, the acts must be the acts of the defendant and not the acts of a third party. The assault with a weapon conviction was reversed and remanded. St. v. Knowles, 2010 MT 186, 357 Mont. 272, 239 P.3d 129.

Evidence of Pot Parties, Pipe, or Paraphernalia Unrelated to Alleged Sex Crime — State Failed to Show No Reasonable Possibility Evidence Contributed to Conviction: Evidence of marijuana use and drug paraphernalia did not prove an element of sexual intercourse without consent or sexual assault, and the state was unable to demonstrate qualitatively that there was no reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to the defendant's conviction. When evaluating the impact of tainted evidence, the qualitative impact of the tainted evidence is the proper focus in determining whether trial error was harmless. St. v. Sage, 2010 MT 156, 357 Mont. 99, 235 P.3d 1284.

Evidence of Other Offenses Not Inextricably Linked to Charged Offense — Absence of Showing That Admission of Evidence Harmless — Reversible Error: At the omnibus hearing on charges against Lacey of sexual intercourse without consent, the state indicated that it did not intend to introduce evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts as part of the case against Lacey. Nevertheless, the state subsequently sought to introduce evidence of other possible victims. Lacey objected, but the trial court held that the objection was untimely and that the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule. On appeal, the Supreme Court disagreed. The evidence was not inextricably linked to the charged offense, so the transaction rule did not apply and the evidence was erroneously admitted. Because the state made no attempt to argue that the error was harmless, the evidence was considered prejudicial, warranting reversal. St. v. Lacey, 2010 MT 6, 355 Mont. 31, 224 P.3d 1247. See also St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 Mont. 215, 32 P.3d 735, and St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 Mont. 114, 201 P.3d 811.

Evidence of Other Crimes Admissible Under Transaction Rule — No Limiting Instruction Required: When disputed evidence regarding prior bad acts is admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103, the requirements of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., do not apply to its admission, so a limiting instruction is not required as a matter of law. St. v. Gaither, 2009 MT 391, 353 M 344, 220 P.3d 640 (2009).

Failure to Give Notice of Intent to Introduce Evidence of Prior Intervention Hearing and Sanctions — New Trial Granted: At Campa's drug trial, the state sought to introduce evidence of a prior intervention hearing and of sanctions that were imposed as a result of the hearing. However, the state neglected to give Campa notice of its intent to introduce the evidence as required by 46-13-109 (now repealed). Campa appealed the lack of notice, but the state argued that no notice was required because the evidence was part of the transaction of the charged offense and thus admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103. The Supreme Court disagreed. Evidence of the intervention hearing and sanctions constituted evidence of a wrong at a time other than the offense charged, and because the state failed to comply with the procedural notice requirement, the evidence was improperly admitted, prejudicing Campa. The case was reversed and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Campa, 2009 MT 251, 351 M 504, 213 P.3d 1102 (2009).

Defendant's Probationary Status Considered Inadmissible Trial Evidence of Prior Crimes — New Trial Warranted: At Derbyshire's trial on drug charges, defense counsel moved to exclude any references to the fact that Derbyshire was on probation or that the drug search was conducted by probation officers. The trial court denied the motion and allowed references to probation but gave cautionary instructions prohibiting the jury from using the information to assume that Derbyshire was more likely to be guilty of the offense. Derbyshire was convicted and appealed on grounds that probation references should have been disallowed because they constituted inadmissible evidence of prior crimes. The state did not comply with the requirement of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., inasmuch as Derbyshire was never notified that evidence of other crimes would be introduced. However, the state asserted that the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule in 26-1-103 and therefore not subject to the procedural requirements of Rule 404(b). The District Court agreed with the state's theory and reasoned that the involvement of probation officers was part of the whole transaction and that the officers' status as probation officers was relevant to why they had certain knowledge and why they acted the way they did. Derbyshire contended that specific roles and titles of the officers who gathered the evidence were immaterial to the ultimate issue of whether Derbyshire possessed a dangerous drug with intent to distribute. The Supreme Court noted that a defendant may not be convicted based on the inference that because he committed crimes in the past he was more likely to have committed the crime charged, and that evidence of Derbyshire's status as a probationer constituted evidence that Derbyshire committed other crimes and thus was generally inadmissible unless an exception such as the transaction rule applied. However, in this case the transaction rule was inapplicable. The officers' status as probation officers and Derbyshire's status as probationer were neither part of nor evidence of the disputed issue of whether Derbyshire possessed a dangerous drug, nor were they "evidence of what transgressed immediately prior and subsequent to the commission of the offense charged" or inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense. Therefore, the District Court erred in denying Derbyshire's motion to exclude evidence of his status as a probationer. Further, the error was considered trial error rather than structural error, and although not presumptively prejudicial, the error was subject to harmless error review. In this case, there was a reasonable possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to Derbyshire's conviction, and the state failed to show that, qualitatively, there was no possibility that the tainted evidence might have contributed to Derbyshire's conviction. Absent a showing that the error was harmless, the conviction was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. St. v. Derbyshire, 2009 MT 27, 349 M 114, 201 P3d 811 (2009), applying the prejudicial error analysis from St. v. Van Kirk, 2001 MT 184, 306 M 215, 32 P3d 735 (2001), distinguished in St. v. Michelotti, 2018 MT 158, 392 Mont. 33, 420 P.3d 1020.

Evidence of Nondefendant Crime Victim's Criminal Charges and Pretrial Release Conditions Properly Excluded: At Kolb's felony robbery trial, Kolb sought to introduce evidence that the robbery victim had criminal charges pending and had violated the terms of pretrial release. Kolb asserted that the evidence was admissible because it presented a motive for the victim to provide false testimony in Kolb's case. The District Court disallowed the evidence, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. Kolb's theory was without merit, and the evidence of the victim's other crimes was not admissible because the modified Just rule applies to the admissibility of other crimes, wrongs, or acts of a defendant, not a nondefendant witness, except in limited circumstances when a defendant is attempting to inculpate another person for the crime. St. v. Kolb, 2009 MT 9, 349 M 10, 200 P3d 504 (2009).

Failure of Defendant to Establish Remoteness or Prejudice of Prior Acts — Evidence Properly Admitted: Swenson contended that evidence related to a prior conviction of sexual intercourse without consent in 1996 was too remote and prejudicial to be admitted at trial for sexual assault in 2004. Applying the modified Just rule, the District Court admitted the prior acts evidence and Swenson was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although about 10 to 12 years elapsed between the acts that led to the 1996 conviction and the 2004 charge, Swenson was incarcerated until 2000 with no chance to reoffend and was still on probation in 2004, so the time between the prior acts and the charged offense was less significant with regard to remoteness. Concerning the prejudice argument, the court noted that when the first three Just prongs are met, it necessarily carries great probative weight, and probative evidence will frequently and inevitably be prejudicial to a party. Therefore, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of Swenson's prior acts. St. v. Swenson, 2008 MT 308, 346 M 34, 194 P3d 625 (2008).

Defendant's Earlier Behavior on Night in Question Admissible Under Transaction Rule Not Inadmissible as Evidence of Other Crimes: Mackrill argued that the jury verdict against him finding him guilty of aggravated assault should be dismissed because the state had introduced evidence of his inebriated and aggressive behavior in other bars previous to his assaulting an individual later that night. Mackrill argued that the evidence, including portions of his taped interview after his arrest, was inadmissible as evidence of other crimes and that the prosecution did not give him prior notice of its intent to use the evidence as required by Montana case law. The Supreme Court held that the notice requirement does not apply to evidence of matters that are inextricably linked to and explanatory of the offense; in the present case, the evidence was not wholly independent of or unrelated to the charged offense and therefore was not evidence of other crimes but was admissible under the transaction rule. St. v. Mackrill, 2008 MT 297, 345 M 469, 191 P3d 451 (2008).

Evidence of Other Crimes Properly Admitted for Impeachment Despite Motion In Limine to Exclude Evidence of Prior Crimes — Failure of Claim of Ineffective Assistance of Counsel for Lack of Objection to Properly Admitted Evidence: Prior to trial, the Justice's Court granted defendant's motion in limine to exclude evidence of prior crimes or wrongs. However, on direct examination, the complaining witness stated that defendant had never been physical with her before, so the state moved to allow impeachment of the witness by asking questions relating to a prior conviction of defendant for assaulting the same victim. Defendant's counsel did not object, the motion was granted, and evidence of the prior assault was allowed. Following conviction, defendant appealed on grounds that the evidence was improperly admitted and that defense counsel was ineffective for failing to object to the prior crimes evidence. The District Court held that defendant's reliance on the motion in limine did not preserve the issue for appeal and that the evidence was properly admitted for impeachment purposes. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The trial court acted within its discretion and did not act arbitrarily without conscientious judgment or exceed the bounds of reason by allowing evidence of defendant's prior conviction for impeachment purposes, and defense counsel could not be considered ineffective for failing to object to properly admitted evidence. St. v. Parker, 2007 MT 243, 339 M 211, 169 P3d 380 (2007).

Limit on Cross-Examination of State's Witness Not Violative of Right to Confront Witnesses: Doyle contended that the trial court violated Doyle's constitutional right to confront witnesses by limiting Doyle's cross-examination of a state witness regarding the witness's prior criminal history and character and benefit to the witness from a plea agreement granting a lighter sentence in exchange for testimony against Doyle. The Supreme Court found no constitutional violation. Evidence of the witness's prior convictions was inadmissible for purposes of impeachment. Evidence of the witness's character was inadmissible for purposes of proving action in conformity with that character. Last, Doyle cross-examined the witness extensively about the benefits of the plea agreement, and the jury was adequately apprised of the potential biases and motives behind the witness's testimony in light of the cross-examination. St. v. Doyle, 2007 MT 125, 337 M 308, 160 P3d 516 (2007).

Ambiguous Statements Concerning Prior Family Member Assaults Nonprejudicial in Light of Evidence: Prior to Hofeldt's trial for family member assault, Hofeldt was granted a motion in limine precluding testimony regarding prior family member assaults. At trial, the victim and the investigating officer made comments that Hofeldt asserted violated the motion in limine, and Hofeldt moved for mistrial. However, the trial court denied the motion, and Hofeldt was convicted. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. The statements were not elicited by the prosecution and did not reference prior incidents specifically involving Hofeldt. In light of the strong evidence against Hofeldt and the fact that he did not request a curative instruction, the ambiguous statements could not be considered prejudicial, and denial of the mistrial motion was not an abuse of discretion. St. v. Hofeldt, 2005 MT 178, 328 M 1, 116 P3d 810 (2005).

Defense Expert Testimony Properly Limited to General Review of Legal and Medical Documents: The District Court did not abuse its discretion when it limited the testimony of defendant's medical expert regarding whether defendant's assault victim suffered a seizure on the night of the assault. The expert was allowed to address two of six instances of the victim's previous conduct, to testify that the victim's file had been reviewed and that the expert opinion was based on other incidents, and to give a general explanation of the nature and symptomatology of the victim's disorder, including the effect of medications and alcohol. However, the expert was precluded from testifying about the specific nature of the other documents that were reviewed. The Supreme Court held that it was proper to limit the expert's testimony to general references in light of the prohibition against the introduction of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts. Thus, defendant was afforded ample opportunity to demonstrate the victim's conditions and limitations in support of the defense theory, and the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Slavin, 2004 MT 76, 320 M 425, 87 P3d 495 (2004). See also Benjamin v. Torgerson, 1999 MT 216, 295 M 528, 985 P2d 734 (1999).

Evidence of Other Theft and Property Damage and Threatening Note Admissible Under Transaction Rule: During defendant's trial for theft and burglary, the District Court allowed the introduction of evidence of a prior theft and property damage, as well as a threatening note, that defendant had been involved with earlier in the day. Defendant contended that the evidence related to other acts or crimes and should not have been admitted. However, the prior theft and property damage and the note were intertwined with the theft and burglary, and the jury was entitled to hear what had transgressed immediately prior to the commission of the crime charged, so the evidence was admissible under the transaction rule. St. v. Flowers, 2004 MT 37, 320 M 49, 86 P3d 3 (2004).

Statement Admitting Prior Drug Use Not Considered Evidence of Other Crimes — Admissibility of Statement Under Transaction Rule: When his probation officer searched Lozon's room early one morning, the officer discovered a vial that Lozon admitted contained methamphetamine, but Lozon would not say to whom the vial belonged. However, Lozon did admit taking methamphetamine the previous evening. When the state sought to admit Lozon's statement, Lozon objected on grounds that the statement constituted evidence of prior crimes and that because the state had not provided notice that the statement would be used and the purpose for the evidence, as required in this rule, it was inadmissible. The trial court admitted the statement under the transaction rule, and Lozon appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Under the transaction rule in 26-1-103, evidence of matters that are inextricably linked to and explanatory of the charged offense is admissible, notwithstanding rules related to the admission of other crimes evidence, and when the evidence at issue is not wholly independent of or unrelated to the charged offense, it is not considered other crimes evidence for which notice of intent to introduce is required. Here, Lozon's statement established Lozon's knowledge and possession of drugs in his room shortly before the search, was closely related to the possession charge, and was therefore admissible. St. v. Lozon, 2004 MT 34, 320 M 26, 85 P3d 753 (2004), followed in St. v. Gittens, 2008 MT 55, 341 M 450, 178 P3d 91 (2008), and St. v. Hill, 2008 MT 260, 345 M 95, 189 P3d 1201 (2008).

All Elements of Modified Just Rule to Be Met Before Evidence of Prior Crimes Admissible: Before evidence of prior acts, crimes, or wrongs may be admitted, all four substantive prongs of the modified Just rule—similarity, remoteness, purpose, and prejudicial effect versus probative value—must be met. Additionally, a party offering evidence of prior acts must also comply with the procedural requirements set out in St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991), regarding notice to defendant of intent to introduce the evidence, explanation to the jury regarding the limited purpose of the evidence, and admonishment in jury instructions that misapplication of the evidence may result in double punishment. Here, Ayers contended that none of the substantive prongs were met, so the Supreme Court considered each in turn. As related to Ayers' prior Wyoming conviction, the first two prongs were clearly met. Regarding purpose, the court noted that merely reciting an allowable purpose is not sufficient if the evidence does not further that purpose or if the purpose is not an issue in dispute. For a prior act to be admissible as relevant toward motive, the commission of the first crime should give rise to a motive or reason for commission of the second crime, and in this case, there was sufficient proof of a connection between the prior Wyoming crime and Ayers' present charge to meet the third prong. Finally, with regard to the prejudice issue, the court noted that Ayers failed to object to the extent or scope of testimony presented by the state's expert or preserve that issue for appeal, so the District Court never had the opportunity to limit the evidence that Ayers argued on appeal was prejudicial. Nevertheless, Ayers' prior conviction clearly had great probative value, and under St. v. Henderson, 278 M 376, 925 P2d 475 (1996), even though probative evidence will frequently be prejudicial, when the first three prongs are met, prejudice alone is not a sufficient reason to refuse admission. Thus, in this case, the four prongs were met and the District Court did not err in admitting evidence of Ayers' prior Wyoming conviction of a similar crime. St. v. Ayers, 2003 MT 114, 315 M 395, 68 P3d 768 (2003), followed in St. v. Knowles, 2010 MT 186, 357 Mont. 272, 239 P.3d 129.

Evidence of Prior DUI Conviction Not Related to Crime Charged — Harmless Error: In a trial for fourth offense DUI, Bingman contended that the trial court erred in admitting testimony related to Bingman's two most recent DUI convictions. However, as in St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373 (1982), the evidence here was admitted for the purpose of proving not that Bingman had committed the DUI charged, but rather that Bingman had lied under oath. Bingman's own testimony opened the door to evidence of the past convictions and provided the jury with self-serving statements that Bingman knew to be untrue, but that were intended to place Bingman in a better light with the jury. As such, the testimony was not the sort of evidence contemplated by Rule 609, M.R.Ev., which prohibits the admission of evidence that a witness has been convicted of a crime for the purpose of attacking the witness's credibility. There was no reasonable possibility that the jury would have acquitted Bingman had he lied under oath only once instead of twice. Evidence of Bingman's prior convictions under these circumstances constituted harmless error and did not contribute to Bingman's conviction. St. v. Bingman, 2002 MT 350, 313 M 376, 61 P3d 153 (2002).

Abuse of Discretion Standard of Review Applicable to Rulings on Other Crimes Evidence: Because the admission of evidence of other crimes is directed to the relevance and admissibility of that evidence, the Supreme Court will apply the abuse of discretion standard when reviewing a trial court's decision on whether to admit evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts, which is the same standard applied to evidentiary rulings regarding the relevance and admissibility of evidence generally. St. v. Aakre, 2002 MT 101, 309 M 403, 46 P3d 648 (2002).

Failure by State to Articulate Permissible Purpose for Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes — Lack of Proof of Defendant's Knowledge of Fact of Consequence: During pretrial proceedings for Dobson's trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the state indicated its intent to introduce evidence that Dobson had been previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor. The purported purpose was for proof of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident, establishing that Dobson knew that someone under 16 years of age could not legally consent to sexual intercourse. Instead of objecting, defense counsel offered to stipulate that Dobson did have knowledge of that fact. The state objected that Dobson should not be able to stipulate away its case, and urged that the jury instructions contain details of the prior charge. The trial court declined the specific instructions offered by both Dobson and the state and fashioned and gave its own instruction, advising the jury that Dobson was previously charged with sexual intercourse without consent with a minor and thus had knowledge of the law, but instructing that the evidence was not to be construed by the jury as evidence of Dobson's character, but only as evidence of Dobson's prior knowledge that such conduct was criminal. On appeal, Dobson contended that the instruction was erroneous. The Supreme Court agreed that the trial court abused its discretion in giving the instruction because it did not meet the third criteria of the modified Just rule (see St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991)). Although it appeared at first blush that the state asserted permissible purposes of knowledge or the absence of mistake or accident for the admission of other crimes evidence, merely reciting an allowable purpose is not sufficient if the evidence does not further that purpose or if that purpose is not an issue in dispute (see St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1 (1995)). Rather, as set out in U.S. v. Mehrmanesh, 689 F2d 822 (9th Cir. 1982), the state must articulate precisely the evidential hypothesis by which a fact of consequence may be inferred from the other acts evidence, which in this case, the state did not do. Dobson's knowledge of the law that it is a felony offense to have sexual intercourse with someone under 16 years of age was not a fact of consequence to the action. Thus, admission of the evidence via the jury instruction was reversible error, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Dobson, 2001 MT 167, 306 M 145, 30 P3d 1077 (2001). See also St. v. Anderson, 275 M 344, 912 P2d 801 (1996).

Felony DUI — Failure to Object and Statements by Defense Counsel Held Waiver of Evidence of Other Crimes — Motion for Mistrial Based Upon Evidence of Other Crimes Properly Denied: Schwein moved for a mistrial because the District Court Judge gave a jury instruction indicating that Schwein was charged with felony DUI, implying that Schwein had previous DUI convictions and that that resulted in the automatic upgrading of the most recent DUI charge from a misdemeanor to felony DUI. Schwein argued that the judge's instruction constituted evidence of other crimes introduced contrary to subsection (b) of this rule. The Supreme Court pointed out that the instructions were settled prior to trial, that Schwein did not object to the instruction before it was given, and that Schwein's own counsel raised the issue of felony DUI during voir dire. The Supreme Court held that Schwein's objection was untimely and that any error was harmless in light of the statements made by Schwein's counsel during voir dire. St. v. Schwein, 2000 MT 371, 303 M 450, 16 P3d 373, 57 St. Rep. 1587 (2000), followed in St. v. Dewitz, 2009 MT 202, 351 M 182, 212 P3d 1040 (2009). See also St. v. Bollman, 2012 MT 49, 364 Mont. 265, 272 P.3d 650.

Sexual Abuse and Violence Against Women Act — Limitation of Evidence of Inappropriate Touching of Another: Evert sought damages against Swick based on Swick's alleged sexual abuse and violation of the federal Violence Against Women Act of 1994 (42 U.S.C. 13981). The District Court excluded proffered testimony of Evert's sister that Swick had also sexually and physically abused her. Swick was ultimately acquitted. Evert asserted on appeal that her sister's testimony was admissible to show opportunity, identity, or absence of mistake, that it was part of the res gestae, and that it should have been allowed as rebuttal testimony. The Supreme Court found no issue of opportunity, identity, or mistake because Swick and Evert had lived together, so the opportunity for abuse clearly existed. Moreover, the sister's testimony did not fall within any of the hearsay exceptions in Rule 803, M.R.Ev. The res gestae argument, when properly phrased in the context of the transaction rule, showed no evidence that Swick's contact with the sister involved part of the same transaction contained in Evert's complaint, a necessary element under 26-1-103. The Supreme Court also concluded that the testimony had no rebuttal value that would outweigh its prejudicial effect. The District Court correctly deduced that the evidence of other inappropriate touching was offered to impugn Swick's credibility and bolster Evert's credibility, which is not permitted under the modified Just rule and this rule. The court properly exercised its discretion in weighing the probative value of the testimony against its prejudicial effect in limiting the sister's testimony to the allegations contained in the complaint and excluding the portion of her testimony regarding other acts. Evert v. Swick, 2000 MT 191, 300 M 427, 8 P3d 773, 57 St. Rep. 757 (2000).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crime to Prove Identity — Greater Degree of Similarity Between Crimes Required When Evidence Introduced to Prove Identity: The state introduced evidence of Sweeney’s 1989 Wisconsin sexual assault conviction to prove Sweeney’s identity as the perpetrator of a sexual assault in Montana in 1996, contending that the evidence was probative in light of Sweeney’s assertion of an alibi defense. Sweeney argued that because the victim of the 1996 assault testified that Sweeney was the person who assaulted her, Sweeney’s identity as the alleged perpetrator was never at issue. Identity is rarely a distinct ground for admission of other acts or crimes, usually flowing from one or more of the other listed purposes, so when evidence of other acts or crimes is introduced to prove identity, the other acts or crimes must be sufficiently distinctive to warrant an inference that the person who committed the act also committed the offense at issue. A much greater degree of similarity between the charged crime and the other crime is required when the evidence is introduced to prove identity than when it is introduced to prove a state of mind. Here, there was some similarity between the age and gender of the victims in both the 1989 and 1996 assaults, but Sweeney’s alleged conduct was not necessarily sufficiently distinctive in the context of sexual assaults to warrant an inference that because he committed the 1989 assault, he must have also committed the 1996 assault. The District Court erroneously allowed introduction of evidence of the 1989 assault to prove Sweeney’s identity as the perpetrator of the 1996 assault. St. v. Sweeney, 2000 MT 74, 299 M 111, 999 P2d 296, 57 St. Rep. 325 (2000). See also U.S. v. Luna, 21 F3d 874 (9th Cir. 1994).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crime to Prove Knowledge — Connection Required: When evidence of a prior crime is admitted to prove knowledge, its admissibility requires a logical connection between the knowledge gained as a result of the commission of the prior act and the knowledge at issue in the charged act. The inquiry is whether defendant’s prior crime or act made the existence of defendant’s knowledge concerning the current crime more probable than not. Here, the state introduced evidence of Sweeney’s prior claim of a disassociative disorder at the time of a 1989 Wisconsin sexual assault conviction and the fact that Sweeney had indicated to a police investigator that he placed boundaries on himself when around children, yet Sweeney denied suffering from a disorder at the time of an alleged sexual assault in Montana in 1996 and did not testify at trial regarding any self-imposed boundaries. However, Sweeney did not claim that he did not know that his actions constituted a crime, nor did he claim that he did not have the requisite mental state at the time of the crime. Instead, Sweeney steadfastly maintained that he did not commit either of the offenses charged. Thus, evidence of Sweeney’s prior conviction did not make the existence of his knowledge concerning the 1996 sexual assault more probable than not, so evidence of the 1989 conviction was improperly admitted for the purpose of proving knowledge. St. v. Sweeney, 2000 MT 74, 299 M 111, 999 P2d 296, 57 St. Rep. 325 (2000). See also U.S. v. Martinez, 182 F3d 1107 (9th Cir. 1999).

Justifiable Use of Force Not Raised at Trial — Character Evidence of Victim Inadmissible: Nelson was charged with partner assault after striking his wife several times in the face and breaking her jaw. At trial, he sought to introduce evidence of his wife’s prior convictions for assault to show that he used reasonable force against her. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that Nelson had not relied on the defense of justifiable use of force, claiming instead that the contact was accidental, and that evidence of his wife’s prior convictions lacked relevance because Nelson never asserted that he knew of the convictions when he struck her. Nelson’s mere mention of self-defense in his notice of intent to rely on the defense of self-defense, in his trial brief, and in response to the city’s motion in limine did not place the matter at issue in the trial. Thus, evidence of his wife’s prior convictions was not relevant to the defense of accident upon which Nelson relied and was properly disallowed. Red Lodge v. Nelson, 1999 MT 246, 296 M 190, 989 P2d 300, 56 St. Rep. 955 (1999).

Results of Prior Horizontal Gaze Nystagmus Test Improperly Admitted — Harmless Error: At Berosik’s DUI trial, he argued that because his eyes had been injured in his youth, the horizontal gaze nystagmus test (HGN) was not valid. The District Court concluded that Berosik opened the door to evidence of a prior DUI incident in testifying on direct examination about the eye condition and admitted evidence of the results of the prior HGN, which Berosik had also failed. The Supreme Court decided on appeal that the court abused its discretion in admitting the evidence because it did not rebut Berosik’s suggestion that he scored high on the test due to the injuries and because the prior test results had, at most, a negligible probative value that was substantially outweighed by the risk of confusion of the issues. However, the error was harmless because Berosik failed to show that any of his substantive rights were prejudiced or that his right to a fair trial was impaired. Even without the prior test results, there was overwhelming evidence that Berosik was guilty of DUI, so the conviction was affirmed. St. v. Berosik, 1999 MT 238, 296 M 165, 988 P2d 775, 56 St. Rep. 938 (1999), applying St. v. Partin, 287 M 12, 951 P2d 1002, 54 St. Rep. 1474 (1997).

Crimes Need Not Be Identical — Sexual Assault:

Although the first prong of the Matt test (formerly modified Just test) does not require that prior acts be identical to the crime charged, they must be sufficiently similar. Conduct very similar in specific details may not be required in every case. It is within the broad discretion of the District Court to find evidence of prior acts too dissimilar to be admitted because they possessed significant distinguishing characteristics from the conduct in question. Benjamin v. Torgerson, 1999 MT 216, 295 M 528, 985 P2d 734, 56 St. Rep. 847 (1999).

Little was convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and sexual assault on two minors. Over Little's objection, the state introduced evidence at trial of other sexual assaults upon the same stepdaughter. The Supreme Court held that the other assaults satisfied the criteria of the modified Just rule. The Supreme Court noted that the former crimes did not have to be identical with the most recent crime charged and that they were sufficiently similar to be admissible because the crime was against the same stepdaughter and involved sexual intercourse without consent. St. v. Little, 260 M 460, 861 P2d 154, 50 St. Rep. 1124 (1993).

Modified Just Rule Analysis — Insufficient Evidence to Apply Four-Part Analysis for Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs, or Act: Enright was charged with felony arson and deliberate homicide as the result of a trailer home fire. In the course of the trial, the District Court allowed the state to introduce evidence of a 1995 trailer fire with which Enright was involved. Citing Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303 (1986), and St. v. Johnson, 250 M 496, 821 P2d 1039 (1991), and distinguishing St. v. Paulson, 250 M 32, 817 P2d 1137 (1991), the Supreme Court held that there was insufficient evidence that Enright started the 1995 trailer home fire and that, because of that lack of evidence, the District Court should not even have undertaken the four-part analysis required by the modified Just rule applied in St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991), for the introduction of evidence of the 1995 fire. The Supreme Court concluded that because the 1995 fire was not sufficiently relevant, the District Court's analysis and admission of the evidence of the 1995 fire unfairly prejudiced the jury against Enright, so the Supreme Court remanded the case for a new trial. St. v. Enright, 1998 MT 322, 292 M 204, 974 P2d 1118, 55 St. Rep. 1308 (1998), followed in St. v. Link, 1999 MT 4, 293 M 23, 974 P2d 1124, 56 St. Rep. 13 (1999).

Rule Inapplicable to Child's Testimony Regarding Other Acts of Sexual Abuse — Rebuttal Evidence Allowed — Correct Result but Wrong or Unspecified Reason: Veis was charged with unlawful intercourse with two sons of a woman he had dated. At trial, the District Court allowed one of the boys to testify about prior acts by Veis in order to explain a note, the existence of which was raised by Veis, written by the boy to one of his teachers about the sexual abuse. After Veis raised the existence of the note at trial, the District Court allowed the prosecution to present evidence as to its content and purpose. The Supreme Court held that, contrary to Veis's argument, testimony about the note, which involved testimony about other acts of Veis, did not violate this rule. The record showed that even though the District Court did not explain its ruling allowing the testimony, the testimony was allowed only for purposes of the state's rebuttal after Veis had raised the existence of the note as an issue in the trial. Relying upon St. v. Arthun, 274 M 82, 906 P2d 216 (1995), and St. v. Huether, 284 M 259, 943 P2d 1291 (1997), for the proposition that the Supreme Court will not reverse a District Court if it reaches the correct result for the wrong reason and upon Cline v. Durden, 246 M 154, 803 P2d 1077 (1990), and St. v. McQuiston, 227 M 397, 922 P2d 519 (1996), for the proposition that once a party opens an evidentiary door the opposing party has the right to offer evidence in rebuttal, even evidence of other acts, the Supreme Court held that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing into evidence the boy's testimony regarding other acts by Veis. St. v. Veis, 1998 MT 162, 289 M 450, 962 P2d 1153, 55 St. Rep. 651 (1998).

Prejudicial Prior Arrest Testimony Ordered Excluded in Pretrial Order — Weak Case Against Defendant — New Trial Granted: In a prosecution for forgery, a detective's testimony concerning defendant's handwriting samples obtained during a prior arrest was inadmissible because it violated a pretrial order not to give such testimony. No eyewitness tied defendant to the offense, and the detective's handwriting testimony was the only link between defendant and the offense. There were weaknesses and conflicts in the detective's testimony and handwriting analysis. Defendant denied committing the offense and offered a plausible explanation of who committed the offense. The testimony of the prior arrest was inherently prejudicial, which the prosecutor conceded when the pretrial motion was made to exclude the testimony. The trial judge's cautionary instruction that the prior arrest handwriting samples testimony was improper and should be disregarded did not overcome the prejudice. There was a reasonable possibility that the reference to the prior arrest might have contributed to the conviction; therefore, defendant was denied a fair and impartial trial, it was an abuse of discretion to deny defendant's motion for a new trial, the conviction was reversed, and the case was remanded for a new trial. St. v. Partin, 287 M 12, 951 P2d 1002, 54 St. Rep. 1474 (1997), distinguished in St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Explanation of How Facts Regarding Other Crimes and Present Crime Relate to Purpose — Differentiation From "Shotgun" Approach: In considering the admissibility of evidence of Whitlow's prior sexual assault, the Supreme Court applied the modified Just rule and identified the four substantive elements justifying admissibility. Whitlow nevertheless contended that the state failed to specify in its other crimes notice the purposes for which the evidence would be offered, instead using the impermissible "shotgun" approach in listing the purposes. Although nearly every purpose for admitting evidence of other crimes was stated in the state's notices of intent to introduce the evidence, it is not impermissible to list more than one applicable purpose. What is impermissible is a mere recitation of the purposes listed in this rule; however, the state did far more than simply recite the purposes, instead explaining how the facts surrounding the other crimes and the facts surrounding the current charges related to each specific purpose—an approach not at all similar to the "shotgun" approach. Thus, the state satisfied both the substantive and procedural requirements for the admission of evidence of other crimes. St. v. Whitlow, 285 M 430, 949 P2d 239, 54 St. Rep. 1227 (1997), distinguishing St. v. Croteau, 248 M 403, 812 P2d 1251 (1991).

Alleged Error Part of Defense Strategy — Trial Not Constitutionally Defective — Plain Error and Cumulative Error Doctrines Held Inapplicable: Hanson was charged with sexual assault of and deviate sexual conduct with his former girlfriend's son, Aaron. Hanson alleged that the testimony of his victim and certain witnesses was unreliable, that certain testimony was incorrectly presented on rebuttal, that the state introduced evidence of other acts in violation of both subsection (b) of this rule and his constitutional right to due process, that the state's cross-examination of him went too far, that he was improperly impeached by certain state evidence, and that the prosecutor incorrectly commented on the veracity of a witness. For these reasons, Hanson argued that he was deprived of a fair trial in violation of the constitutional guaranty of a fair trial and that the doctrines of plain error and cumulative error applied so as to require a new trial even though he had not objected to the evidence before the District Court. The Supreme Court reviewed the trial record and pointed out that Hanson either failed to object to testimony by Aaron, Aaron's therapist, and a Deputy Sheriff or he actually solicited their testimony himself in an effort to show their lack of credibility. The Supreme Court held, citing St. v. Campbell, 241 M 323, 787 P2d 329 (1990), and St. v. Finley, 276 M 126, 915 P2d 208 (1996), that the alleged errors did not rise to the level of a manifest miscarriage of justice, did not leave unsettled the question of the fundamental fairness of the trial, and did not compromise the integrity of the judicial system. Therefore, the court refused to invoke the plain or cumulative error doctrine to review issues raised for the first time on appeal. St. v. Hanson, 283 M 316, 940 P2d 1166, 54 St. Rep. 678 (1997).

Testimony Elicited on Cross-Examination and for Impeachment Properly Admitted: McQuiston questioned whether testimony regarding previous acts was admissible. Because the testimony was elicited on cross-examination and revisited on direct or redirect examination of subsequent witnesses or elicited on cross-examination in an effort to impeach McQuiston's prior testimony, the testimony was properly admitted. St. v. McQuiston, 277 M 397, 922 P2d 519, 53 St. Rep. 729 (1996).

Introduction of Photographs — Totality of Circumstances Test — No Prejudice: In a trial for kidnapping and assault, the District Court allowed introduction of photographs of the victim that showed assault and injury of the victim several days prior to the date of the crimes charged. The Supreme Court ruled, based on the totality of the circumstances, that even if the admission of evidence of the earlier attacks was in violation of this rule, under the totality of the circumstances, it was not prejudicial error. St. v. Eichenlaub, 272 M 332, 901 P2d 90, 52 St. Rep. 786 (1995).

Other Acts Not Sufficiently Similar to Charged Offense — Admission Improper: The defendant was charged and convicted of burglary and deliberate homicide. The defendant appealed, alleging that the District Court erred in admitting evidence of other acts. The Supreme Court held that when the defendant's other acts were not sufficiently similar to the charged offense to satisfy the first element of the modified Just rule (similarity of acts), there is no need to analyze other elements of the rule. When evidence of the other acts could not meet the elements of the modified Just rule, the District Court abused its discretion in admitting the evidence. St. v. Pace, 272 M 464, 901 P2d 557, 52 St. Rep. 768 (1995).

Election of More Than One Applicable Purpose for Admission of Evidence of Other Acts Not Precluded: Defendant claimed that under St. v. Croteau, 248 M 403, 812 P2d 1251 (1991), the state's Just notice was procedurally defective because it used the impermissible "shotgun" approach, naming several exceptions from this rule. The notice stated that the other acts "evidence is relevant in that it tends to establish plan, knowledge and absence of mistake or accident concerning the commission of the offenses currently charged". While Croteau does stand for the proposition that the shotgun approach is impermissible when identifying the purpose for which the evidence is to be introduced, it does not prohibit the election of more than one applicable purpose for the admission of the other acts evidence. Given the fact that the defense was based on the argument that defendant's conduct was not what the victims alleged it to be, the alleged purposes set out in the notice were sufficient to notify defendant of the reason that the other acts evidence was to be introduced. St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994). See also St. v. Johnston, 267 M 474, 885 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1078 (1994).

Dissimilarity Between Misdemeanor Forgery and Felony Burglary — Evidence of Prior Crime Inadmissible: In a prosecution for accountability for felony burglary, the state sought to introduce evidence of Johnston's prior conviction for misdemeanor forgery. Under the modified Just rule, there was insufficient similarity between the two offenses to satisfy the requirement that the crimes be similar in nature before evidence of the prior crime may be allowed. St. v. Johnston, 267 M 474, 885 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1078 (1994).

Past Acts Held Too Remote to Be Admissible — Therefore Prejudicial: Ray argued that the trial court erred in admitting testimony concerning two instances of sexual abuse that had happened 16 to 18 years in the past. The Supreme Court held that although it refused to set arbitrary time limits for admitting prior acts evidence, events occurring that far in the past without other intervening similar acts are too remote and do not meet one of the requirements of the modified Just rule. Therefore, introduction of the evidence was prejudicial to the defendant. St. v. Ray, 267 M 128, 882 P2d 1013, 51 St. Rep. 968 (1994), following St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991), and as to prejudice to defendant of admitting prior acts, St. v. Croteau, 248 M 403, 812 P2d 1251 (1991).

Prejudice Through Inadmissible Evidence — Fair Trial Denied: Generally, character evidence is inadmissible to prove conduct. The prosecution is allowed to rebut the accused's offer of a pertinent trait of character; however, the prosecution must present legitimate and relevant character evidence. An accused's entire life should not be searched in an effort to convict. In this case, the trial court improperly allowed cross-examination of Eklund's character witness regarding Eklund's prior murder charges when the witness was called to rebut the nonviolent character evidence. The danger of unfair prejudice of evidence of charges, not a conviction, clearly outweighed the probative value. After considering the totality of the circumstances, the Supreme Court determined that there was a reasonable possibility that the inadmissible evidence of Eklund's murder charge denied him a fair and impartial trial and remanded for a new trial. St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994).

Evidence of Prior Indecent Exposure Not Admissible: In a trial for sexual intercourse without consent, the only issue of contention was consent. A prior act in which defendant asked a woman to go outside a bar and while outside exposed himself and stated that he wanted intercourse was not similar to defendant's actions in this case and was not admissible on the issue of victim's consent. In addition, innuendos that could be drawn from the evidence would improperly tend to go to defendant's character and propensity to act in a certain way, and defendant's motive or intent was not the issue. Remand for a new trial was necessary. St. v. Keys, 258 M 311, 852 P2d 621, 50 St. Rep. 547 (1993), followed, with regard to inadmissibility of evidence of prior crimes or acts insufficiently similar or relevant to prove the crime charged, in St. v. Garn, 264 M 296, 871 P2d 878, 51 St. Rep. 285 (1994).

Redirect Examination as to Other Crimes Following Cross-Examination as to Whether Search Took Place: During cross-examination of a recalled prosecution witness in a prosecution for conspiracy to sell dangerous drugs, a detective was asked if defendant's house was searched and answered that they had no reason to do it. On redirect examination, it was error for the judge to allow, over objections, questions and answers regarding other evidence of defendant's prior involvement with drugs. The testimony exceeded the scope of the cross-examination and violated defendant's right to notice that the information would be brought out at trial. St. v. Shaw, 255 M 298, 843 P2d 316, 49 St. Rep. 1012 (1992).

Evidence of Other Crimes by Defendant Inadmissible to Bolster Credibility of Witness: Based on the testimony of witness Grotjohn, defendant Cameron was convicted of the sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). In order to explain Grotjohn's behavior as a witness at trial, the state introduced evidence over defendant's objection of a gun threat made by Cameron against Grotjohn. The Supreme Court held that the evidence of the gun threat was inadmissible because Grotjohn's reputation for truthfulness was not attacked at trial. The evidence of the threat was also inadmissible because under the rule in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), as modified by St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52 (1991), the state failed to give written notice of the evidence to be admitted and the purpose of the evidence. Moreover, there was no similarity between the gun threat and the charged crime of sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). The District Court therefore committed reversible error in admitting the evidence of the gun threat. St. v. Cameron, 255 M 14, 839 P2d 1281, 49 St. Rep. 861 (1992), clarified, with regard to the applicability of the corpus delicti rule, in St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999).

Evidence of Activity Following Commission of Crime Improperly Suppressed: The state sought to introduce evidence of defendant Moore's activities following the alleged homicide of Brisbin. The District Court denied admission of the evidence based on the potential for prejudice. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was improperly suppressed because it was relevant as tending to prove commission of the crime charged and the defendant's responsibility for it. As stated in Cruz v. St., 645 SW 2d 498 (Tex. Ct. App. 1982), admissibility is predicated on the jury's right to hear what transgressed immediately prior and subsequent to the commission of the crime charged so that the jury may evaluate the evidence in the context in which the criminal act occurred. Actions of a defendant subsequent to the alleged commission of a crime tend to show the consciousness of guilt and are a part of the res gestae and corpus delicti of the crime charged. Such evidence is highly probative, is not subject to the "other crimes" restriction of this rule, and is therefore admissible. St. v. Moore, 254 M 241, 836 P2d 604, 49 St. Rep. 752 (1992), followed in St. v. Berosik, 1999 MT 238, 296 M 165, 988 P2d 775, 56 St. Rep. 938 (1999).

No Similarity Between Crime Charged and Previous Acts — Evidence Inadmissible: In Crist's trial for sexual assault of a child, the state successfully introduced testimony of another alleged victim who stated that Crist had once showed her a pornographic magazine, once gave her an alcoholic beverage and joked that he would get her drunk and take advantage of her, and then later that night tried to get her to dress in a nightgown. The Supreme Court applied the first prong of the Just test and found the testimony inadmissible because it lacked the requisite similarity to the crime charged. St. v. Crist, 253 M 442, 833 P2d 1052, 49 St. Rep. 525 (1992).

Evidence of Similar Rape Introduced to Prove Identity of Assailant: K.B. was raped by an unknown assailant after she awoke to find the assailant lying next to her on her bed. At trial, the District Court allowed the state to introduce evidence of another rape in a nearby town, in which the victim had found her assailant, identified as the defendant, sitting next to her on her bed when she awoke. The Supreme Court held that the evidence was properly allowed under Rule 403 and subsection (b) of this rule because it fit within the exception to establish identity and because its probative value was not outweighed by its prejudicial effect. St. v. Kordonowy, 251 M 45, 823 P2d 854, 48 St. Rep. 1148 (1991).

Corroborative Evidence to Be Viewed in Light Most Favorable to Prosecution: The defendant, accused of selling illegal drugs, argued that the evidence corroborating an accomplice's testimony was insufficient to support introducing the accomplice's testimony. The Supreme Court held that the corroborating evidence had to be viewed in the light most favorable to the prosecution and that in the case before it, the corroborating evidence was sufficient to support admitting the accomplice's testimony. St. v. Paulson, 250 M 32, 817 P2d 1137, 48 St. Rep. 838 (1991).

Modified Just Rule Applied: The defendant argued that the lower court erred in not determining, before admitting the evidence, that the sufficiency of evidence of other crimes would support a jury's finding that the defendant had committed the other crimes. The Supreme Court held that the modified Just Rule, as developed in St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52, 48 St. Rep. 614 (1991), provided proper protection against improper admissibility without adopting a separate standard of review and that the evidence had been properly admitted under the modified rule. St. v. Paulson, 250 M 32, 817 P2d 1137, 48 St. Rep. 838 (1991), followed in St. v. McKnight, 250 M 457, 820 P2d 1279, 48 St. Rep. 981 (1991), and St. v. Romero, 261 M 221, 861 P2d 929, 50 St. Rep. 1296 (1993), and distinguished in St. v. Enright, 1998 MT 322, 292 M 204, 974 P2d 1118, 55 St. Rep. 1308 (1998). Enright was followed in St. v. Link, 1999 MT 4, 293 M 23, 974 P2d 1124, 56 St. Rep. 13 (1999).

Evidence of Prior Acts Not Limited to Common Scheme, Plan, or System — Admission of Other Crimes Harmless Error: While the Just rule clearly provides for the admission of evidence for purposes other than a common scheme, plan, or system, the District Court's improper admission of evidence that defendant had been involved 3 months earlier in an assault on a woman during which he repeatedly shoved a Deputy Sheriff did not constitute grounds for reversal of his conviction for felony assault (now assault with a weapon). St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52, 48 St. Rep. 614 (1991), discussed in St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1, 52 St. Rep. 729 (1995).

Prior Crimes or Acts — Modified Just Rule: The following basis must be used to determine the admissibility of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts: (1) the other crimes, wrongs, or acts must be similar; (2) the other crimes, wrongs, or acts may not be remote in time; (3) the evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity with such character; but it may be admissible for other purposes, such as proof of motive, opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, or identity or absence of mistake or accident; and (4) although relevant, evidence may be excluded if its probative value is substantially outweighed by the danger of unfair prejudice, confusion of the issues, misleading of the jury, considerations of undue delay, waste of time, or needless presentation of cumulative evidence. St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52, 48 St. Rep. 614 (1991), followed with regard to necessity of similarity of acts or crimes and use of evidence of similar crimes to prove character in St. v. Wells, 252 M 121, 827 P2d 801, 49 St. Rep. 175 (1992), and followed in St. v. McKnight, 250 M 457, 820 P2d 1279, 48 St. Rep. 981 (1991), St. v. Keys, 258 M 311, 852 P2d 621, 50 St. Rep. 547 (1993), St. v. Romero, 261 M 221, 861 P2d 929, 50 St. Rep. 1296 (1993), St. v. Garn, 264 M 296, 871 P2d 878, 51 St. Rep. 285 (1994), St. v. Steffes, 269 M 214, 887 P2d 1196, 51 St. Rep. 1463 (1994), St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1, 52 St. Rep. 729 (1995), St. v. Anderson, 275 M 344, 912 P2d 801, 53 St. Rep. 172 (1996), St. v. Henderson, 278 M 376, 925 P2d 475, 53 St. Rep. 958 (1996), and St. v. Sweeney, 2000 MT 74, 299 M 111, 999 P2d 296, 57 St. Rep. 325 (2000). St. v. Anderson was followed in St. v. Hagberg, 277 M 33, 920 P2d 86, 53 St. Rep. 528 (1996).

Delay in Giving "Just" Instruction Not Prejudicial: At the time that evidence of other crimes was offered, defendant neither objected to the evidence nor requested a cautionary instruction. After the state completed its proof, it pointed out to the District Court that the Just instruction had not been given, at which time the court gave an instruction that met with defendant's approval. Additionally, the court included a second cautionary instruction during its final instructions to the jury. While it would have been preferable for the cautionary instruction to have been given at the time the evidence was introduced, the delay was not prejudicial. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991).

Notice to Specify Purpose of Proposed Evidence: The prosecution's notice to the defendant of the state's intent to introduce evidence of prior conduct stated that the evidence was to be introduced for the purpose of showing "opportunity, intent, preparation, plan, knowledge, identity, or absence of mistake or accident in committing the offenses charged". The Supreme Court held that the introduction of the evidence was reversible error because the prosecution had used a "shotgun" approach in listing reasons for introducing the evidence rather than giving the defendant a specific purpose for the evidence's admission. St. v. Croteau, 248 M 403, 812 P2d 1251, 48 St. Rep. 484 (1991).

Prejudice of Untimely Notice Not Cured by Right to Continuance: On the first day of trial, the prosecution gave the defense notice of additional evidence of prior acts that the state intended to introduce. The Supreme Court held that the defendant had the right to a speedy trial and to proper notice and that the defendant could not be compelled due to untimely notice to choose between the two. St. v. Croteau, 248 M 403, 812 P2d 1251, 48 St. Rep. 484 (1991).

Reference to Incarceration in Reform School Not Prejudicial: The defendant argued that a witness's reference to the defendant's incarceration in the Pine Hills School for Boys (now Pine Hills Youth Correctional Facility) was prejudicial evidence of other crimes. The Supreme Court held that the testimony was admissible because it was introduced to establish a chain of custody for an exhibit seized in Minnesota and retrieved by school employees when they went to Minnesota to retrieve the defendant from that state. St. v. Daniels, 248 M 343, 811 P2d 1286, 48 St. Rep. 464 (1991).

Identification of Witness During Closing Argument as Defendant's Probation Officer — No Prejudice: In accord with an order in limine that no reference was to be made at trial to defendant's criminal record, the testimony of defendant's probation officer and records introduced in connection with her testimony were sanitized at trial. However, in closing, the prosecution referred to the testimony of the defendant's probation officer, which defendant contended on appeal was a violation of the restriction in subsection (b) of this rule—a restriction on introduction of evidence of other crimes without formal notice. The Supreme Court, noting that several references had been made to defendant's criminal record by defendant's own witnesses by the time closing arguments were made, found that identification of the parole officer was not prejudicial to the defense. St. v. West, 245 M 298, 800 P2d 1047, 47 St. Rep. 2129 (1990).

Evidence of Sexual Abuse by Another Person Inadmissible in Incest Trial: Defendant on trial for incest with his stepdaughter sought to introduce evidence of sexual abuse by the victim's natural father under the "pertinent trait of character of the victim" standard of subsection (a)(2) of this rule or the "other crimes" exception of subsection (b) of this rule. However, 45-5-511(4) provides no exception to warrant admittance of evidence to establish that another person had sexually abused the victim. St. v. Kao, 245 M 263, 800 P2d 714, 47 St. Rep. 2100 (1990).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Admission of Prior Sexual Assault Conviction Upheld to Prove Defendant Acted Knowingly: In 1989, the defendant was charged with sexually assaulting his 15-year-old daughter. At trial, the defendant was convicted after evidence of a 1984 conviction of sexual assault upon the same daughter was admitted into evidence. On appeal, the state argued that admission of the 1984 conviction was appropriate to prove that the defendant acted knowingly because it showed the defendant's motive, intent, absence of mistake or accident, and knowledge. The Supreme Court examined the factors required by St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), balanced the probative value of the evidence against the possibility of prejudice, and concluded that evidence of the 1984 conviction was properly admitted by the District Court. St. v. Medina, 245 M 25, 798 P2d 1032, 47 St. Rep. 1832 (1990).

Evidence of "Other Crimes" Relating to Prior Offenses: In defendant's trial for assault, the District Court erred in allowing evidence to be introduced relating to crimes allegedly committed by defendant after the offense for which he was being tried. The Just requirement of nearness in time relates to other crimes or wrongs committed prior to the offense in issue. The prejudice to defendant in allowing evidence of wrongs committed after the offense for which he was being tried in order to prove the assault charge is obvious and not harmless. St. v. Heinrich, 242 M 110, 788 P2d 1346, 47 St. Rep. 314 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Gambrel, 246 M 84, 803 P2d 1071, 47 St. Rep. 2270 (1990).

Disclosure by Defense Witness of Other Crimes — Improper Prosecutorial Inquiry: A defense witness was impeached on cross-examination when asked if he had been convicted of a crime and what crime he had committed. The prosecutor's inquiry was clearly improper under Rule 609, M.R.Ev., and none of the exceptions in subsection (b) of this rule applied. The conviction was reversed and the case remanded for a new trial. St. v. Shaw, 237 M 451, 775 P2d 207, 46 St. Rep. 942 (1989).

Letter Attempting to Influence Witness Admissible to Show Consciousness of Guilt: While in jail, the defendant sent a letter to another prisoner suggesting that if the other prisoner developed amnesia prior to testifying against the defendant, the defendant would make it worth his while. The court ruled that the evidence was admissible because the attempt to influence or intimidate a witness is admissible to show consciousness of guilt. St. v. Baker, 237 M 140, 773 P2d 1194, 46 St. Rep. 686 (1989).

Inconsistent Statement by Victim — Character Not Automatically at Issue: An inconsistent statement in a victim's account of a sexual assault does not automatically put her character in issue and thus does not open the door for evidence of any past misconduct. St. v. Courville, 236 M 253, 769 P2d 44, 46 St. Rep. 338 (1989).

Knowledge of Term of Art Shown Through Testimony — Evidence of Prior Crimes Admissible: When a defendant understands the intricacy of proving a legal term of art and attempts through his own testimony to subvert proof of this element, he has clearly shown knowledge. A defendant who said he was not familiar with the term "under the influence" at the time of arrest and did not believe he was under the influence when arrested, opened the door to evidence of previous DUI convictions, which evidence was then properly admitted under the knowledge exception of Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. St. v. Kinney, 230 M 281, 750 P2d 436, 45 St. Rep. 205 (1988).

Inadvertent Testimony — No "Just" Notice Required: A police officer testified to other crimes despite a prior agreement and without the required Just notice. The Supreme Court found that no Just notice was required because the County Attorney never intended to introduce evidence of other crimes and the testimony was an inadvertent and unintentional response to a nonsuggestive question. Any error was rendered harmless by the trial court's cautionary jury instructions, and the motion for a new trial or mistrial was properly denied. St. v. Brush, 228 M 247, 741 P2d 1333, 44 St. Rep. 1495 (1987), followed in St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950, 46 St. Rep. 512 (1989), St. v. Long, 2005 MT 130, 327 M 238, 113 P3d 290 (2005), and St. v. Moree, 2010 MT 148, 357 Mont. 24, 235 P.3d 585.

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Similar Crime When Present Crime Denied — Procedural Requirements Followed: When search of a storage shed pursuant to a court order to retrieve marital property revealed illegal drugs, knowledge of which was denied by defendant, evidence of a prior federal conviction for sale of drugs was admissible since the procedural requirements of Just were met. St. v. Clausen, 228 M 20, 740 P2d 679, 44 St. Rep. 1308 (1987).

Motion Granted to Exclude Evidence Not Specifically Named — Error to Introduce: As defendant was not notified of the state's intention to introduce evidence of other crimes, the District Court properly granted defendant's motion in limine to exclude all "evidence items allegedly taken by the defendant which are not specifically named in the informations". Two items, which were the basis of the misdemeanor charges, were found in a package sent by defendant, along with other items that had no connection with the charges. During trial, despite its ruling, the court allowed the package and its entire contents into evidence. Failure by the court to adhere to its own ruling was an abuse of discretion, prejudicial and harmful to defendant, and constituted reversible error. St. v. Howell, 226 M 148, 734 P2d 214, 44 St. Rep. 542 (1987).

Abbreviated "Just" Instruction Upheld — Use With Other Mitigating Instructions: Defense counsel objected to use of the word "crime" in the District Judge's application of the procedural rules set out in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), regarding admissibility of evidence of other crimes, contending that the inference taken from the "other crimes" instruction converted acts of doubtful criminal nature into evidence of a course of conduct of sexual assault. The Supreme Court noted that the District Judge drew attention to defense counsel's objection, explained to the jury that it would be instructed on what constituted the "crime", explained that the jury would be free to exercise its own discretion in determining whether the acts constituted crimes, and gave a cautionary instruction that "[a]lthough I use the term crimes to describe the acts testified to, I didn't mean to suggest that they were criminal acts". The Supreme Court held that while use of an abbreviated Just "other crimes" instruction was not suggested, the final cautionary instruction protected the balance between probative value and prejudicial effect by alleviating potential misconstruction of the Just instruction. St. v. Long, 223 M 502, 726 P2d 1364, 43 St. Rep. 1948 (1986).

Attempt by Prosecutor to Provoke Defense Motion for Mistrial — Double Jeopardy: When a defendant moves for a mistrial and the motion is granted, the "manifest necessity" standard allowing a court to lift the double jeopardy bar to a second trial does not apply (U.S. v. Tateo, 377 US 463, 12 L Ed 2d 448, 84 S Ct 1587 (1964)). The Montana Supreme Court recognized a narrow exception to this rule, as outlined in Oreg. v. Kennedy, 456 US 667, 72 L Ed 2d 416, 102 S Ct 2083 (1982), holding that the circumstances under which a defendant may invoke the bar of double jeopardy are limited to cases "in which the conduct giving rise to the successful motion for a mistrial was intended to provoke the defendant into moving for a mistrial". In the case at bar, the District Court held and the Supreme Court affirmed that the prosecutor attempted, through a series of overreaching questions, to shift the focus of the trial from a charge of criminal sale of drugs for which there was only weak evidence to sexual crimes initially reported but later denied on cross-examination. The court found that the questions were so prejudicial that the defendant had little choice but to move for a mistrial to avoid a conviction for crimes with which he had not been charged. St. v. Laster, 223 M 152, 724 P2d 721, 43 St. Rep. 1614 (1986).

Notice of Witness to Other Acts or Wrongs — Sex Assault Witness in Sex Assault Case — New Trial: If the prosecution intends to introduce evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts it must notify the defendant of that intent and identify the purpose for which the evidence will be introduced. In this sexual assault case, it was reversible error requiring a new trial when the State did not give such notice, and the witness testified that defendant had previously kissed her despite her resistance. St. v. Berg, 215 M 431, 697 P2d 1365, 42 St. Rep. 518 (1985).

Decision After Opening of Trial to Allow Evidence of Prior Crimes Reversible Error: In a case in which the defendant was convicted of deliberate homicide, the trial court committed reversible error when it initially granted the defendant's motion to exclude evidence of his prior assaults, and then 3 days into the trial reversed its ruling to allow such evidence. This decision was prejudicial to the defendant because he lost his opportunity to voir dire the jury regarding the effect evidence of prior crimes would have on their decision. Also, the defendant, if he had had advance notice that the evidence would be allowed, could have prepared in order to lessen the impact of such testimony. St. v. Doll, 214 M 390, 692 P2d 473, 42 St. Rep. 40 (1985), distinguished in St. v. Scarborough, 2000 MT 301, 302 M 350, 14 P3d 1202, 57 St. Rep. 1268 (2000).

Testimony of Defendant's Marijuana Use — Harmless Error — Mitigation by State's Action and Court's Instruction: It was harmless error when a state witness departed from the established time sequence of her testimony and blurted out that the defendant smoked half a marijuana cigarette before the crime because the State did not dwell on the topic and the court gave a cautionary instruction. St. v. Liddell, 211 M 180, 685 P2d 918, 41 St. Rep. 1293 (1984).

Evidence of Prior Crimes — Motion In Limine — Admissible for Purposes of Impeachment: Defendant had motion in limine based on Rule 404, M.R.Ev., to exclude from his homicide trial any matters or things pertaining to prior prosecutions, convictions, arrests, and uncharged criminal acts of the defendant. It was not error for the prosecution to ask the defendant about whether he had friendly relations with third parties and then to impeach his testimony that he did have such friendly relations by introducing testimony implicating him in other crimes relating to the third parties. St. v. Kutnyak, 211 M 155, 685 P2d 901, 41 St. Rep. 1277 (1984).

Homicide Trial — Claim of Nonviolent Character — Prior Assaults Admissible to Rebut: In defendant's homicide trial for killing his recently divorced ex-wife's boyfriend, testimony by certain persons about defendant's prior assaults on his ex-wife was properly admitted to rebut defendant's claims on the witness stand that he was peace-loving and nonviolent. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984), followed in St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989).

Character Witness — Scope of Cross-Examination: Defendant was charged with eight counts of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. At trial defendant called character witnesses. Simpson had hired defendant to work on his ranch. Simpson testified at length as to defendant's truthfulness and peacefulness. On cross-examination the State inquired whether Simpson was aware of defendant's conviction of armed robbery, his attempt to hijack a plane in Vietnam, and his violent escapes from a prison cell block in Vietnam and from jail in Great Falls. On appeal the Supreme Court said that Montana follows the modern trend to accept both reputation and opinion evidence regarding character. The court relied on the critical factors set out in Michelson v. U.S., 335 US 469, 93 L Ed 168, 69 S Ct 213 (1948): (1) the trial court ascertained the prior crime was an actual event; (2) the court instructed the jury to consider the inquiry only for the limited purpose of evaluating a witness' testimony; and (3) there was no specific objection made by the defense attorney. The court said Rule 405, M.R.Ev., extends beyond Michelson to allow inquiry on cross-examination into relevant, specific instances of conduct. The court found the cross-examination of Simpson was within the scope of the direct examination, consisted of inquiry into relevant, specific instances of conduct, and was proper to impeach the witness' opinion testimony. St. v. Clark, 209 M 473, 682 P2d 1339, 41 St. Rep. 833 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994).

Late Notice of Evidence to Be Used — Waiver of Continuance: The night before trial the prosecutor phoned the defense and gave notice that he would use a piece of evidence of a prior criminal act. Judicially mandated notice was served the next morning. The judge granted a 2½-day continuance to the defense. Defense counsel waived his right to additional time when he told the judge after the continuance that he had had enough time to investigate the evidence and did not need time beyond the 2½ days. St. v. Azure, 208 M 233, 676 P2d 785, 41 St. Rep. 302 (1984).

Cautionary Instruction — Testimony as to Prior Incarceration — No Contribution to Conviction: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, aggravated burglary, and attempted sexual intercourse without consent, contended that a mistrial should have been granted when a witness made reference to the fact that defendant had been in the state penitentiary. Defendant's motion was denied, but the court struck the material from the record and gave the jury an instruction to ignore evidence stricken from the record. The Supreme Court, applying the test of whether there was a reasonable possibility the inadmissible evidence might have contributed to the conviction, therefore requiring reversal, held that there was no evidence defendant was denied a substantial right. There was no showing that the reference might have contributed to his conviction in the face of overwhelming evidence directly proving his guilt. St. v. Wells, 202 M 337, 658 P2d 381, 40 St. Rep. 127 (1983).

Acts Not Constituting a Crime and Excluded Testimony — No Evidence of Other Crimes Given: Where the defendant fired a rifle through the door of his home and was later tried and convicted of aggravated assault against two police officers, the District Court did not erroneously admit testimony of other crimes in violation of the procedure established in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979). Portions of the testimony did not show the commission of a crime and were not objected to at trial. Other portions were objected to and the objection was sustained, precluding further such testimony, and a question as to whether charges were brought was never answered. Under these circumstances there was no error. St. v. Warnick, 202 M 120, 656 P2d 190, 39 St. Rep. 2369 (1982).

Evidence of Another Offense Admitted to Prove Consciousness of Guilt — Probative Value of Evidence: Where the defendant was charged with felony theft following a break-in at a veteran's club, the District Court did not err in admitting evidence that the defendant attempted to intimidate one of the state's witnesses who was also an accomplice of the defendant. There was no requirement that the District Court follow the admissibility test and procedural requirements established in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), because the reason for those safeguards is to prevent the defendant from being surprised by the evidence of collateral, unrelated issues. When, as here, the evidence is introduced to show consciousness of guilt of an offense already charged and its probative value outweighs any prejudice to the defendant, there is no reason to apply those safeguards. St. v. Shaw, 199 M 248, 648 P2d 287, 39 St. Rep. 1324 (1982). See also St. v. Pease, 222 M 455, 724 P2d 153, 43 St. Rep. 1417 (1986).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Procedural Requirements Not Followed: Gray drove his pickup off an embankment and reported to the police that he was forced off the road. The truck was not totaled and was taken to a body shop for repairs. While at the body shop, the truck was vandalized on Gray's instructions. After the vandalism, the truck was not repairable. Gray was charged with criminal mischief with the purpose to defraud an insurer for driving the truck off an embankment. The evidence of Gray's involvement in the vandalism is evidence of other crimes. The court held that the four-element test to determine the admissibility of evidence of other crimes set out in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), was met but that the procedural requirements of Just were not followed. The judgment was reversed and a new trial ordered. St. v. Gray, 197 M 348, 643 P2d 233, 39 St. Rep. 622 (1982), distinguished in St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544, 40 St. Rep. 1576 (1983).

Admissibility of Character and Other Crimes Evidence When Defendant "Opens Door" on Cross-Examination: Where defendant on cross-examination stated he was not the kind of person who could commit the crime of which he was accused, evidence of character was admissible because defendant opened the door to rebuttal evidence by his statement. When defendant on cross-examination further stated he had never committed a burglary, evidence of prior burglary conviction was admissible for the same reason. St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373, 39 St. Rep. 356 (1982), followed in St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989).

Waiver — Discussion by Defendant's Counsel Prior to Introduction by State: Defense counsel's discussion of an unsolicited response from a State's witness concerning evidence of other crimes, before the State introduced this evidence, did not amount to a waiver of the defendant's right to object to the evidence. St. v. Casagrande, 196 M 56, 637 P2d 826, 38 St. Rep. 2122 (1981).

Other Crimes — Burden of Proof: A criminal defendant need not prove that evidence is from another crime. Rather, the State has the burden of proving that the evidence is connected with the crime at issue. St. v. Casagrande, 196 M 56, 637 P2d 826, 38 St. Rep. 2122 (1981).

State's Failure to Prove Evidence Connected With Crime: The State failed to prove that a pharmaceutical bottle of a kind which usually contains narcotics and which was found in the room of suspected drugstore burglar was in fact connected to the burglary. Hence, the bottle was evidence of other crimes and was improperly admitted. St. v. Casagrande, 196 M 56, 637 P2d 826, 38 St. Rep. 2122 (1981).

Admissibility of Mug Shots — Cautionary Instruction: Defendant was identified as the perpetrator of a burglary by identification of mug shots by the two victims of the burglary and a next-door neighbor. The identifications were made from a mug shot book. The viewings were conducted separately and within a few days of the burglary. The parties did not discuss the identifications with each other. Defendant contended that the mug shots should not have been allowed to be introduced because they implied that he had committed prior criminal acts. The mug shots were booking photographs and merely indicated that defendant had been booked on prior occasions. The photographs were used for identification. No evidence was adduced indicating that defendant had ever been convicted of any crime. The photographs were relevant for purposes of identification. The judge also gave a cautionary instruction regarding the photographs. This instruction dealt with possible prejudicial effect, and it was within the discretion of the trial judge to admit the photographs. St. v. Stokes, 195 M 321, 637 P2d 498, 38 St. Rep. 1889 (1981).

Different Robbery — Failure to Meet Elements — Mere Similarity Not Sufficient: At defendant's trial, at which he was convicted of robbery, the State presented testimony, through a codefendant, of the planning and commission of another robbery. The specific details of the robbery, other than its commission, were not revealed. Defendant argues that such evidence was improperly admitted. Admissibility of evidence of other crimes is to be determined by the District Court pursuant to a four-element test: (1) similarity of crimes; (2) nearness in time; (3) tendency to establish a common scheme, plan, or system; and (4) the probative value of the evidence is not substantially outweighed by prejudice to the defendant. Only the time factor was met in this case. That sole similarity is not sufficient to trigger the exception making the evidence admissible. The improper admission of the evidence under the exception is reversible error. St. v. Case, 190 M 450, 621 P2d 1066, 37 St. Rep. 2057 (1980), following St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957, 36 St. Rep. 1649 (1979). See also St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Sequence Not Unusual: When the alleged similarities between crimes reveal nothing more than a sequence of events common in the crime charged, the acts are not unusual and distinctive enough to come within the purview of the exception allowing evidence of other crimes to be admitted. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980), explained in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986), and followed in St. v. Rogers, 1999 MT 305, 297 M 188, 992 P2d 229, 56 St. Rep. 1228 (1999).

Evidence of Other Sex Crimes — Prejudice to the Defendant: There is inherent prejudice in showing a defendant has committed a prior sex offense, and when the acts involved were not sufficiently similar and occurred 2½ years apart, the prejudicial effect of introduction of evidence of the first act substantially outweighed its probative value. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980), explained in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986).

Similarity of Acts of Intercourse Without Consent: Numerous rapes follow the pattern of barroom pickup, voluntary entry into defendant's vehicle by victim, driving to a remote area, advances, resistance, and forcible intercourse. The sequence of events has no distinctive qualities that distinguish the acts from other rapes as necessary to bring the events within the purview of the similarity element of the "other crimes" admission rule exception. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980), explained in St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986), and followed in St. v. Rogers, 1999 MT 305, 297 M 188, 992 P2d 229, 56 St. Rep. 1228 (1999).

Admission of Evidence of Other Crime — Living Upon Earnings of Prostitute: The court did not err in rejecting defendant's contention that a mistrial should have been declared upon his testimony on cross-examination that he lived with and was supported by a female who was a prostitute. The evidence was introduced to show financial status, not that he acted in conformity with his character in committing the crime charged. St. v. Williams, 185 M 140, 604 P2d 1224, 36 St. Rep. 2328 (1979).

Evidence of Other Crimes, Wrongs, or Acts — Hearsay — Prejudicial Error: Direct evidence of other crimes, if such evidence came within the exceptions of Rule 404(3)(b), M.R.Ev., would be admissible. Indirect, hearsay evidence must also conform to the rules relating to the admission of hearsay testimony, including the exceptions. If the severely beaten victim were regarded as an unavailable witness because of her physical condition, her statements would be admissible if they came within the exceptions of Rule 804, M.R.Ev. Here, however, the hearsay declarant was not found to have circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness because she admittedly disliked the defendant. Nor could the victim's statements be admitted as "excited utterances" because such utterances are admissible only if they are part of the res gestae of the crime charged. Admission of the statements of the victim to a friend and to her doctor, therefore, constituted prejudicial error. Admission of proof of wholly independent crimes requires a balancing of the relative probative value of the evidence against the prejudicial effect. Evidence of a course of conduct similar to the crime charged tends to prove the crime charged, but such evidence should not be admitted unless the proof thereof tends toward the conclusion that the defendant is guilty of the crime charged with moral certainty and beyond a reasonable doubt. With proper safeguards, the court would allow evidence of previous assaults. St. v. Brubaker, 184 M 294, 602 P2d 974, 36 St. Rep. 1915 (1979).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crimes or Acts — Procedure to Be Followed: To introduce evidence of prior uncharged offenses for the limited purposes allowed, the potential for prejudice to the defendant requires the prospective application of a three-part procedure in addition to any other requirements: (1) the defendant must be given notice of planned introduction and its purpose, following the form and procedure in 46-18-503 (renumbered 46-13-108); (2) the court must give a cautionary instruction on the purpose of the evidence; and (3) the court must charge the jury that the defendant is not being tried and may not be convicted for any other offense. St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957, 36 St. Rep. 1649 (1979), discussed in St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989), and in St. v. Sadowski, 247 M 63, 805 P2d 537, 48 St. Rep. 93 (1991), followed in St. v. St. Goddard, 226 M 158, 734 P2d 680, 44 St. Rep. 551 (1987), St. v. Gilpin, 232 M 56, 756 P2d 445, 45 St. Rep. 863 (1988), St. v. Eiler, 234 M 38, 762 P2d 210, 45 St. Rep. 1710 (1988), St. v. Hall, 234 M 57, 761 P2d 1283, 45 St. Rep. 1726 (1988), St. v. Randall, 237 M 271, 772 P2d 868, 46 St. Rep. 794 (1989), St. v. Fitzgerald, 238 M 261, 776 P2d 1222, 46 St. Rep. 1253 (1989), St. v. Heinrich, 242 M 110, 788 P2d 1346, 47 St. Rep. 314 (1990), St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52, 48 St. Rep. 614 (1991).

Sexual Assault — Evidence of Previous Crimes: The District Court did not commit a reversible error by not excluding testimony relating to other incidents of sexual assault. The court had granted a motion to suppress testimony by the minors involved in the other incidents, but the judge specifically restricted his ruling to testimony by, as opposed to testimony relating to, the minors and the defense attorney did not object. Further, he did not object at the trial when the testimony of the prosecutrix relating to statements made by the defendant was introduced. The testimony was relevant not to prove the occurrence of the incidents but to prove the intent of the accused. The testimony was of sufficient probative value to outweigh any possible prejudicial effect of its introduction. St. v. Patton, 183 M 417, 600 P2d 194, 36 St. Rep. 1731 (1979), followed in St. v. Long, 223 M 502, 726 P2d 1364, 43 St. Rep. 1948 (1986). See also St. v. Eiler, 234 M 38, 762 P2d 210, 45 St. Rep. 1710 (1988).

Other Crimes — Prejudice — Limited Use of Evidence: Testimony concerning another crime in the chain of events with the crime of which the defendant is accused, when used for impeachment purposes, may be admissible in a proper case. Since a stipulation stating the nature of the crime committed and the disposition of other prosecutions stemming from the crime had been read to the jury and since the defendant did not carry his burden of affirmatively showing prejudice, this was such a case. St. v. Holliday, 183 M 251, 598 P2d 1132, 36 St. Rep. 1535 (1979).

OTHER CRIMES — COMMON DESIGN, SCHEME, OR PLAN

District Court Properly Complied With Instructions on Remand — Only Illegal Sentence Provision Relating to Parole Struck From Sentence — District Court Properly Denied State-Funded Expert. St. v. Keefe, 2022 MT 121, 409 Mont. 86, 512 P.3d 741. See also St. v. Keefe, 2021 MT 8, 403 Mont. 1, 478 P.3d 830.

Evidence of Prior Homosexual Overture by Defendant Allowed to Prove Intent: The defendant was accused of sodomizing and killing a man in a hot tub. At trial, the state sought to introduce evidence that prior to the murder, the defendant had invited another man into the same hot tub who left when the defendant started to touch him suggestively. The defendant argued that the evidence about the prior homosexual overture was prejudicial and outweighed any probative evidence. The District Court disagreed and allowed the evidence at trial. Following his conviction, the defendant appealed. The Supreme Court affirmed, holding that the circumstances of both events were sufficiently similar and near in time to logically show a common motive and intent. St. v. Madplume, 2017 MT 40, 386 Mont. 368, 390 P.3d 142.

Admissibility of Evidence of Other Crimes — “Plan” Synonymous With “Common Scheme” — Sixteen-Year Period Since Prior Acts Considered Too Remote to Constitute Common Scheme: To prevent convictions based merely on a jury finding that someone has a propensity to do certain things, this rule provides that evidence of a person’s character or a trait of character is not admissible for the purpose of proving action in conformity with character on a particular occasion. One exception to that rule allows admission of character evidence when other crimes prove a defendant’s plan. Although the word “plan” is not a defined term of art in the context of the criminal code, the Supreme Court determined that a plan is encompassed within the definition of common scheme in 45-2-101. In the present case, character evidence was admitted on the basis that the sexual assault committed by Aakre upon his stepgranddaughter was sufficiently similar to an assault by Aakre upon his stepdaughter 16 years earlier to establish a plan or modus operandi because of the similarity of the incidents, and because both involved a continuous pattern of conduct rather than a single instance of conduct. Following conviction, Aakre moved for a new trial on grounds that the other crimes evidence was improperly admitted under St. v. Sweeney, 2000 MT 74, 299 M 111, 999 P2d 296 (2000), and the motion was granted. The state appealed, but the Supreme Court affirmed. Aakre’s alleged plan did not meet the definition of common scheme for several reasons. Evidence of the prior crimes did not prove that Aakre was motivated by a purpose to accomplish a single criminal objective or by a common purpose or plan resulting in the repeated commission of the same offense. Further, incidents occurring 16 years apart were not considered near enough in time to establish a common scheme. St. v. Aakre, 2002 MT 101, 309 M 403, 46 P3d 648 (2002).

Evidence of Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy Proper to Prove Motive, Not Character: Hocevar was charged with attempted deliberate homicide, two counts of deliberate homicide, criminal endangerment, and assault in connection with the deaths of her two sons. She contended on appeal that it was error to introduce evidence of another son's death to prove her character, in that she suffered from Munchausen Syndrome by Proxy (MSBP), which is a pattern of behavior wherein a caretaker, usually a mother, fabricates or causes illness in another, usually a preverbal child, to gain attention, and then to use MSBP as the common plan or motive for her actions against her other children. The Supreme Court considered the third and fourth elements of the modified Just rule, holding that the evidence was admissible. MSBP is not a psychiatric diagnosis of a mental disorder, but rather a pediatric diagnosis of a form of child abuse. The "disorder" consists of the behavior of the person suffering from it, so there is no distinction between the disorder and the behavior associated with the disorder. As such, MSBP did not describe Hocevar's character, but rather her behavior toward her children. The evidence showed motive and was properly admitted under the third requirement of the modified Just rule because it was used to establish Hocevar's motive in smothering one child and poisoning another, not to establish Hocevar's character and that she acted in conformity with MSBP. The possible prejudicial effect of the evidence was substantially outweighed by its great probative weight because it tended to establish the MSBP diagnosis and Hocevar's motive. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crime to Prove Motive or Intent — First Crime to Give Rise to Motive for Second Crime: For evidence of prior crimes to be admissible to show motive or intent, the commission of the first crime or act should give rise to a motive or reason for defendant to commit the second crime. Here, the state failed to show a connection between Sweeney's 1989 Wisconsin sexual assault conviction that would give rise to a motive or reason for Sweeney to commit a sexual assault in Montana in 1996. Thus, evidence of the 1989 conviction was improperly admitted for purposes of proving motive. St. v. Sweeney, 2000 MT 74, 299 M 111, 999 P2d 296, 57 St. Rep. 325 (2000), followed in St. v. Aakre, 2002 MT 101, 309 M 403, 46 P3d 648 (2002). See also St. v. Weldy, 273 M 68, 902 P2d 1, 52 St. Rep. 729 (1995).

Evidence That Insurance Agent Who Had Premiums Paid With Loans Against Policy Without Plaintiffs' Knowledge Did Same Thing to Other Insureds: An insurance agent testified that forms that he filled out authorizing loans against plaintiffs' policies to pay premiums must have been authorized by plaintiffs because he would not otherwise have filled them out and sent them in. Plaintiffs testified that they did not authorize, sign, or see the forms. Testimony of other persons to whom the agent sold policies that this also happened to them and that they did not authorize the loans was not inadmissible under this rule. The fact that loans against the other persons' existing policies were used to fund new policies, whereas in this case a loan against each policy was used to fund that policy, did not make the agent's acts dissimilar. In addition, the agent's acts relative to plaintiffs and the other persons occurred at about the same time and the acts relative to both groups were probative of a plan to earn commissions by fraudulently misrepresenting policies that people would not otherwise have bought. The probative value of the evidence also outweighed the danger of unfair prejudice. Cartwright v. Equitable Life Assurance Soc'y, 276 M 1, 914 P2d 976, 53 St. Rep. 268 (1996).

Evidence That Similar Wrongs to Others Were Remedied: Plaintiffs were entitled to corroborate their testimony as to the defendant insurance agent's fraudulent acts and to impeach his testimony as to the acts by evidence of other insureds that established a pattern of conduct. Defendants were entitled to show that when the agent's acts as to the other insureds were brought to the company's attention, the other insureds' problems were resolved to their satisfaction. Defendants were not entitled to give evidence of the particular manner in which the other insureds' problems were resolved because the evidence had no bearing on this case. Cartwright v. Equitable Life Assurance Soc'y, 276 M 1, 914 P2d 976, 53 St. Rep. 268 (1996).

Uncorroborated Testimony of Alleged Accomplice of Past Arson Conspiracy Inadmissible as Prejudicial: In an arson case, the state appealed the lower court's refusal to allow the introduction of evidence by an alleged conspirator that he and the defendant, Rippingale, had conspired in the past to burn down another building. The Supreme Court held that the lower court had not abused its discretion in ruling that the two fires were not similar enough, as required by St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979). The Supreme Court also held that the alleged conspirator's credibility was to be contested in the trial and therefore admitting his testimony on the previous fires could be prejudicial to Rippingale. St. v. Andersen, 260 M 354, 860 P2d 115, 50 St. Rep. 1095 (1993).

Evidence of Other Crimes as Proof of Continuing Course of Conduct — Adequacy of Jury Instruction — Failure to Make Specific Objection: Defendant Howell contended that the District Court's instruction to the jury that it could consider evidence of other crimes as proof of a continuous pattern of conduct violated the Just notice and jury instructions. Although the phrase "continuing course of conduct" has never been specifically approved for use in a jury instruction, it has been used interchangeably with several of the Just requirements. Use of the phrase in this case was found to be surplusage that was improperly included in the instruction; however, its use was not prejudicial and constituted harmless error. Further, Howell's failure to object to the adequacy of the Just notice requirements waived any deficiency in the notice. St. v. Howell, 254 M 438, 839 P2d 7, 49 St. Rep. 759 (1992).

Evidence of Prior Acts Not Limited to Common Scheme, Plan, or System — Admission of Other Crimes Harmless Error: While the Just rule clearly provides for the admission of evidence for purposes other than a common scheme, plan, or system, the District Court's improper admission of evidence that defendant had been involved 3 months earlier in an assault on a woman during which he repeatedly shoved a Deputy Sheriff did not constitute grounds for reversal of his conviction for felony assault (now assault with a weapon). St. v. Matt, 249 M 136, 814 P2d 52, 48 St. Rep. 614 (1991).

Evidence of Prior Theft Admissible: The Supreme Court held that evidence of a prior theft committed by the defendant was admissible because it was strikingly similar to the crime with which the defendant was presently charged. Each theft involved the theft of recyclable metal products from private property, and each resulted in the sale of the stolen items by the defendant to a recycling business. St. v. Ramstead, 243 M 162, 793 P2d 802, 47 St. Rep. 1101 (1990).

Similar Acts Not Probative of Common Scheme: Defendant was charged with felony assault, (now assault with a weapon) driving under the influence, and driving while his license was suspended. The District Court erred in allowing introduction of evidence of defendant's arrest for certain crimes during the 4 months prior to trial. Applying the Just test, the Supreme Court found the crimes were similar in nature and not remote in time; however, the acts did not establish a common scheme, plan, or system. Although the evidence showed that when defendant was intoxicated he became verbally and physically abusive toward officers who tried to arrest or restrain him, this was a demonstration of spontaneous acts dictated by his character and the situation at hand rather than a common scheme or plan. The probative value of the evidence did not outweigh the prejudice flowing to defendant under these circumstances. St. v. Brown, 242 M 506, 791 P2d 1384, 47 St. Rep. 935 (1990).

Introduction of Evidence of Other Crimes Prior to Case in Chief — Court Discretion to Allow Chronological Presentation of Evidence: Defendant claimed the District Court improperly allowed introduction of evidence of other crimes, wrongs, and acts before the prosecution presented evidence of the crime charged. The state gave sufficient notice that it intended to introduce evidence of five burglaries or attempted burglaries, in chronological order, attributed to defendant. To cure any defect, the state filed a sealed affidavit with the court 1 week before trial, setting out what this evidence would prove. The court carefully apprised the jury of what crime was charged and admonished the jury as to the limited purposes of the prior crimes and acts evidence. The Just rules for admissibility having been met and an offer of proof having been received by the court for the chronological presentation of evidence, it was within the court's discretion to allow the sequence and order of presentation. St. v. Keefe, 232 M 258, 759 P2d 128, 45 St. Rep. 1034 (1988). See also St. v. Keefe, 2021 MT 8, 403 Mont. 1, 478 P.3d 830, and St. v. Keefe, 2022 MT 121, 409 Mont. 86, 512 P.3d 741.

Denial of Evidence Relating to Prior Fires — No Error: The Supreme Court found no error in the denial by the District Court Judge of evidence or testimony relating to prior fires from which the insured may have received insurance proceeds. The court held that the proffered evidence did not naturally and logically tend to establish a fact in issue and did not meet the test of relevancy, in that it did not make probable that the insured had committed arson either from the viewpoint of motive, intent, or the deed itself. Britton v. Farmers Ins. Group, 221 M 67, 721 P2d 303, 43 St. Rep. 641 (1986), followed in St. v. Enright, 1998 MT 322, 292 M 204, 974 P2d 1118, 55 St. Rep. 1308 (1998). See also St. v. Link, 1999 MT 4, 293 M 23, 974 P2d 1124, 56 St. Rep. 13 (1999).

Failure to Consider "Just" Factors Together — Reversible Error: The District Court erred in granting a defense motion to preclude the state from using evidence of any incidents that occurred prior to the alleged incident that formed the basis of a prosecution for incest. The trial court considered only one of the four factors applicable in a determination of this type under St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957, 36 St. Rep. 1649 (1979). While failure of questioned evidence to meet only one element of the Just test is not sufficient to refuse its admission, a decision to admit the evidence should not be made lightly. St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986).

Meaning of "Remote" Under "Just" Test: The term "remote" under the test of St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957, 36 St. Rep. 1649 (1979), means more than mere lapse of time. Place and circumstances also must be considered. Thus, in this case, while the actual length of time between the two incidents was 4 years, the opportunity for an encounter between defendant and the victim did not reoccur during that 4-year period. Further, if the alleged second incident did occur, it occurred at the first opportunity, making the actual time period between the two incidents less significant. St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986).

Evidence of Prior Acts — Remoteness Overcome by Pattern of Conduct: Although an isolated incident occurring 9 years previously was too remote to be admissible, evidence showing that defendant on several occasions committed or attempted to commit sexual acts with young girls for a period of 9 years up to the time of the alleged offense was sufficient to establish a common scheme or plan and rendered the evidence admissible. St. v. Tecca, 220 M 168, 714 P2d 136, 43 St. Rep. 264 (1986), followed in St. v. Long, 223 M 502, 726 P2d 1364, 43 St. Rep. 1948 (1986), St. v. Gambrel, 246 M 84, 803 P2d 1071, 47 St. Rep. 2270 (1990), St. v. McKnight, 250 M 457, 820 P2d 1279, 48 St. Rep. 981 (1991), and in St. v. Romero, 261 M 221, 861 P2d 929, 50 St. Rep. 1296 (1993).

Cautionary Instruction — Evidence of Other Crimes: Before allowing testimony of a prosecution witness who claimed she had been sexually assaulted by defendant, the District Court instructed the jury they could not consider evidence of defendant's other crimes as proof he is a person of bad character or has a disposition to commit crimes, but could consider evidence to prove characteristic method, plan, or scheme or to show existence of purpose or knowledge, an element of the crime charged. The instruction was based on St. v. Van Natta, 200 M 312, 651 P2d 57, 39 St. Rep. 1771 (1982), except the District Court substituted words "purpose or knowledge" for word "intent" found in Van Natta. The cautionary instruction was proper concerning the admission of evidence of other crimes. St. v. Norris, 212 M 427, 689 P2d 243, 41 St. Rep. 1841 (1984).

Common Scheme — Homicide Trial — Prior Similar Acts: In a homicide trial following the shooting of recently divorced ex-wife's boyfriend, ex-wife testified that defendant had often, during the period of from 1 to 3½ years prior to the homicide, pointed guns at her, held a knife to her throat, strangled her, and slapped her. That testimony was admissible under State's theory of prior acts showing a common scheme, plan, or design, i.e., the threat and possible carrying out of violence to intimidate her and those associated with her. The testimony met the tests of similarity to the act charged; nearness in time; and tendency to establish a common scheme, plan, or design. Probative value was not substantially outweighed by prejudice to defendant, and the State gave defendant notice of its intent to introduce the evidence and why. The judge's failure to admonish the jury that the testimony was admitted only for the State's stated purpose was not reversible error because defendant did not object to the failure. Once the State has given notice, the remaining procedures are mandatory only upon defendant's request and/or objection. He cannot consciously plant errors by remaining silent and then objecting on appeal. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984), followed with regard to failure to object in St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990).

Notice Required: Defendant was charged with slashing his ex-wife's tires. During the trial, evidence was introduced that the wife had had a total of 36 tires slashed since her divorce from defendant. Additionally, men she had dated testified to having their tires slashed during the dating period. Defense counsel challenged this evidence of prior conduct because the defense had not received notice that the State would introduce such evidence. The State said that there was no prejudice as defendant was aware the State intended to introduce such evidence. The Supreme Court said prejudice was found in the fact that defendant did not know exactly what acts or crimes he would have to be prepared to defend against at trial, nor did he know the form of such testimony. The case was remanded for retrial. St. v. Brown, 209 M 502, 680 P2d 582, 41 St. Rep. 852 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Krantz, 241 M 501, 788 P2d 298, 47 St. Rep. 454 (1990).

Other Crimes — Evidence of Policy of Persistent Child Abuse: The River of Life Tabernacle Church established a policy of disciplining the children of the church members. This disciplining led to the death of victim, one of the children of the church. The defendant was a major participant in the systematic series of acts which led to victim's death. Evidence was admitted concerning the church's policy of persistent child abuse carried out in large part by the defendant. The defendant objected to the admission of this evidence on the grounds that it was evidence of other crimes and should not have been admitted. The court held that the jury is entitled to view the death of victim in the context of prior events and that the beatings of victim and other children were not isolated events but part of a continuous series of beatings inflicted by the defendant and others over a period of months. St. v. Riley, 199 M 413, 649 P2d 1273, 39 St. Rep. 1491 (1982), clarified, with regard to the applicability of the corpus delicti rule, in St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999).

Evidence of Much Greater Amount of Marijuana Than Defendant Charged With: County Sheriffs saw defendant place a garbage bag in his truck and drive away from residence that was under surveillance for suspicion of drug-related activity in house. The officers followed defendant, and although he eluded them briefly, they caught up with him and searched his vehicle. Since the officers did not find a garbage bag in the truck, they retraced the truck's route and discovered a garbage bag similar to the bag seen in defendant's possession earlier. The bag contained about 10 pounds of marijuana. Later the officers obtained a warrant to search the house and a vehicle parked in front of it. This search resulted in the seizure of 80 pounds of marijuana, scales for weighing it, and bags for packaging it. The occupant of the house was arrested. During defendant's trial, much evidence concerning the search of the residence was admitted under the state's theory that it was relevant to prove a common scheme or plan. The Supreme Court reversed defendant's conviction of possession of dangerous drugs with intent to sell because of prosecutor's failure to comply with rule for determining admissibility of evidence of other crimes or evidence of a common scheme or plan. The court also stated that the evidence may have been inadmissible under this rule. St. v. Stemple, 198 M 409, 646 P2d 539, 39 St. Rep. 1085 (1982).

Child Beating Death — Common Design — Other Acts: Defendants were members of a religious sect that practiced violent child discipline techniques. While caring for a child at different times, each of four defendants engaged in incidences of child beating, eventually leading to the child's death. It was not error to admit evidence of the acts by church members other than defendants and acts by the defendants against children other than the victim to show the common design toward disciplining children by beatings arising out of the church policy. The evidence also provided proof of defendants' motive, intent, and plan. St. v. Powers, 198 M 289, 645 P2d 1357, 39 St. Rep. 989 (1982).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Sexual Assault — Similarity: Defendant was convicted of intimidation for trying to force the victim to engage in sex with him. The District Court admitted evidence of a previous sexual assault committed by the defendant in a similar manner. State v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), established the substantive and procedural requirements to be met before such evidence may be admitted. In order for evidence of other crimes to be admissible, a court must first determine: (1) whether the previous crimes are sufficiently similar; (2) whether they are near enough in time; (3) whether the evidence is offered for one of the purposes permitted by Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev.; and (4) whether the probative value of the evidence is substantially outweighed by its inherently prejudicial nature. The testimony admitted described a sexual assault committed by defendant in a manner very similar to the crime charged. The incident had occurred 9 months before. The evidence was presented to prove motive, intent, or common scheme or plan. The evidence was highly probative and outweighed its prejudicial nature. It was properly admitted. St. v. Wurtz, 195 M 226, 636 P2d 246, 38 St. Rep. 1808 (1981).

Common Scheme or Plan Evidence Admissible: Evidence presented by the prosecution concerning two television thefts by the defendants from two different motels introduced in order to link the defendants to a third theft from a third motel has probative value tending to prove common scheme and is not so inherently prejudicial that it is inadmissible and a denial of a fair trial to defendants. The evidence has the effect of helping to prove through circumstantial evidence the commission of the crime and the connection of the defendants with the common scheme. Prejudicial evidence is not always inadmissible evidence. St. v. Strain, 190 M 44, 618 P2d 331, 37 St. Rep. 1763 (1980).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Remoteness: Evidence that defendant charged with sexual intercourse without consent had committed a similar act 2½ years before was too remote to fall within the exception to the general rule that evidence of other crimes is not admissible. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980).

Evidence of Other Crimes — Tendency to Establish Common Scheme: Evidence that the defendant, charged with sexual intercourse without consent, had 2½ years earlier raped another woman after picking her up in a bar and driving her to a remote area did not tend to establish a common scheme, plan, or system. On the first occasion, the defendant and the victim were alone when he allegedly committed the act and in the crime charged the defendant and the victim were in the company of a third party. St. v. Hansen, 187 M 91, 608 P2d 1083, 37 St. Rep. 657 (1980).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crimes or Acts — Common Design: The court did not commit error in admitting prosecutrix's uncorroborated testimony of prior uncharged sexual assaults by prosecutrix's stepfather for the limited purpose of showing plan, scheme, or design, as there was no showing of substantial prejudice to the defendant by admitting such evidence. St. v. Just, 184

M 262, 602 P2d 957, 36 St. Rep. 1649 (1979), following St. v. Jensen, 153 M 233, 455 P2d 631 (1969), followed in St. v. Tecca, 220 M 168, 714 P2d 136, 43 St. Rep. 264 (1986), and in St. v. McKnight, 250 M 457, 820 P2d 1279, 48 St. Rep. 981 (1991). See also St. v. Doll, 214 M 390, 692 P2d 473, 42 St. Rep. 40 (1985).

Admissibility of Evidence of Prior Crimes or Acts — Procedure to Be Followed: To introduce evidence of prior uncharged offenses for the limited purposes allowed, the potential for prejudice to the defendant requires the prospective application of a three-part procedure in addition to any other requirements: (1) the defendant must be given notice of planned introduction and its purpose, following the form and procedure in 46-18-503 (renumbered 46-13-108); (2) the court must give a cautionary instruction on the purpose of the evidence; and (3) the court must charge the jury that the defendant is not being tried and may not be convicted for any other offense. St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957, 36 St. Rep. 1649 (1979), discussed in St. v. Mix, 239 M 351, 781 P2d 751, 46 St. Rep. 1740 (1989), followed in St. v. Norris, 212 M 427, 689 P2d 243, 41 St. Rep. 1841 (1984), St. v. Tecca, 220 M 168, 714 P2d 136, 43 St. Rep. 264 (1986), St. v. T.W., 220 M 280, 715 P2d 428, 43 St. Rep. 368 (1986), *St. v. ACT OR CRIME INSEPARABLE FROM CRIME CHARGED

No Error in Admitting Evidence of Alleged Threats and Prior Conduct: In a proceeding concerning a misdemeanor assault conviction, the trial court did not abuse its discretion in admitting evidence of an altercation in a parking lot with another member of the victim's party prior to the incident and evidence of earlier threats from the defendant. The Supreme Court held that the events explained the charged offense and were inextricably linked with it. Furthermore, although the defendant argued that the evidence should be excluded under Rule 403, M.R.Ev., the trial court did not err in refusing to exclude the evidence because the rule does not require that relevant information be excluded simply because it is prejudicial. St. v. Lamarr, 2014 MT 222, 376 Mont. 232, 332 P.3d 258.

Evidence of Escalating Sexual Abuse, Including Uncharged Incidents Occurring in Another State, Properly Admitted Under Transaction Rule — No Ineffective Assistance of Counsel for Failure to Object to Admissible Evidence: At Crosley's incest trial, the state sought to introduce evidence of several incidents of abuse that occurred in California and in a county outside Ravalli County, where the crimes were charged. Defense counsel did not object to admission of the evidence, and the trial court allowed it. On appeal, Crosley asserted error in admitting the evidence and claimed ineffective assistance of counsel based on defense counsel's failure to object to the testimony or to request that the trial court provide a contemporaneous admonition at the time the evidence was admitted. The Supreme Court affirmed on both issues. Evidence of Crosley's other acts of incest that occurred in places other than Ravalli County was not wholly independent of or unrelated to the charged offenses in Ravalli County, and all the acts of incest, regardless of where they occurred, were inextricably linked to and explanatory of the Ravalli County offenses, so evidence thereof was admissible under the transaction rule exception to other crimes evidence in Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev. The fact in dispute was whether various acts of incest occurred, including evidence of uncharged acts that occurred outside Ravalli County, because those acts were clearly related to and not independent of the continuous and escalating nature of Crosley's sexual abuse. The other crimes evidence was thus proper under the transaction rule, and there was no error in the trial court's other acts jury instruction or in the court's assessment of the state's notice of intent to introduce evidence of other acts. Additionally, Crosley's counsel could not have provided ineffective assistance based on failure to object to admissible evidence. St. v. Crosley, 2009 MT 126, 350 M 223, 206 P3d 932 (2009). See also St. v. Lozon, 2004 MT 34, 320 M 26, 85 P3d 753 (2004).

Defendant's Earlier Behavior on Night in Question Admissible Under Transaction Rule Not Inadmissible as Evidence of Other Crimes: Mackrill argued that the jury verdict against him finding him guilty of aggravated assault should be dismissed because the state had introduced evidence of his inebriated and aggressive behavior in other bars previous to his assaulting an individual later that night. Mackrill argued that the evidence, including portions of his taped interview after his arrest, was inadmissible as evidence of other crimes and that the prosecution did not give him prior notice of its intent to use the evidence as required by Montana case law. The Supreme Court held that the notice requirement does not apply to evidence of matters that are inextricably linked to and explanatory of the offense; in the present case, the evidence was not wholly independent of or unrelated to the charged offense and therefore was not evidence of other crimes but was admissible under the transaction rule. St. v. Mackrill, 2008 MT 297, 345 M 469, 191 P3d 451 (2008).

Admissibility of Evidence of Drug Use Inseparably Related to Crime Charged: Buck was charged with deliberate homicide with a weapon and burglary. At trial, the prosecution sought to introduce evidence of Buck's drug use, and the evidence was allowed. Following conviction, Buck appealed on grounds that the evidence was irrelevant and did not meet the procedural requirements of the modified Just rule regarding other crimes, wrongs, or acts. However, an exception to the Just rule provides that, in association with the transaction rule in 26-1-103, evidence of acts that are inextricably or inseparably linked with the charged offense is admissible notwithstanding the substantive and procedural criteria of the modified Just rule. Buck's drug use was explanatory of the circumstances surrounding the charged offenses, so evidence of drug use was relevant and not precluded by the modified Just rule and was properly admitted. St. v. Buck, 2006 MT 81, 331 M 517, 134 P3d 53 (2006). See also St. v. Lozon, 2004 MT 34, 320 M 26, 85 P3d 753 (2004).

Discussion of Intent to Kill Persons Other Than Those Assaulted Admissible as Part of Res Gestae, Transaction, or Corpus Delicti: Before Hayworth participated in shooting Bradford and Kunesh, Hayworth and another defendant discussed killing two men known as Tray and Big Rich. Hayworth tried to prevent testimony of his discussion with the other defendant from being given, but the District Court denied Hayworth's motion in limine and allowed the testimony. The Supreme Court held that the evidence of Hayworth's conversation about killing Tray and Big Rich was admissible, whether as part of the transaction, res gestae, or corpus delicti. St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Evidence of Use of Illegal Weapon Admissible in Deliberate Homicide Case — Just Warning Not Required: Defendant in a deliberate homicide case contended that the court erroneously allowed the state to present evidence that the shotgun used in the shootings had been illegally altered, without providing a Just notice or modified Just notice. However, the state was entitled to introduce evidence of the act of owning an illegal shotgun because it was inextricably related to the crime. A Just notice was not required because the evidence was part of the corpus delicti. St. v. Byers, 261 M 17, 861 P2d 860, 50 St. Rep. 1162 (1993).

Evidence of Prior Drug Sale Not Part of Corpus Delicti and Therefore Inadmissible: Based on the testimony of witness Grotjohn, defendant Cameron was convicted of the sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). At trial, the District Court allowed the state to introduce evidence of a sale of cocaine by Cameron to Grotjohn on May 3 and a subsequent sale on May 4. However, Cameron was charged with only one count of sale of a dangerous drug on May 4. The Supreme Court held that the drug sale on May 3 was not so inextricably or inseparably linked to the sale on May 4 that the May 3 sale should be considered part of the corpus delicti. The evidence of the May 3 sale was not necessary to explain the subsequent sale and offense. Following St. v. Trombley, 190 M 218, 620 P2d 367 (1980), and St. v. Christensen, 244 M 312, 797 P2d 893 (1990), and overruling in part St. v. Frates, 160 M 431, 503 P2d 47 (1972), the Supreme Court held evidence of the May 3 drug sale to be inadmissible and reversed the defendant's conviction. St. v. Cameron, 255 M 14, 839 P2d 1281, 49 St. Rep. 861 (1992), clarified, with regard to the applicability of the corpus delicti rule, in St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999).

Admissibility of Evidence Inseparable From Crime Charged: Evidence of acts that are inextricably or inseparably linked with the crime charged is admissible without regard to the rules governing "other crimes" evidence. St. v. Romero, 224 M 431, 730 P2d 1157, 43 St. Rep. 2309 (1986), citing St. v. Riley, 199 M 413, 649 P2d 1273, 39 St. Rep. 1491 (1982), followed in St. v. Ungaretti, 239 M 314, 779 P2d 923, 46 St. Rep. 1710 (1989), St. v. Davis, 253 M 50, 830 P2d 1309, 49 St. Rep. 342 (1992), St. v. Hage, 258 M 498, 853 P2d 1251, 50 St. Rep. 631 (1993), St. v. Langford, 267 M 95, 882 P2d 490, 51 St. Rep. 962 (1994), and St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998), and clarified, with regard to the applicability of the corpus delicti rule, in St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999).

State Allowed to Present Entire Corpus Delicti: Defendant was tried and convicted of attempted deliberate homicide. During the course of the trial, the State introduced evidence that defendant openly talked of his plan, that he called and visited the home of the intended victim, that he possessed dynamite, that the intended victim's wife gave him a gun, and that he followed the intended victim's vehicle intending to harm him. Defendant's attorney made continuous objections to the introduction of the evidence without the "other crimes" procedures mandated in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957, 36 St. Rep. 1649 (1979), being followed. The Supreme Court held that each act, whether criminal or not, was inseparably related to the act charged. The State was entitled to present the entire corpus delicti of the crime charged. The court, however, encouraged trial courts to apply the safeguards of Just liberally. St. v. Gillham, 206 M 169, 670 P2d 544, 40 St. Rep. 1576 (1983), followed in St. v. Canon, 212 M 157, 687 P2d 705, 41 St. Rep. 1659 (1984), St. v. Ungaretti, 239 M 314, 779 P2d 923, 46 St. Rep. 1710 (1989), and in St. v. Wolfe, 250 M 400, 821 P2d 339, 48 St. Rep. 1001 (1991), distinguished in St. v. Laster, 232 M 152, 724 P2d 721, 43 St. Rep. 1614 (1986), and clarified, with regard to the applicability of the corpus delicti rule, in St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999). See also St. v. Dawson, 233 M 345, 761 P2d 352, 45 St. Rep. 1542 (1988), and St. v. Monaco, 277 M 221, 921 P2d 863, 53 St. Rep. 604 (1996). Monaco was followed in St. v. Hayworth, 1998 MT 158, 289 M 433, 964 P2d 1, 55 St. Rep. 631 (1998).

Other Crimes — Evidence of Policy of Persistent Child Abuse: The River of Life Tabernacle Church established a policy of disciplining the children of the church members. This disciplining led to the death of victim, one of the children of the church. The defendant was a major participant in the systematic series of acts which led to victim's death. Evidence was admitted concerning the church's policy of persistent child abuse carried out in large part by the defendant. The defendant objected to the admission of this evidence on the grounds that it was evidence of other crimes and should not have been admitted. The court held that the jury is entitled to view the death of victim in the context of prior events and that the beatings of victim and other children were not isolated events but part of a continuous series of beatings inflicted by the defendant and others over a period of months. St. v. Riley, 199 M 413, 649 P2d 1273, 39 St. Rep. 1491 (1982), clarified, with regard to the applicability of the corpus delicti rule, in St. v. Hansen, 1999 MT 253, 296 M 282, 989 P2d 338, 56 St. Rep. 997 (1999).

Evidence of Inseparably Related Crime Not Inadmissible Evidence of "Other Crimes": A defendant appealed his conviction for theft of a truck. The sole issue on appeal was whether the trial court erred in denying the defendant's motion to prohibit reference at trial to his use of the truckowner's credit cards which were stored in the truck. Use of "other crimes" evidence requires notice to the defendant. The reviewing court, however, said that the evidence of the defendant's possession and use of the credit cards was not "other crimes" evidence. Because the wallet with the credit cards was in the truck when the truck was stolen, the evidence of the defendant's possession and use of a credit card was inseparably related to the truck theft. The acts of misconduct were simultaneous. The use of the credit card evidence was not unfair surprise or an unrelated issue. So, although the general rule is that when a defendant is tried for one offense he should be convicted, if at all, by evidence which shows that he is guilty of that offense alone, the evidence of the possession of the victim's credit cards was not "wholly independent" or "other crimes" evidence. Accordingly, the evidence was admissible under the facts of this case and no error was committed by the trial court. St. v. Trombley, 190 M 218, 620 P2d 367, 37 St. Rep. 1871 (1980), followed in St. v. Smith, 206 M 99, 670 P2d 96, 40 St. Rep. 1533 (1983), and distinguished in St. v. Laster, 232 M 152, 724 P2d 721, 43 St. Rep. 1614 (1986).

Admission of Evidence of Prior Relationship Between Defendant and Victim's Girlfriend and Threats by Defendant Against Her: The defendant in a deliberate homicide case claimed on appeal that the trial court erred in admitting into evidence acts and statements of the defendant which occurred prior to the shooting. The evidence concerned the former romantic relationship of the victim's girlfriend with the accused, the ill feelings of the defendant toward the victim that developed after the defendant's relationship with the woman was replaced with the victim's relationship with her, and the ensuing threats made by the defendant toward the woman. Because the State had to prove that the defendant purposely or knowingly caused the victim's death, the evidence of the defendant's intent was relevant in general and specifically because the defendant here alleged that he shot the victim in self-defense. Although threats against a person other than the victim are not admissible generally, when the circumstances are such that the threat tends to show hostility toward the deceased, they are relevant. Although evidence of other crimes, wrongs, or acts is not admissible to prove the character of a person in order to show that he acted in conformity therewith it may be admissible for other purposes such as proof of motive or intent or where such evidence forms a part of a single chain of facts so intimately connected that the whole must be considered in order to interpret its several parts. Further, the challenged testimony was crucial to prove defendant's mental state at the time of the shooting, and as a result, the probative value outweighed its prejudicial effect. St. v. Bashor, 188 M 397, 614 P2d 470, 37 St. Rep. 1098 (1980), followed in St. v. Matson, 227 M 36, 736 P2d 971, 44 St. Rep. 874 (1987).

State v. Pelletier: Protecting the Balance Between Montana Rules of Evidence 404 and 607, Monroe, 83 Mont. L. Rev. 171 (2022).

Rule 405. Methods of proving character.

Commission Comments

This rule deals only with the methods which may be used to prove character evidence. Rule 404 deals with the admissibility of character evidence and is the only rule under which character evidence may be admitted. When character evidence is admissible, it is to be proven by methods specified by this rule.

(a) Reputation or opinion. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 405(a). The subdivision deals with two of the three allowable methods of proof of character evidence, reputation and opinion. It should be noted that reputation is what the general community thinks a person's character is, while character is the trait the person actually possesses, and the two may not always coincide. The Commission believes that because of the potential inaccuracy of proof of character through reputation and because a person may not actually have a "reputation" as such in today's society and therefore testimony given by witnesses as to character may really only be an opinion, opinion evidence is allowed under this subdivision to prove character.

Existing Montana law has generally allowed evidence of character to be proved by reputation. An example allowing evidence of the good character of the accused to rebut evidence that he committed a crime is State v. Moorman, 133 Mont. 148, 153, 321 P2d 236 (1957). In that case, the court stated the rule in these terms: "The rule is well settled that, when a defendant in a criminal case calls witnesses to testify that he possesses such a general reputation in the community..." [sic] It should also be noted that two older cases, State v. Shafer, 22 Mont. 17, 18, 55 P 526 (1898) and Matushevitz v. Hughes, 26 Mont. 212, 217, 68 P 467 (1902), have both held that when witnesses testify that they are in a position to know and hear what the reputation of a person is, but that they have never heard the character questioned or talked about, this is admissible because "if one lives such a life as not to excite adverse criticism of good or bad people, it cannot be said that this person has aught else than a reputation for good character". Matushevitz v. Hughes, supra.

Existing Montana law impliedly allows opinion evidence to prove character. Wilson v. Wilson, 128 Mont. 151, 517, 278 P2d 219 (1954) held admissible opinion testimony by a witness as to the fitness of one of the parties to have custody of her children. This subdivision expands the rule of this case to all character evidence.

The final sentence of this subdivision, in contrast to the first two methods of proof, provides that inquiry is allowable into relevant specific instances of conduct on cross-examination. This sentence codified the rule of Michelson v. United States, 335 U.S. 469 (1948), also followed in Montana in State v. Jones, 48 Mont. 505, 516, 139 P 441 (1914); State v. Popa, 56 Mont. 587, 590, 185 P 1114 (1919) and State v. Moorman, supra. These cases held the prosecution could rebut the accused's evidence of good character by cross-examining as to the witnesses' "knowledge of disparaging rumors or common reports affecting this reputation.... The prosecution has the right to cross-examine the witnesses to ascertain the sufficiency of grounds upon which they base their statements". State v. Moorman, supra. Therefore this last sentence is consistent with Montana case law.

(b) Specific instances of conduct. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 405(b) except that "or where the character of the victim relates to the reasonableness of force used by the accused in self defense", is added to make the rule consistent with Montana law. This method of proof is the most persuasive of the three contained in the rule and is also the most likely "to arouse undue prejudice, to confuse and distract, to engender time-consuming side issues and to create risk of unfair surprise". McCormick, Handbook of the Law of Evidence 443 (2d ed. 1972). As a result of the effect of this method of proof, it is generally restricted to situations where character is in issue, when such proof is central to the outcome of the case.

Existing Montana law has dealt with this method of proof only in criminal cases involving the violent character of the victim offered by the accused to show that the amount of force used by the accused to defend himself was reasonable. State v. Shadwell, 22 Mont. 559, 572, 57 P 281 (1899) and appeal after second trial, 26 Mont. 52, 55, 66 P 508 (1901) both held that prior threats and conduct were admissible to establish the state of mind of the accused. In State v. Felker, 27 Mont. 451, 457, 71 P 668 (1903) evidence of a prior assault by the victim upon another person, known by the accused, was held admissible to show the good faith motive of the accused. In State v. Hanlon, 38 Mont. 557, 570, 100 P. 1035 (1909) threats by the victim against the accused were held admissible to “show a disposition to violence, and, this disposition being known to the defendant, it may well be regarded as having aroused fears and as having impelled him to act upon them...”. As a final example, State v. Jennings, 96 Mont. 80, 89, 28 P2d 448 (1934) held that the accused “ought to be allowed to prove every fact and circumstance known to him, and connected with the deceased, which was fairly calculated to create an apprehension for his own safety”. It can be noted that while the character of the victim has been important to the outcome of these cases, it has not necessarily been “at issue” and therefore would not necessarily be included under the Federal Rule. The additional language making this subdivision apply to these cases is meant to solve this problem and make the subdivision entirely consistent with existing Montana law.

Case Notes

Mazurek Hearing — Rape Shield Exception Regarding Victim's Prior False Accusation of Sexual Assault — District Court Properly Excluded Evidence of Minor's Statement — Forensic Interview and Testimony Unclear — Probative Value of Minor's Statement Limited — District Court Balanced Minor's Rights and Defendant's Right to Confront Accuser. St. v. Hansen, 2022 MT 163, 409 Mont. 495, 515 P.3d 799.

Defendant's Offer of Own Out-of-Court Statement in Support of Justifiable Use of Force Claim Inadmissible: Following a fatal shooting, the defendant was charged with deliberate homicide and claimed justifiable use of force. Through cross-examination of law enforcement and in order to demonstrate what he knew and relied on at the time of the shooting, the defendant sought to introduce into evidence an out-of-court statement that he had made to law enforcement in which he described violent acts allegedly committed by the victim that a third party had described to the defendant. After the District Court ruled in the defendant's favor, the state petitioned for supervisory control. The Supreme Court vacated the District Court ruling, concluding that evidence introduced at trial must be admissible under the Montana Rules of Evidence and that the defendant's attempt to offer his own out-of-court statement did not fit within a hearsay exception and was not allowed under the Rules of Evidence. The defendant also argued that 45-3-112 and 46-16-131 rendered the Rules of Evidence inapplicable and required disclosure of the statement to the jury. The Supreme Court disagreed, concluding that 45-3-112 does not mandate disclosure of investigative materials to the jury in violation of the Rules of Evidence and that requiring the defendant to comply with the Rules of Evidence does not shift the burden of proof in violation of 46-16-131. St. v. Ninth Judicial District Court, 2014 MT 188, 375 Mont. 488, 329 P.3d 603.

Defense Cross-Examination — Testimony About Victim's Reputation and Specific Instances of Conduct Prohibited: In a deliberate homicide trial in which the defendant asserted justifiable use of force, the District Court did not err in disallowing defense cross-examination of specific instances of the victim's violent conduct under Rule 405, M.R.Ev., when, during cross-examination, the defense had already elicited witness testimony about the victim's reputation for violence. Rule 405 prohibits further defense cross-examination about specific instances of the victim's conduct; however, cross-examination of specific acts of conduct by a party who is adverse to the witness's reputation or opinion testimony is allowed. St. v. Daniels, 2011 MT 278, 362 Mont. 426, 265 P.3d 623.

Incidents Unknown at Time of Homicide Not Admissible as Character Evidence: In a prosecution for mitigated deliberate homicide where the victim's character was an essential element of the defense or related to self-defense, incidents involving the victim that were not known by the defendant until after the victim's death were not admissible because the knowledge of the incidents could not have led to the use of force. St. v. Henson, 2010 MT 136, 356 Mont. 458, 235 P.3d 1274.

Evidence of Victim's Possession of Pornography Properly Excluded as Irrelevant: Johnson asserted a defense of justifiable use of force in the assault of Heltne. Johnson contended that Heltne invited Johnson into his bedroom, began showing Johnson a pornographic movie, and tried to touch Johnson, but Johnson refused Heltne's advances. Heltne allegedly offered Johnson money and tried to touch Johnson again, at which point Johnson punched Heltne repeatedly and fled the house. Johnson was later arrested and charged with aggravated assault. The trial court refused to allow Johnson to introduce evidence of Heltne's pornography, and on appeal, Johnson asserted error, but the Supreme Court affirmed. The physical evidence that Johnson sought to introduce did not relate in any way to the reasonableness of force used by Johnson and was thus irrelevant, while the potential prejudice to Heltne had the evidence been allowed was massive. The trial court did not abuse its discretion in disallowing the irrelevant, prejudicial pornographic evidence. St. v. Johnson, 2008 MT 227, 344 M 313, 187 P3d 662 (2008).

Failure of Defendant to Establish Knowledge of Victim's Past as Element of Justifiable Use of Force — Evidence of Victim's Violent History Inadmissible: At Montgomery's negligent homicide trial, Montgomery relied on a justifiable use of force defense. Anticipating that Montgomery would seek to introduce evidence of the victim's prior acts of violence and reputation for violence, the state requested and was granted a motion in limine prohibiting use of the victim's criminal history or reputation. Following conviction, Montgomery appealed on grounds that the victim's character evidence should not have been prohibited. However, trial testimony showed that Montgomery's fear of the victim was based on the victim's behavior just before the shooting, and Montgomery failed to establish that knowledge of the victim's past led him to use lethal force. Thus, evidence of the victim's alleged violent past was irrelevant and inadmissible, and the motion in limine was properly granted. St. v. Montgomery, 2005 MT 120, 327 M 138, 112 P3d 1014 (2005). See also St. v. Daniels, 2011 MT 278, 362 Mont. 426, 265 P.3d 623, which held that although the burden of proving the absence of justification in a justifiable use of force case may shift to the state under 46-16-131, this shift does not eliminate the need for the defendant to satisfy foundational requirements under the Montana Rules of Evidence.

Only Defendant Allowed to "Open the Door" to Rebuttal Character Evidence: Gowan was charged with two felony counts of criminal sale of dangerous drugs. The state indicated that it would not rely on Gowan's prior acts or convictions. The trial court ruled that although direct evidence of a prior conviction was not admissible, the state would be allowed to ask Gowan, if he chose to testify, only if he had lied under oath in the past. At trial, Gowan's girlfriend testified, but not as a character witness. On direct examination, she offered no character testimony, but on cross-examination, she testified as to Gowan's honesty. The trial court concluded that she had opened the door to character evidence, even though the testimony was in response to cross-examination, and allowed the state to inquire whether she was aware of Gowan's perjury conviction, probation, and a suit against him for failure to deliver a vehicle title. Gowan was convicted, contending on appeal that the trial court erred in holding that the defense witness's gratuitous statement in response to cross-examination opened the door for rebuttal character evidence. The Supreme Court concluded that although a defendant can open the door with statements made during either direct or cross-examination and a defense witness can open the door on direct examination, a defense witness cannot inadvertently open the door to character evidence on cross-examination. Under Rule 404(a)(1), M.R.Ev., only the accused can open the door for the prosecution to introduce rebuttal character evidence. The state argued that once the statement was made, it was necessary to counter its effect on the jury and that, as a general rule, a wide latitude should be permitted in cross-examination of an adverse witness. However, the right to a full cross-examination of a defendant's character traits, once placed at issue, is not limitless. Unless and until the accused places character at issue, the door is closed to the state to enter evidence of the defendant's character because the dangers of prejudice, confusion, and time consumption outweigh the probative value. Inquiry into the defendant's character is not rejected because character is irrelevant, but rather because it weighs too much with the jury members as to overpersuade them to prejudge a person with a bad general record and deny the opportunity to defend against a particular charge. In this case, rather than introducing rebuttal character evidence, the state should have requested that the witness confine her answers to the questions asked and that her statement be stricken from the record. Because only a defendant can open the door to rebuttal character evidence, the trial court erred in holding that the defense witness could do so in a statement made during cross-examination, something defendant had no control over. The conviction was reversed, and the case remanded for a new trial. St. v. Gowan, 2000 MT 277, 302 M 127, 13 P3d 376, 57 St. Rep. 1155 (2000), distinguishing St. v. Austad, 197 M 70, 641 P2d 1373 (1982), followed in St. v. Hayden, 2008 MT 274, 345 M 252, 190 P3d 1091 (2008). See also St. v. MacGregor, 2013 MT 297, 372 Mont. 142, 311 P.3d 428.

Justifiable Use of Force Not Raised at Trial — Character Evidence of Victim Inadmissible: Nelson was charged with partner assault after striking his wife several times in the face and breaking her jaw. At trial, he sought to introduce evidence of his wife's prior convictions for assault to show that he used reasonable force against her. On appeal, the Supreme Court noted that Nelson had not relied on the defense of justifiable use of force, claiming instead that the contact was accidental, and that evidence of his wife's prior convictions lacked relevance because Nelson never asserted that he knew of the convictions when he struck her. Nelson's mere mention of self-defense in his notice of intent to rely on the defense of self-defense, in his trial brief, and in response to the city's motion in limine did not place the matter at issue in the trial. Thus, evidence of his wife's prior convictions was not relevant to the defense of accident upon which Nelson relied and was properly disallowed. Red Lodge v. Nelson, 1999 MT 246, 296 M 190, 989 P2d 300, 56 St. Rep. 955 (1999).

Evidence of Victim's Character and Prior Violent Act Inadmissible as Element of Self-Defense: Sattler claimed that his homicide of Martinson was in self-defense and sought to introduce evidence of a prior act of violence that was committed by Martinson 8 years before his death as proof of Martinson's aggressiveness and Sattler's need to use force in his defense. However, nothing in 45-3-102 relates directly to the question of the identity of the aggressor as an essential element of the justifiable use of force defense. Further, evidence of the prior act did not support any claim that the force used against Martinson was reasonable based on Sattler's knowledge of Martinson's history of violence. Also, the act was remote in time, and the lapse of time between the prior act and Martinson's death rendered the probity of the act minimal at best. Refusing to admit the evidence would not have resulted in prejudicial and reversible error or affected Sattler's substantial rights in light of the other evidence of record. Thus, reversal was not warranted. St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 M 79, 956 P2d 54, 55 St. Rep. 230 (1998). See also St. v. Benton, 251 M 401, 825 P2d 565 (1992).

In St. v. Branham, 2012 MT 1, 363 Mont. 281, 269 P.3d 891, the defendant asserted the defense of justifiable use of force and argued that evidence of the victim's character that was unknown to the defendant when he committed the offense was admissible to show that the victim was the aggressor. The Supreme Court concluded that evidence of the victim's character was limited to facts known to the defendant at the time he committed the offense and overruled St. v. Harville, 2006 MT 292, 334 Mont. 380, 147 P.3d 22, St. v. Russell, 2001 MT 278, 307 Mont. 322, 37 P.3d 678, and St. v. Sattler, 1998 MT 57, 288 Mont. 79, 956 P.2d 54, to the extent that those cases held that the identity of the aggressor is an essential element of the defense of justifiable use of force.

Character Not Put Into Issue by Defendant — Evidence as to Reputation Reversible Error: When the defendant did not put his character or community reputation into issue so as to open the door and allow the state to present character evidence in its case in chief, it was improper to admit hearsay, opinion, and reputation evidence of the defendant's bad character as relating to his disposition to commit the crime with which he was charged. Admission of the evidence constituted reversible error. St. v. Gommenginger, 242 M 265, 790 P2d 455, 47 St. Rep. 681 (1990), distinguished in St. v. Smith, 1998 MT 257, 291 M 236, 967 P2d 424, 55 St. Rep. 1058 (1998). However, see St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992), in which even though admission of character testimony offered by the prosecution was error, conviction was affirmed because the testimony was not prejudicial and the error was therefore harmless. Bower was followed in St. v. Carter, 285 M 449, 948 P2d 1173, 54 St. Rep. 1235 (1997).

Cross-Examination of Character Witness — Reference to Prior Acts: Defendant's character witness was a private investigator who testified that defendant was truthful and had no prior criminal record. On cross-examination, the witness volunteered that he checked out a charge against defendant in another state and that "it came back negative". On appeal, defendant asserted that the cross-examination was improper under Rule 404(b), M.R.Ev., and constituted grounds for mistrial. The court disagreed, holding that defendant put his character at issue and that it was a proper subject for cross-examination by the state under Rule 404(a), M.R.Ev. Defendant attempted to prove his reputation under Rule 405, M.R.Ev., by testimony of a private investigator. The District Court did not err in allowing cross-examination on the issue of defendant's purported lack of prior crimes. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985).

Homicide Trial — Claim of Nonviolent Character — Prior Assaults Admissible to Rebut: In defendant's homicide trial for killing his recently divorced ex-wife's boyfriend, testimony by certain persons about defendant's prior assaults on his ex-wife was properly admitted to rebut defendant's claims on the witness stand that he was peace-loving and nonviolent. St. v. Stroud, 210 M 58, 683 P2d 459, 41 St. Rep. 919 (1984).

Character Witness — Scope of Cross-Examination: Defendant was charged with eight counts of sexual intercourse without consent with his stepdaughter. At trial defendant called character witnesses. Simpson had hired defendant to work on his ranch. Simpson testified at length as to defendant's truthfulness and peacefulness. On cross-examination the State inquired whether Simpson was aware of defendant's conviction of armed robbery, his attempt to hijack a plane in Vietnam, and his violent escapes from a prison cell block in Vietnam and from jail in Great Falls. On appeal the Supreme Court said that Montana follows the modern trend to accept both reputation and opinion evidence regarding character. The court relied on the critical factors set out in Michelson v. U.S., 335 US 469, 93 L Ed 168, 69 S Ct 213 (1948): (1) the trial court ascertained the prior crime was an actual event; (2) the court instructed the jury to consider the inquiry only for the limited purpose of evaluating a witness' testimony; and (3) there was no specific objection made by the defense attorney. The court said Rule 405, M.R.Ev., extends beyond Michelson to allow inquiry on cross-examination into relevant, specific instances of conduct. The court found the cross-examination of Simpson was within the scope of the direct examination, consisted of inquiry into relevant, specific instances of conduct, and was proper to impeach the witness' opinion testimony. St. v. Clark, 209 M 473, 682 P2d 1339, 41 St. Rep. 833 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Eklund, 264 M 420, 872 P2d 323, 51 St. Rep. 335 (1994).

Imputing Criminal Record — Unrelated to Relevant Character — Denial of Fair Trial: Defendant was convicted of the felony theft of an air compressor. On appeal, defendant contended that the suggestion by the prosecution on cross-examination that he had an FBI criminal record was prejudicial. The Supreme Court held that imputing to a defendant by implication a criminal record unrelated to any trait of character involved in the offense charged denied the defendant a fair trial. St. v. Kramp, 200 M 383, 651 P2d 614, 39 St. Rep. 1819 (1982).

Character of Victim — Right to Witness and Confrontation — Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: While the sixth amendment guarantees a criminal the right to testimony of witnesses in his favor, it does not guarantee him the right to any and all witnesses, regardless of their competency or knowledge. There is the competing interest of the fairness and reliability of the trial. Here, in a sexual intercourse without consent case, the defendant was precluded by these rules from calling witnesses to establish the victim's sexual views and from cross-examining the victim concerning a quote on her jacket ("Liquor in the front, poker in the back"). Since the victim's character is not in issue and her sexual views are not probative of truthfulness, and it is clearly within the judge's discretion to exclude this evidence if it is irrelevant or too prejudicial, the Supreme Court found no merit in defendant's argument that he was denied his right to confront witnesses. St. v. Higley, 190 M 412, 621 P2d 1043, 37 St. Rep. 1942 (1980), followed in State ex rel. Mazurek v. District Court, 277 M 349, 922 P2d 474, 53 St. Rep. 678 (1996).

Evidence of Party's Companion's Criminal Record — Inadmissible: After a jury found plaintiff not guilty of shoplifting, she brought a false arrest suit against Buttrey Food, Inc. In the false arrest suit, Buttrey was allowed to introduce evidence of plaintiff's companion's reputation and past criminal record for shoplifting. On appeal, the Supreme Court said that the right to detain and arrest by a merchant depends on reasonable cause for belief that shoplifting has occurred and not merely on the ground that one of the persons has a reputation for shoplifting. The evidence should have been excluded. Duran v. Buttrey Food, Inc., 189 M 381, 616 P2d 327, 37 St. Rep. 1545 (1980), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Long, 216 M 65, 700 P2d 153 (1985).

Exclusion of Testimony: Testimony concerning threats to members of defendant's family made by the victim of the defendant's assault prior to the assault may be excluded if the testimony is repetitious and likely to distract and mislead the jury from the issues actually in controversy. The exclusion of such testimony is within the court's discretion. St. v. Breitenstein, 180 M 503, 591 P2d 233, 36 St. Rep. 403 (1979).

Character Evidence to Demonstrate Motive in Testifying: The point of Rule 608, M.R.Ev., for the purposes of this appeal is that reference to specific instances of a witness's conduct for the purpose of proving his character for truthfulness or untruthfulness is never permitted on direct examination. This rule, in conjunction with Rules 403 and 405, M.R.Ev., supports the trial court limitation on impeachment evidence, which defendant argues should have been permitted to establish a prosecution witness's personal habits for marijuana use to demonstrate a profit motive in obtaining a conviction. St. v. McClean, 179 M 178, 587 P2d 20, 35 St. Rep. 1790 (1978).

Rule 406. Habit; routine practice.Commission Comments

(a) Habit and routine practice defined. This subdivision is original and therefore entirely different than either Federal or Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 406. The Commission feels that a definition of these terms is properly part of the rule for two reasons: First, habit and character evidence are oppositely treated, that is, habit evidence is admissible while character evidence is generally not admissible. Second, the importance because of the opposite treatment, is often not clear and has led to confusion. The Commission intends by this definition subdivision to clarify the terms necessary to apply correctly the rule allowing habit evidence to be admissible.

Existing Montana law does not define these terms, although similar terms are defined in Section 87A-1-205, R.C.M. 1947 [30-1-205], course of dealing and usage of trade. Subdivision (b) of this rule allows habit and routine practice to be used to prove conduct and so will not always relate to the construction of contracts associated with the terms in that statute or associated with custom and usage under Section 93-401-27(12), R.C.M. 1947 [superseded].

(b) Admissibility. This subdivision is based upon Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 406 except that certain words and phrases have been deleted as unnecessary because of the definition subdivision; other key phrases have been kept to allow uniform interpretation. The subdivision basically allows evidence of habit or routine practice to be admitted to prove conduct.

Existing Montana law is consistent with this subdivision. Prosser v. Montana Central Ry., 17 Mont. 372, 382, 43 P 81 (1895) allowed evidence of the habit of brakemen of mounting a moving train to show what an experienced and prudent brakeman would do under the same circumstances. Neary v. N. Pac. Ry., 37 Mont. 461, 478, 97 P 944 (1908) recognized the rule of Prosser, supra, but excluded evidence of how conductors checked trains in a railroad yard because it was not relevant to the case. A later case dealing with habit evidence, Garrison v. Trowbridge, 119 Mont. 505, 510, 177 P2d 464 (1947) held "where habits and customs are admissible the fact of such habits and customs and not the witnesses' conclusions as to the probable future consequences of such is all the court may allow in evidence". Hartse v. Korneychuk, 131 Mont. 530, 533, 312 P2d 795 (1957) recognized that habit evidence can be admissible to prove conduct. The case of Mulville v. Pac. Mut. Life Ins. Co. of California, 19 Mont. 95, 100, 47 P 651 (1897) held that "there was no error in excluding evidence as to the deceased having made a practice of jumping on the train while in motion", citing a Pennsylvania case finding this type of evidence insufficient to warrant an inference that the conduct had been the same as the alleged practice. If that case stands for the proposition that habit evidence is inadmissible to prove conduct, it is overruled by this subdivision; however, the case can also be interpreted as excluding habit evidence because other evidence failed to establish the existence of the habit.

It should be noted that Section 87A-1-205(6), R.C.M. 1947 [30-1-205], requires that in order for evidence of usage of trade to be offered, notice is required to be given to the other party to prevent unfair surprise; this rule is not meant to supersede that provision, given that it applies under this rule.

(c) Method of proof. This subdivision is identical to Uniform Rule (1974) 406(b) which is identical to a subdivision in the version of the Federal Rules submitted to Congress, but deleted by Congress. The Commission adopts this subdivision to provide guidance as to permissible methods of proof of habit or routine practice. A problem which may arise with specific instances of conduct is that in laying the foundation to prove habit by this method, the proponent may be able to infer all that is necessary for the jury to conclude a particular habit existed, even though the court subsequently rules an insufficient number of instances have been shown. This problem should be solved by having such foundation made in the absence of the jury under Rule 103. Note that use of opinion evidence is intended to be governed by Rule 701.

This subdivision is generally consistent with existing Montana law. Montana cases and statutes do not deal with opinions and proof of habit and routine practice and this represents an expansion. Cases dealing with habit have allowed proof by specific instances of conduct. Prosser v. Montana Central Ry., supra, 17 Mont. at 382, and Garrison v. Trowbridge, supra, 119 Mont. at 510.

Case Notes

Proper Denial of Motion In Limine Seeking to Exclude Evidence: A chiropractic patient suing her chiropractor made a motion in limine to exclude evidence regarding habit or routine practice to make certain statements and perform certain tests. The District Court denied the motion. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, noting that relevant evidence is generally admissible, that it was relevant for the jury to understand the chiropractor's routine practices to determine whether he departed from his normal routine in his treatment of the plaintiff, and that the chiropractor provided adequate foundation at trial. Howlett v. Chiropractic Center, P.C., 2020 MT 74, 399 Mont. 401, 460 P.3d 942.

Exclusion of Evidence — Similar Claims — Habit Evidence Too Remote — No Abuse of Discretion: The District Court did not abuse its discretion by excluding several pieces of evidence in an asbestos personal injury trial. Specifically, the District Court excluded a form containing a general reference to the personal injury claims of other employees even after the defendant railroad argued that the plaintiff had not been exposed to asbestos because the plaintiff did not establish that the other claims were substantially similar to and not too remote from the plaintiff's claim. Likewise, although letters that referenced nonasbestos violations of the federal Occupational Safety and Health Act of 1970 (OSHA) and the defendant railroad's refusal to permit access to OSHA inspectors without a warrant could be admissible under Rule 406, M.R.Ev., as habit evidence, the referenced infractions were too remote from both the plaintiff's asbestos-related claim and the plant at which the plaintiff worked. Daley v. Burlington N. Santa Fe Ry. Co., 2018 MT 197, 392 Mont. 311, 425 P.3d 669.

Passing Reference to Excluded Evidence — Prejudice Minimal — No Abuse of Discretion: After admitting portions of two depositions by coworkers of a plaintiff in an asbestos personal injury trial, the District Court excluded references to the coworkers' deaths because there was no evidence in their depositions that they had suffered from asbestos-related diseases. The District Court also excluded reference to the lawsuits they had filed, reasoning that they were irrelevant. The plaintiff argued that the evidence was improperly excluded because the defense referenced the coworkers' claims in an opening statement. The District Court did not abuse its discretion by determining that the defendant's reference had not opened the door to a discussion of the coworkers' illnesses and claims because the reference was made in passing, any prejudice was minimal, and admitted portions of the depositions detailed relevant information, specifically the coworkers' exposure to asbestos at the same plant as the plaintiff. Daley v. Burlington N. Santa Fe Ry. Co., 2018 MT 197, 392 Mont. 311, 425 P.3d 669.

Constructive Discharge Upheld Despite Error in Admission of Evidence: Admission of evidence of the settlement amount in another employment case against the same defendant was in error. Since there was only one other employment case against this defendant, evidence of the settlement amount did not demonstrate a habitual pattern, and the danger of prejudice exceeded the probative value. However, in light of the other evidence presented by the plaintiff and the damage limitations in the Wrongful Discharge from Employment Act, the court concluded that introducing the settlement amount of a separate employment claim did not significantly alter the result of the trial. Harrell v. Farmers Edu. & Co-op Union, 2013 MT 367, 373 Mont. 92, 314 P.3d 920.

Evidence of Prior Corporal Punishment Properly Excluded: When Huerta was tried on charges of assault of a juvenile, he attempted to introduce testimony of 26 witnesses who would testify that the child's mother had the habit of severely punishing the child. In an effort to reduce delay caused by redundant testimony, the District Court required Huerta to summarize the testimony of all of the witnesses by affidavits. The District Court held that the testimony would constitute "character assassination" and excluded the evidence. Citing St. v. Sigler, 210 M 248, 688 P2d 749 (1984), the Supreme Court held that the evidence that was excluded by the District Court was not inadmissible evidence of character but was evidence of habit that was relevant and therefore admissible under this rule. However, the Supreme Court also pointed out that Rule 403, M.R.Ev., allows the trial court to exclude relevant evidence if it finds that the value of the evidence will be outweighed by prejudice, will confuse the issues, or will mislead the jury. After reviewing the record, the Supreme Court concluded that Huerta was able to sufficiently present his defense without the excluded testimony and, for that reason, that the District Court did not abuse its discretion in excluding the evidence. St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 483, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Allegation of Uncounseled Waiver of Right to Attorney — Burden of Proof — Testimony of Routine of City Judge Held to Create Triable Issue of Fact: Olson moved to dismiss a felony DUI charge based upon his affidavit that in his previous DUI convictions, he was not represented by counsel and was not told that he could have a court-appointed attorney. In response to Olson's affidavit, the state presented the testimony of the city judge who convicted Olson on one of the previous DUI charges. The judge testified that although he had no specific recollection of Olson's case, he always asks defendants whether they understand their rights and always reads their rights from a prepared text that includes an advisement of the right to counsel. The Supreme Court held that pursuant to this rule, this testimony is substantive evidence that creates a triable issue of fact. Therefore, the Supreme Court held that the District Court erred when it held that this testimony was insufficient as a matter of law to create a triable issue of fact. St. v. Olson, 283 M 27, 938 P2d 1321, 54 St. Rep. 475 (1997), followed in St. v. Couture, 1998 MT 137, 289 M 215, 959 P2d 948, 55 St. Rep. 548 (1998), and St. v. Moga, 1999 MT 283, 297 M 1, 989 P2d 856, 56 St. Rep. 1143 (1999). Olson was followed, with a different result, in St. v. Ailport, 1998 MT 315, 292 M 172, 970 P2d 1044, 55 St. Rep. 1292 (1998).

Blood Alcohol Test Admissible When Good Medical Practice Followed: In a negligence action against the state brought by the guardian of a person who was incapacitated in a motorcycle accident, the trial court admitted into evidence the results of a blood alcohol test performed on the motorcycle operator after the accident. The primary issue raised by the plaintiff on appeal concerns whether an adequate foundation was established for admittance of the test results. In a 4-to-3 decision, the Supreme Court held the results were admissible, as the testing procedure comported with good medical practice for admissibility in a civil case. The court rejected the more stringent rule which requires that each of a list of facts be established as foundation for admissibility of blood alcohol test results. The three dissenting justices found that a proper foundation would include, at a minimum, evidence that the persons engaged in the test were qualified, the machine and its components were in proper condition, and the test was properly conducted. Bartel v. St., 217 M 380, 704 P2d 1067, 42 St. Rep. 1266 (1985).

Credibility of Rebuttal Witness Tested — Testimony Admissible: The defendant was tried and convicted of sexual intercourse without consent and aggravated kidnapping. Testimony of a defense witness raised an issue as to habitual routing of the defendant. The State was allowed to present rebuttal testimony where credibility of a rebuttal witness was questioned by defense, and the jury had ample opportunity to consider credibility. St. v. Norris, 212 M 427, 689 P2d 243, 41 St. Rep. 1841 (1984).

Deliberate Homicide — Prior Acts of Discipline Toward Child Admissible: Defendant was charged with and convicted of the deliberate homicide of the 19-month-old child of the woman with whom he was living. On appeal, defendant attacked the testimony of witnesses relating to other crimes, wrongs, or acts by him toward the child on the grounds that the elements required in St. v. Just, 184 M 262, 602 P2d 957 (1979), were not met. The Supreme Court said, when a battered child is the victim, the pattern of conduct exhibited by the defendant-caretaker toward the child victim is within the scope of the issues before the court. The only available link between the specific nature of the child's injuries and the caretaker may be the evidence of prior abusive conduct by the caretaker. Under Rule 406, M.R.Ev., the acts habitually performed by defendant in response to his perceived need for discipline of the child were admissible. As a matter of habit, his discipline of the child was excessively harsh. There was no error in allowing witnesses to testify to the disciplinary acts administered by defendant to the child. St. v. Sigler, 210 M 248, 688 P2d 749, 41 St. Rep. 1039 (1984), followed in St. v. Murray, 228 M 125, 741 P2d 759, 44 St. Rep. 1394 (1987), and St. v. Huerta, 285 M 245, 947 P2d 483, 54 St. Rep. 1133 (1997).

Rule 407. Subsequent remedial measures.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 407. The rule disallows evidence of subsequent remedial measures because of the public policy of encouraging, or at least not discouraging, changes or repairs for added safety. The rule allows use of this type of evidence for other purposes, if those other purposes are controverted, or for impeachment.

Existing Montana law recognizes the rule excluding subsequent remedial measures, but all the case law on the subject allows this type of evidence under one of the other purposes for which it may be admitted. May v. City of Anaconda, 26 Mont. 140, 144, 66 P 759 (1901) allowed evidence that a rock, which caused plaintiff's accident and injuries, had been removed from a certain street to prove that the city had assumed control of that street and was under the obligation to keep it in repair. Pullen v. City of Butte, 45 Mont. 46, 53, 121 P 878 (1912) allowed evidence of repairs of a sidewalk to show conditions existing at the time of the accident. Titus v. Anaconda Copper Mining Co., 47 Mont. 583, 588, 133 P 677 (1913) and Teesdale v. Anschutz Drilling Co., 138 Mont. 427, 440, 357 P2d 4 (1960) also allowed evidence of subsequent repairs to show conditions existing at the time of the accident. Other cases have recognized the rule but have not found it necessary to apply it. Hackley v. Waldorf-Hoerner Paper Co. 149 Mont. 286, 296, 425 P2d 716 (1967) and Morrison v. City of Butte, 150 Mont. 106, 115, 431 P2d 79 (1967).

It should be noted that under Teesdale, supra, Montana recognizes that admitting evidence for another purpose allows a limiting instruction under the limited admissibility rule also contained in Rule 105. Further, admission of evidence of subsequent repairs for another purpose should be made under the considerations of Rule 403, particularly its prejudicial effects.

Compiler's Comments

2007 Amendment: In first sentence near beginning after “after an” inserted “injury or harm allegedly caused by an”, near middle substituted “injury or harm” for “event”, and at end substituted “a defect in a product, a defect in a product’s design, or a need for a warning instruction” for “in connection with the event”; and made minor changes in style. Amendment effective October 1, 2007.

Case Notes

Railroad Platform Reconstructed After Injury — Not a Subsequent Remedial Measure When Fixed by Nonparty — Evidence Regarding a Different Heated Platform Properly Excluded: The plaintiff, an employee of a railroad, pursued a cause of action for an injury that allegedly occurred when he fell on snow that accumulated between a railroad platform and the locomotive steps. The District Court granted the railroad’s motion in limine to exclude evidence that the platform is now heated. Additionally, the District Court excluded evidence of a heated platform that existed at another railroad station on the date of injury. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed the District Court for excluding evidence regarding the installation of a heated platform at the location of the injury. The court reasoned that the platform was installed by a different railroad, and therefore it was not a subsequent remedial measure under Rule 407, M.R.Ev. However, the Supreme Court upheld the District Court’s decision to exclude evidence of a heated platform at another railroad station, as the plaintiff had an opportunity to pursue cross-examination regarding the availability of heated platforms in general. Martin v. BNSF Ry. Co., 2015 MT 167, 379 Mont. 423, 352 P.3d 598.

Subsequent Remedial Measures Inadmissible — Impeachment Exception Not Met: In a lawsuit challenging the defendants’ design of a highway, the District Court did not err in excluding certain subsequent remedial measures from evidence and concluding the measures were not admissible under the impeachment exception to Rule 407. The Supreme Court approved of narrowly applying the impeachment exception to Rule 407 and, citing Herzog v. Lexington Township, 657 N.E.2d 926 (Ill. 1995), concluded that the impeachment exception applies when the party being impeached goes beyond stating that the original condition was safe or adequate and attempts to make exaggerated claims that the condition was the safest possible. In the present case, the impeachment exception was inapplicable because the defendants did not go beyond denying negligence, as opposed to making exaggerated claims that their construction of the highway was the safest or best. United Tool Rental, Inc. v. Riverside Contracting, Inc., 2011 MT 213, 361 Mont. 493, 260 P.3d 156.

Evidence of Change in Warning Label Admissible — Subsequent Remedial Measure Not Taken by Party: In a failure to warn suit, the District Court admitted testimony from an employee of a cancer clinic who referenced changes to the manufacturer’s label for the drug Zometa, which is associated with osteonecrosis of the jaw. The testimony did not improperly reference subsequent remedial measures because the clinic was a not a party to the lawsuit. In addition, the evidence was not offered to show negligence or the need for a warning, but to describe changes in office protocol taken by the clinic. Stevens v. Novartis Pharmaceuticals Corp., 2010 MT 282, 358 Mont. 474, 247 P.3d 244.

Blatant, Systematic Abuse of Discovery — Default Judgment Awarded: Plaintiff slipped and fell in defendant’s locker room and sustained serious injuries. Defendant refused to answer many of plaintiff’s interrogatories until the eve of trial, including requests for information regarding other falls and injuries and subsequent remedial measures. At trial, the jury found for defendant on the issue of liability, and plaintiff moved for an amended judgment or a new trial based on defendant’s alleged abuse of the discovery process, but the motions were denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court held that the evidence sought through discovery was highly relevant and probative and that the state improperly concealed the evidence by asserting baseless objections in response to the discovery requests, which directly contravened the express purpose of discovery and severely undermined the integrity of the litigation. In addition, pursuant to this rule, defendant was not entitled to withhold relevant evidence of subsequent remedial measures. Although the trial court may generally decide the proper sanction for discovery abuse, this was an exceptional case in which defendant’s discovery abuse was so blatant and systematic that the only proper sanction was a default judgment on the issue of liability. Defendant’s pattern of willful and bad faith conduct outweighed the general preference for trial on the merits, and defendant demonstrated clear disregard for resolution on the merits by seeking to gain a strategic advantage by concealing important evidence and asserting frivolous objections. Therefore, the Supreme Court granted plaintiff a default judgment on the issue of liability and remanded for a determination of plaintiff's damages. Richardson v. St., 2006 MT 43, 331 M 231, 130 P3d 634 (2006), following Richardson v. Corvallis Pub. School District No. 1, 286 M 309, 950 P2d 748 (1997), Kissock v. Butte Convalescent Center, 1999 MT 322, 297 M 307, 992 P2d 1271 (1999), and Schuff v. A.T. Klemens & Son, 2000 MT 357, 303 M 274, 16 P3d 1002 (2000). See also Jerome v. Pardis, 240 M 187, 783 P2d 919 (1989), and Kraft v. High Country Motors, Inc., 2012 MT 83, 364 Mont. 465, 276 P.3d 908.

Admissibility of Evidence to Rebut Affirmative Defense — “Plain Visibility” of Oncoming Train: Mickelson was injured when the fire truck that he was driving was struck by a Montana Rail Link (MRL) train and sought damages. In basing its defense on Mickelson's comparative negligence in failing to see the train, MRL was allowed to allege and represent to the jury that the train was plainly visible, in part because of its yellow blinking light, thereby triggering Mickelson's alleged duty to stop for the train. Mickelson sought to refute that contention by offering testimony that the train's lighting configuration did not make the train visible to approaching motorists, but the evidence was held inadmissible on grounds that MRL met federal requirements regarding lighting and thus could not be held liable for its particular lighting configuration. However, Mickelson's evidence was not offered to impose liability upon MRL for failing to change its lighting configuration, but rather to demonstrate that, contrary to MRL's experts, the lighting configuration did not make the train so plainly visible that Mickelson was comparatively negligent for failing to see it. Under Pitasi v. Stratton Corp., 968 F2d 1558 (2nd Cir. 1992), evidence that is not admissible to prove culpability may nevertheless be introduced to rebut an affirmative defense. By denying Mickelson the right to rebut MRL's evidence in support of its contention that Mickelson was comparatively negligent, the trial court essentially directed a verdict in favor of MRL on the comparative negligence issue, which was an abuse of the court's discretion, constituting reversible error. Mickelson v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 2000 MT 111, 299 M 348, 999 P2d 985, 57 St. Rep. 446 (2000), distinguishing Marshall v. Burlington N., Inc., 720 F2d 1149 (9th Cir. 1983), and Herold v. Burlington N., Inc., 761 F2d 1241 (8th Cir. 1985).

Admissibility of Probative Evidence Refuting Expert Testimony: Rieger was injured when a light fixture dislodged from the ceiling, striking him. In light of expert testimony that the sheetrock at the accident scene was defective, Rieger should have been allowed to offer evidence that other light fixtures were loose and were subsequently repaired. The evidence was probative and tended to refute the expert testimony that the sheetrock at the accident scene was defective and was the sole cause of the accident. Rieger v. Coldwell, 254 M 507, 839 P2d 1257, 49 St. Rep. 768 (1992).

Evidence of Postaccident Changes in Product Warning Label Properly Excluded: At the time of an accident involving inhalation of a toxic substance, the warning label on a paint product suggested the use of vapor/particulate masks not containing fresh air supplies. Plaintiff contended that for purposes of impeachment, he should have been allowed to introduce evidence that shortly after the accident, defendant changed the label to require the use of fresh air respirators when the paint was used. The Supreme Court found no error in exclusion of evidence of the postaccident label changes in light of the fact that at the time of the accident, plaintiff was wearing no mask whatsoever. Scott v. E.I. DuPont De Nemours & Co., 240 M 282, 783 P2d 938, 46 St. Rep. 2126 (1989).

Motion In Limine — Denial of Offer of Proof on Question Going to Issues of Fact — Reversible Error: Several months after an accident at a bridge, the state improved the bridge and approach, then made a motion in limine, which was granted, that the District Court hold inadmissible any evidence relating to the subsequent improvement project. At trial, a Highway Department (now Department of Transportation) engineer was asked if the state had ever planned to change the bridge and approach prior to the accident. The question was objected to, and plaintiff's counsel made an offer of proof that the engineer would answer affirmatively and thereafter counsel would ask why the improvements had not been made prior to the accident. The court ruled that the question violated the motion in limine and overruled the offer of proof. On appeal, the Supreme Court reversed, holding that the District Court erred in denying the offer of proof and in not permitting the witness to answer because the question went to two other issues of fact important in the case: notice of hazardous condition, if it was hazardous, and time and opportunity to act. Buck v. St., 222 M 423, 723 P2d 210, 43 St. Rep. 1384 (1986).

Applicability to Strict Liability Theory: In a strict liability action under a manufacturing defect theory, the issue is whether the manufactured product left the factory in a flawed condition because it did not conform to original design specifications. Consequently, original design modification is without probative value and irrelevant because the safeness of the original design is not an issue. Under the manufacturing defect theory of strict liability, evidence of subsequent change is inadmissible unless admitted for some other purpose. In a strict liability action under a design defect theory, the question is whether the design specifications were partly or totally defective. A design is defective if at the time of manufacture an alternative design would have been safer and the design was both technologically feasible and a market reality. The timeframe under scrutiny is that of the manufacturer. Evidence of subsequent design modification is not probative of whether a product was defectively designed at the time of manufacture. Such evidence may be admitted to show technological feasibility where the manufacturer has controverted technological feasibility of an alternative design. Rule 407, M.R.Ev., is applicable to strict liability actions under both manufacturing and design defect theories, making evidence of subsequent design changes generally inadmissible. Rix v. Gen. Motors Corp., 222 M 318, 723 P2d 195, 43 St. Rep. 1296 (1986), followed in Krueger v. Gen. Motors Corp., 240 M 266, 783 P2d 1340, 46 St. Rep. 2114 (1989). See also Stokes v. Ford Motor Co., 2013 MT 29, 368 Mont. 365, 300 P.3d 648.

Postaccident Installation of Signals: In a negligence action concerning a train-truck collision, the trial court excluded evidence of the railroad later placing electric signal devices at the crossing where the accident occurred. In this case, experts testified for the railroad that the crossing was not extrahazardous. The fact that automatic signals were installed on the crossing after the accident would have been relevant for the purpose of impeachment as well as to show feasibility. It was prejudicial error to exclude this evidence. Runkle v. Burlington N., 188 M 286, 613 P2d 982, 37 St. Rep. 995 (1980), distinguished in United Tool Rental, Inc. v. Riverside Contracting, Inc., 2011 MT 213, 361 Mont. 493, 260 P.3d 156.

Evidence of Alteration of Accident Scene After Accident — Admissible for Some Purposes: Evidence of subsequent repairs or improvements by a defendant altering the scene of an accident may not be admitted in evidence to show negligence on the part of the defendant. The evidence that the state constructed an additional guardrail at the scene of the accident was offered for another purpose. The evidence demonstrates the feasibility and ability to construct the guardrail in contradiction to the state's contentions. Cech v. St., 184 M 522, 604 P2d 97, 36 St. Rep. 2185 (1979) (earlier opinion, 183 M 75, 598 P2d 584, 36 St. Rep. 1348 (1979), was reversed on rehearing), distinguished in United Tool Rental, Inc. v. Riverside Contracting, Inc., 2011 MT 213, 361 Mont. 493, 260 P.3d 156.

Impeachment of Witness' Testimony as to Repair Feasibility: Plaintiffs' rebuttal testimony offered for impeachment of one of defendants' central witnesses on the crucial issue of practicability or feasibility of repairs, an issue raised by defendants in their case in chief, should have been allowed under the exception to the general rule of excluding evidence of subsequent repairs when, as here, the evidence was not offered as proof of negligence. Lawlor v. County of Flathead, 177 M 508, 582 P2d 751 (1978).

Rule 408. Compromise and offers to compromise.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal Rule 408. Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 408 is the same except that it does not include the third sentence of the rule. Congress added this third sentence to insure that evidence will not be made inadmissible merely because it is disclosed during compromise negotiations if that evidence is otherwise discoverable; that is, a party should not be able to keep otherwise discoverable evidence from being admissible by presenting it during compromise negotiations. The broad purpose of the rule is to insure that frank and open negotiations will take place without fear that what is said during these negotiations will be used against the parties during the trial; the policy behind this purpose is that favoring compromises and settlements of disputes.

Existing Montana law is generally consistent with this rule. Section 93-2201-5, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], states "(a)n offer of compromise is not an admission that anything is due". Case law using this statute has held that evidence of an offer of compromise is therefore inadmissible at trial of that dispute. Huffine v. Lincoln, 53 Mont. 474, 480, 164 P 888 (1917) and Continental Oil Co. v. Bell, 94 Mont. 123, 135, 21 P2d 65 (1933). The policy behind the rule was expressed in Black v. Martin, 88 Mont. 256, 269, 292 P 577 (1930) and has been expressed in recent statutes, R.C.M. 1947 Sections 93-2201-7 through 93-2201-10 [26-1-701 through 26-1-706]. Section 93-2201-7, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-701], expresses the policy of the rule, and Section 93-2201-9, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-704], states, among other things, that the fact of voluntary partial payment shall not be construed as an admission that anything is due and that it is inadmissible as evidence.

Several cases have dealt with the question of what is an offer of compromise. Continental Oil Co. v. Bell, supra, held, contrary to the assertion that an offer was “merely a preliminary negotiation between parties”, that “all offers are merely negotiations until accepted. The testimony disclosed an offer made in an attempt to effect a settlement and, therefore, was clearly inadmissible”. However, Magelssen v. Atwell, 152 Mont. 409, 413, 451 P2d 103 (1969) held that an offer to buy land made long before an action was brought to quiet title was admissible because there was no dispute at the time the letter was written. It would also seem logical that if there was no dispute because one of the parties had admitted liability and agreed to pay, such an offer would also be admissible.

The final consideration under this rule concerns the second sentence of this rule providing that “evidence of conduct or statements made in compromise negotiation is likewise not admissible”. This sentence overrules the common law doctrine of allowing admissions of liability made during negotiations to be admissible while still excluding evidence of any offers of compromise. The common law doctrine is followed in Montana in Lenahan v. Casey, 46 Mont. 367, 379, 128 P 601 (1912). That case is expressly overruled by this rule because the Commission feels that it is contrary to the policy of the rule and can be unfairly applied to those who are unaware of it. It should be noted that the addition of the third sentence is meant to prevent the opposite abuse of this rule so that parties will not try to immunize their evidence from being admissible by presenting it during negotiations; the other party may otherwise discover this evidence and present it so long as no inference is made to compromise negotiations.

Case Notes

Constructive Discharge Upheld Despite Error in Admission of Evidence: Admission of evidence of the settlement amount in another employment case against the same defendant was in error. Since there was only one other employment case against this defendant, evidence of the settlement amount did not demonstrate a habitual pattern, and the danger of prejudice exceeded the probative value. However, in light of the other evidence presented by the plaintiff and the damage limitations in the Wrongful Discharge from Employment Act, the court concluded that introducing the settlement amount of a separate employment claim did not significantly alter the result of the trial. Harrell v. Farmers Edu. & Co-op Union, 2013 MT 367, 373 Mont. 92, 314 P.3d 920.

Inadmissibility of Indemnity Agreement — No Error: In a product liability case, the District Court’s decision to disallow a request from the plaintiff to admit as documentary evidence an indemnity agreement between the defendants did not constitute reversible error. Although the document itself was not introduced, the plaintiff received latitude from the District Court in discussing the document and its general terms in cross-examination of a witness. Stokes v. Ford Motor Co., 2013 MT 29, 368 Mont. 365, 300 P.3d 648.

Admissibility of Employment Separation Agreement to Support Pretextual Termination: West sued his employer for failure to pay commissions due to West for the sale of the employer’s resort property after West’s employment was terminated. At trial, the District Court allowed into evidence a separation agreement that the employer had proposed prior to West’s termination. The employer asserted that admission of the separation agreement was error under Rule 408, M.R.Ev., because the rule prohibits admissibility of offers of compromise. However, the rule does not require exclusion of compromises that are offered for another purpose. Here, the settlement agreement was offered to support West’s argument that his firing was pretextual, rather than to prove the employer’s liability or the invalidity of the claim. The District Court did not err in allowing the separation agreement for a purpose other than an offer of compromise. West v. The Club at Spanish Peaks, LLC, 2008 MT 183, 343 M 434, 186 P3d 1228 (2008). See also In re Estate of Stukey, 2004 MT 279, 323 M 241, 100 P3d 114 (2004).

Signed Document Not Necessary to Render Settlement Agreement Enforceable: A letter mentioned that the parties were to execute mutual releases of all claims and a stipulation for dismissal of the current litigation, with prejudice. Plaintiff argued that the letter indicated that a compromise had been reached and that the execution of releases was the last act to be performed in carrying out the agreement, while defendant argued that no agreement to settle had been reached because no releases were signed. In a jury instruction, the District Court instructed that a writing is not legally necessary to reach an agreement. Defendant contended that the jury instruction essentially told the jury how to decide the case. The Supreme Court disagreed. The instruction left open the question of fact, to be decided by the jury, whether a settlement agreement had been reached, and the jury simply decided to accept plaintiff’s position. The District Court did not misstate the law or decide the question for the jury. Stockman Bank of Mont. v. Potts, 2006 MT 64, 331 M 381, 132 P3d 546 (2006), following Lockhead v. Weinstein, 2001 MT 132, 305 M 438, 28 P3d 1081 (2001).

Use of Settlement Evidence Allowed to Show Bias of Witness, Not Liability: This rule does not allow for evidence of settlements in order to prove or disprove liability. Plaintiffs contended that the District Court improperly allowed settlement evidence when defendant cross-examined plaintiffs' contractor regarding a settlement between the contractor and plaintiffs. Citing Pula v. St., 2002 MT 9, 308 M 122, 40 P3d 364 (2002), the Supreme Court disagreed. The witness was not asked about the settlement in order to address issues of liability, but rather to illustrate the bias of the witness. Inquiry into the settlement, including the settlement amount, was pertinent to the credibility of the witness, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in allowing the evidence. Tripp v. Jeld-Wen, Inc., 2005 MT 121, 327 M 146, 112 P3d 1018 (2005).

Refusal to Enforce Unsubstantiated Oral Agreement to Dismiss Claim for Prescriptive Easement — Parol Evidence Rule and Statute of Frauds Inapplicable: Defendant contended that the District Court erred in failing to estop plaintiff from asserting claims for a prescriptive easement across defendant's property because an agent of plaintiff orally agreed to dismiss the claims and defendant relied on the promise to defendant's detriment. The District Court held that the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds prohibited admission of evidence of an oral agreement to dismiss the case because there were written temporary access agreements in place and that defendant did not offer sufficient evidence to meet either a fraud or estoppel exception to the parol evidence rule. The Supreme Court found that the trial court reached the correct result, albeit for the wrong reasons, by automatically applying the parol evidence rule and the statute of frauds without determining whether either rule applied. Actually neither rule barred admission of the evidence in this case, so the trial court was free to consider the merits of the existence of an oral contract without defendant having to prove the elements of fraud or detrimental reliance. Nevertheless, the trial court found defendant's story of an oral agreement to be unsubstantiated and correctly refused to enforce an oral agreement based on the facts before it. Brimstone Min., Inc. v. Glaus, 2003 MT 236, 317 M 236, 77 P3d 175 (2003).

Improper Admission of Letter Offering Compromise — Reversible Error: Plaintiff sued for over $17,000 allegedly provided as loans to defendant. Defendant claimed that the money was owed by plaintiff, not a loan. In an effort to settle the dispute, plaintiff sent defendant a letter offering to compromise. At trial, defendant sought to introduce the letter, but plaintiff objected on grounds that the letter was inadmissible under this rule, which bars admission of offers of compromise. The District Court admitted the letter anyway, and plaintiff appealed on grounds that admitting the letter was an abuse of discretion. The Supreme Court agreed. The letter was an offer of compromise and, having been offered less than 3 months prior to the suit, fell within the purview of this rule. The letter did not meet any of the exceptions in the rule and thus was improperly admitted. Because the District Court relied heavily on the improperly admitted evidence in concluding that plaintiff presented contradictory testimony, the improper evidence resulted in substantial injustice and warranted reversal and a new trial. VonLutzow v. Leppek, 2003 MT 214, 317 M 109, 75 P3d 782 (2003), following Niles v. Big Sky Eyewear, 236 M 455, 771 P2d 114 (1989).

Evidence of Negotiation and Agreement Between Subdivider and City Offered for Purpose Other Than to Show Liability or Validity of Claim: In a suit by a developer over conditions that the City Council attached to its preliminary subdivision plat approval, this rule did not bar testimony regarding settlement negotiations and the resulting subdivision improvement agreement because under 76-3-608, the City Council was required to consult with the developer and give due weight and consideration to the expressed preference of the developer and was thus required to negotiate. The Supreme Court also stated that Rule 408 excludes only evidence offered to prove liability or the validity of a claim or amount and does not require exclusion when the evidence is offered for another purpose and that, in this case, the evidence was offered to show the arbitrary and capricious nature of the City Council's decision. Thus, the evidence fell under the exception clause of the rule. Kiely Constr. v. Red Lodge, 2002 MT 241, 312 M 52, 57 P3d 836 (2002).

Consulting Physician Diagnosis Properly Admitted — Scope of Exclusion — Evidence Not Offered for Liability Purposes: In a claim against his employer, W.R. Grace & Co. (Grace), for injuries caused by asbestosis, Kaeding tried to exclude from evidence by a motion in limine a written diagnosis from a consulting physician that he, Kaeding, was suffering from asbestosis. Kaeding argued that the diagnosis should have been excluded under this rule. The Supreme Court held that by its plain language, this rule does not exclude otherwise admissible evidence only because that evidence is presented in the course of compromise negotiations. The Supreme Court also pointed out that this rule excludes only evidence that is offered to prove liability and that, in the instant case, the letter was offered only to prove notice of the injury, not to prove liability for the injury. Kaeding v. W.R. Grace & Co., 1998 MT 160, 289 M 343, 961 P2d 1256, 55 St. Rep. 640 (1998).

Mutual Mistake of Fact Sufficient to Set Aside Release in FELA Action: A release in an action under the Federal Employers' Liability Act (FELA), 45 U.S.C. 51 through 60, may be set aside on the basis of mutual mistake of fact in executing the release. A mutual mistake of fact is sufficient to avoid a release only when the mistake goes to the nature of the injury and the mistaken belief is held by both parties. In the present case, Bevacqua signed releases purporting to settle all injury claims, but was lulled into signing because of repeated assurances by doctors who examined him at the employer's request, assured him that nothing was wrong, and authorized him to return to work. Under FELA, this mutual mistake of fact was sufficient to set aside the releases. Bevacqua v. Union Pac. RR Co., 1998 MT 120, 289 M 36, 960 P2d 273, 55 St. Rep. 469 (1998), following Callen v. Pa. RR Co., 332 US 625, 92 L Ed 242, 68 S Ct 296 (1948), and Counts v. Burlington N. RR Co., 952 F2d 1136 (9th Cir. 1991), and followed in Cheff v. BNSF Ry. Co., 2010 MT 235, 358 Mont. 144, 243 P.3d 1115.

Limited Admissibility of Settlement Agreement to Show Witness Bias: Although the introduction at trial of offers to compromise and settlement agreements is forbidden under this rule, settlements may be admitted for limited purposes, such as proving bias or prejudice of a witness, in accordance with Rule 607 M.R.Ev. In the present case, plaintiffs counsel questioned one of the settling parties extensively regarding a settlement agreement and whether the party would benefit under the agreement if defendants prevailed. The witness admitted that he would gain under the agreement. The cross-examination adequately brought out the witness's bias, and the jury had sufficient evidence of the nature and effect of the settlement agreement to judge the credibility of the testimony. Therefore, the trial court did not err in limiting the admission of the settlement agreement to show the bias of the witness. In re Estate of DeCock, 278 M 437, 925 P2d 488, 53 St. Rep. 992 (1996).

No Accord When Payment Stopped on Check — Evidence of Agreement Properly Excluded: In a dispute over the charges for the care and training of horses, the parties agreed that Watkins would accept $5,000 for his services. The Williamses gave Watkins two checks for $2,500, but they stopped payment on the second check and refused to tender the rest of the money on the basis that one of the horses had been mistreated. The jury returned a verdict in favor of Watkins for $20,191 for services. The Williamses argued that the lower court erred in initially excluding the accord and satisfaction affirmative defense. The Supreme Court ruled that there was no accord because of the Williamses' failure to pay the agreed-upon sum and that the District Court had been correct in excluding testimony concerning the agreement. Watkins v. Williams, 265 M 306, 877 P2d 19, 51 St. Rep. 489 (1994).

Settlement Documents Inadmissible — Not Statement Against Interest by Party Opponent: In negotiations over damages for loss of business opportunity caused by Montana Rail Link (MRL), an adjuster for Farmers Mutual sent counsel for MRL a letter and a spreadsheet showing business interruption losses. MRL tried to introduce the letter and spreadsheet at trial, but the District Court disallowed the exhibit. Citing Lenahan v. Casey, 46 M 367, 128 P 601 (1912), and Gamble-Skogmo, Inc. v. McNair, 98 F. Supp. 440 (D.C. Mont. 1951), the Supreme Court held that the letter and spreadsheet were properly excluded. The Supreme Court said that the documents constituted statements made in settlement negotiations and were not made as independent statements of fact constituting statements against interest as an exception from the hearsay rule. DeTienne Associates Ltd. Partnership v. Mont. Rail Link, Inc., 264 M 16, 869 P2d 258, 51 St. Rep. 125 (1994).

Admissibility of Release Form When Claim Not Disputed: An employer contended District Court error in allowing into evidence a release form presented to Kestell for his signature prior to receiving his first severance paycheck. However, at the time Kestell was asked to sign the document, his claim for severance pay was not in dispute. Because the document was offered to show that the employer did not intend to offer Kestell another position, rather than for one of the purposes prohibited by this rule, admitting it into evidence was not improper. Kestell v. Heritage Health Care Corp., 259 M 518, 858 P2d 3, 50 St. Rep. 919 (1993).

Repetitive Testimony Outside Scope of Negotiations Properly Excluded: The District Court did not err in refusing to admit evidence discovered during negotiations when the same evidence was presented through testimony on cross-examination, rendering it repetitive. Maguire v. St., 254 M 178, 835 P2d 755, 49 St. Rep. 688 (1992).

Settlement Offer Not Admission of Liability: The plaintiffs' complaint was dismissed for failure to state a claim. The plaintiffs attempted to introduce evidence that consisted of a memo from the insurance company regarding its desire to enter into settlement negotiations. The plaintiffs alleged that the memo was an admission of liability. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's ruling that the memo was not admissible under the Montana Rules of Evidence and that an offer of settlement does not constitute an admission of liability. Treutel v. Jacobs, 240 M 405, 784 P2d 915, 46 St. Rep. 2233 (1989).

Inadmissibility of Compromise Offers — Offer Made Prior to Filing: Defendants contended that because a compromise offer was made prior to the filing of suit, it was not part of compromise negotiations and the trial court improperly prohibited testimony on the offer at trial. Although this rule does not clarify whether litigation must be in progress before the rule takes effect, the offer was within the purview of the rule when the parties had hired attorneys, a draft of the complaint had been sent to defendant's attorney, and it was clear that plaintiff had a claim against defendant at the time the offer was made. Niles v. Big Sky Eyewear, 236 M 455, 771 P2d 114, 46 St. Rep. 504 (1989).

Evidence of Presence of Former Defendant Not Precluded: In a medical malpractice trial, defendant's counsel briefly brought to the jury's attention the fact that another doctor (whose dismissal from the suit had been voluntarily stipulated by the plaintiff) had previously been a defendant in the action. Plaintiff claimed on appeal that such mention was precluded by Rule 408, M.R.Ev., and infringed her right to a fair trial. The Supreme Court held that Rule 408 precludes admissibility only of evidence of compromise or offers to compromise and does not preclude mere mention that another had been charged in the initial complaint. Easterday v. Canty, 219 M 420, 712 P2d 1305, 43 St. Rep. 60 (1986).

Plaintiff's Refusal of Settlement — Not Relevant to Mitigation of Damages or to Defendant's Intent: The District Court properly excluded evidence of defendant's offer to compromise and settle plaintiff's claim. The court was not persuaded by defendant's argument that refusing a settlement offer is a failure to mitigate damages and that the offer showed defendant did not seek to act towards plaintiff in an oppressive or retaliatory fashion. Tribby v. NW. Bank of Great Falls, 217 M 196, 704 P2d 409, 42 St. Rep. 1133 (1985).

Sex Crime Complaint Amendment to Lesser Offense — Admissibility on Issue of Victim's Credibility: Defendant sought to introduce evidence that the State twice amended its original information to reduce charges of sexual intercourse or attempted sexual intercourse to sexual assault. Defendant contended the amendments reflected the alleged victims' changing stories and wished to attack their credibility through the amendments. The evidence was properly denied. The prosecutor had stated the amendments were for tactical reasons, not because of any decision by the alleged victims. Defendant's argument, that because the court judicially noticed the amendments evidence behind their having been made should have been admitted, was without merit because the court noticed them only for the purpose of ruling on the State's motion to exclude evidence of them and not for future evidentiary considerations. St. v. Anderson, 211 M 272, 686 P2d 193, 41 St. Rep. 1357 (1984).

Rule 409. Payment of expenses.

Commission Comments

This rule is similar to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 409, but changes have been made to avoid a potential problem under that rule, to provide a sounder policy basis for the Montana rule, and to make the Montana rule consistent with existing Montana law. The Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 409 states: "Evidence of furnishing or offering or promising to pay medical, hospital, or similar expenses occasioned by an injury is not admissible to prove liability for the injury". The potential problem under the Federal and Uniform rule is that an offer or promise to pay is often intertwined with an admission of liability, and since the Commission believes the latter should be admitted, having this as part of the rule is inappropriate. The policy basis of the Federal Rule, as shown by the Federal Advisory Committee Note to that rule (46 F.R.D. 161, 240 (1969)), is that such payments arise from humane impulses. The Commission believes that such offers or promises are seldom made from such impulses and that such a policy is unrealistic. However, the statement of policy contained in Section 93-2201-7, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-701], and the policy implicit under Rule 408, that is, the encouragement of settlement of claims, is a valid policy for Rule 409.

This rule was drafted to be consistent with existing Montana law contained in Section 93-2201-9, R.C.M. 1947 [26-1-703, 26-1-704]. That section provides that payment of claims "... based on alleged liability of that person for injury to person, including death, or damage to property arising out of any occurrence..." is not to be construed "...as an admission of liability or fault..." nor is it to be admissible as evidence in a trial "...on the issue of liability, the extent of damages, or otherwise". The Federal and Uniform Rule (1974) only included payments for injury, not for property damage. This rule is intended to cover all types of payment arising out of alleged liability from either an injury or occurrence. Therefore this rule is entirely consistent with existing Montana policy and law.

Rule 410. Offer to plead guilty; nolo contendere; withdrawn plea of guilty.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to a version of Federal Rule 410 conditionally adopted by Congress. The condition was that the rule would be superseded by any amendment to the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure inconsistent with the rule. Such an amendment was made in Rule 611(e)(6), Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, which was later substituted for this version of the rule. The Commission prefers the superseded version of the rule because it allows use of statements whether or not made under oath, on the record, or in the presence of counsel and, most important, for impeachment purposes. The Uniform Rule 410 (1974) is similar to the first sentence of the rule but does not include a provision similar to the second sentence of the rule.

This rule allows an accused to offer to plead guilty or nolo contendere or to withdraw such pleas without either action being used against him in any subsequent trial. This is intended to aid the plea bargaining process, under similar policy considerations given to offers of compromise under Rule 408, and to allow highly prejudicial evidence to be excluded under considerations that the reasons for offering to plead or withdrawing pleas of guilty and nolo contendere would not be understood by a jury and would almost preclude a fair trial. The second sentence of this rule is added to insure that the accused does not abuse this rule and contradict earlier statements. See Harris v. New York, 401 U.S. 222 (1971). The trial court is required to insure that the statements were "voluntary and reliable" and if contradicted, the statements may be introduced for the limited purposes of impeachment or prosecution for perjury.

Existing Montana law has not specifically dealt with the problem of offers to plead or withdrawn pleas, although a plea of guilty that is not withdrawn is admissible in subsequent proceedings. Sikora v. Sikora, 160 Mont. 27, 33, 499 P.2d 808 (1972). Therefore this rule is new to Montana law. It should be noted that Montana law does not allow pleas of nolo contendere; however, such a plea is included in the rule because it has been recognized by Montana courts in a case where such a plea was entered in federal court and was relevant to a state case. State ex rel. McElliot v. Fousek, 91 Mont. 457, 461, 8 P.2d 795 (1932).

Case Notes

No Contest Plea — No Reservation of Issues for Appeal — Waiver of Right to Challenge Probable Cause: The District Court denied the defendant's motion to dismiss a charge of felony intimidation that claimed the allegations of the information did not establish probable cause. Subsequently, the defendant pleaded no contest without reserving any issues for appeal. The defendant later appealed his sentence, alleging that the issue of probable cause was jurisdictional and thus could be raised at any time. The Supreme Court ruled that the issue of probable cause is not jurisdictional and overruled any contrary statements found in St. v. Davis, 210 Mont. 28, 681 P.2d 42 (1984), and St. v. Thompson, 243 Mont. 28, 792 P.2d 1103 (1990). The court also concluded that the defendant waived his right to raise a probable cause challenge when he entered a no contest plea without reserving any issues for appeal. St. v. Spreadbury, 2011 MT 176, 361 Mont. 253, 257 P.3d 392.

Adequacy of Guilty Plea Colloquy — Defendant Informed of Possibility of Lesser Included Offense: The District Court did not affirmatively inquire whether defendant understood that by purposely or knowingly causing the victims' deaths, he may have committed either deliberate or mitigated deliberate homicide. However, the record demonstrated that defendant was informed of the possibility of the lesser included offense and had a full understanding of the precise kind of homicide to which he pleaded. The guilty plea colloquy was adequate. Bone v. St., 284 M 293, 944 P.2d 734, 54 St. Rep. 890 (1997).

Evidence of Circumstances Surrounding Plea Allowable Upon Introduction of Impeachment Evidence: Kowalski attempted to impeach his daughter's claim of fear and undermine her credibility by introducing letters that she mailed to him after he pleaded guilty to felony assault (now assault with a weapon) of his daughter. The lower court ruled that if the letters were introduced, the door would be open for the state to explore the circumstances surrounding the communication and the facts underlying Kowalski's prior plea. Kowalski contended that the ruling denied him a fair trial by forcing him to choose between effectively cross-examining his daughter and exposing the jury to highly prejudicial statements made during pleading, in violation of this rule. The Supreme Court adopted the analysis set out in U.S. v. Martinez, 775 F2d 31 (2nd Cir. 1985), which allows the prosecution to introduce prejudicial evidence to rehabilitate the credibility of a witness during redirect examination. To suppress the circumstances surrounding the letters while allowing Kowalski to use the letters for impeachment purposes would deny the jury a proper evaluation of the evidence. St. v. Kowalski, 252 M 166, 827 P2d 1253, 49 St. Rep. 197 (1992).

Confession Based on Promised Leniency — Inadmissible: Accused pleaded guilty based on a plea agreement whereby the State would not seek an increased sentence under the persistent felony offender law. The judge in accepting the plea questioned the accused, and his answers were a confession. He withdrew the guilty plea, and at trial the confession was used to impeach him. The federal District Court held that where a confession (not a plea) is brought about by thoughts of promised leniency it may not be admitted into evidence after the plea has been withdrawn. Hansen v. Risley, 40 St. Rep. 2100 (D.C. Mont. 1983) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Guilty Plea Voluntary — Admissible for Impeachment: Defendant contended that his entry of a guilty plea was not admissible in a trial following a withdrawal of the guilty plea as evidence to impeach his testimony. The basis for his contention was that his guilty plea was not voluntary. The record shows that the trial court carefully and extensively questioned defendant on the voluntariness of the plea, his understanding of the charge, the consequences of the plea, and the factual basis for his plea. Further, the requirements of St. v. Azure, 175 M 189, 573 P2d 179 (1977), were met in this case. The defendant was sufficiently informed to enter a plea that was "voluntary with understanding of the charge". St. v. Hansen, 194 M 197, 633 P2d 1202, 38 St. Rep. 1541 (1981), reversed on fifth amendment grounds in Hansen v. Risley, 40 St. Rep. 2100 (D.C. Mont. 1983) (apparently not reported in Federal Supplement).

Rule 411. Liability insurance.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 411. The primary reasons for exclusion of evidence of insurance are its irrelevance, prejudicial effect, and potential misuse by the jury.

Existing Montana law is generally consistent with this rule. Evidence of a party's liability insurance is inadmissible. Wilson v. Blair, 65 Mont. 155, 172, 211 P 289 (1922) and D'Hoodge v. McCann, 151 Mont. 353, 359, 433 P2d 477 (1968). Evidence that a party does not have insurance is also apparently inadmissible. Doheny v. Cloverdale, 104 Mont. 534, 555, 68 P2d 142 (1937).

Although not strictly a rule of evidence, Montana also follows the rule that: "Ordinarily injection of the fact that the defendant is protected by liability insurance into such a case, directly or indirectly, by evidence, arguments, or remarks constitutes reversible error". D'Hoodge v. McCann, supra. It is apparent that there are exceptions to the rule. First, while it is reversible error for one party to mention the other's liability insurance during voir dire (Wilson v. Thurston Co., 82 Mont. 492, 495, 267 P 801 (1928)), if the insured party mentions that it has insurance during voir dire, it is harmless error and that party cannot complain. Francis v. Heidel, 104 Mont. 480, 488, 68 P2d 583 (1937). Second, when an admission of liability contains reference to insurance, the entire admission is still allowed in evidence. Tanner v. Smith, 97 Mont. 229, 238, 33 P2d 547 (1934). Third, when the existence of insurance is injected in the case by a witness for the insured party through a "voluntary, unresponsive, and incidental answer", there is no reversible error. Meinecke v. Intermountain Transportation Co., 101 Mont. 315, 324, 55 P2d 680 (1936). Finally, the reversible error rule has been viewed by the Montana Supreme Court as a problem where "each case ... must generally speaking, stand on its own particular facts and incidents and be determined by the manner and circumstances in which the question of insurance was brought into the case". Francis v. Heidel, supra.

This case-by-case examination of whether circumstances are such that the injection of insurance constituted reversible error or grounds for mistrial has been followed in several cases. The cases indicate that some of the circumstances to be considered are the rule that it is for the trial court to determine sufficiency of grounds for mistrial and this determination will not be disturbed except upon a showing of an abuse of discretion; whether the substantial rights of the insured party are affected; and whether the judgment is excessive, when considering reversible error on appeal. Doheny v. Cloverdale supra; Adams v. Misener, 113 Mont. 559, 578, 131 P2d 472 (1942); Morehouse v. Ylvisaker, 152 Mont. 57, 63, 446 P2d 432 (1968); D'Hoodge v. McCann, supra at 360; and Klaus v. Hillberry, 157 Mont. 227, 283, 485 P2d 54 (1971).

The second sentence of this rule providing that insurance may be admissible for purposes other than to prove liability has not been dealt with in Montana. If admissibility is controlled by factors just mentioned above, the Commission believes that there is a legitimate use of evidence of insurance for purposes like those listed in the rule. Therefore, this second sentence would be new Montana law, but there is no intent to change the present Montana law on insurance in this rule.

1990 Amendment: Substituted gender neutral language for gender specific language. Amendment effective June 7, 1990.

Case Notes

Counsel's Comments to Not Be Concerned With "Who Pays What" or "Where the Money's Coming From" Brief and Not Sufficiently Prejudicial to Impact Opposing Party's Rights — Appropriate to Clarify Prospective Jurors Were Not to Consider Defendant's Economic Status in Reaching Verdict. Voegel v. Salsbery, 2023 MT 137, 413 Mont. 43, 532 P.3d 863.

Single Comment by Counsel During Closing Argument Insufficient to Warrant New Trial — Reference to Payments of Medical Bills Going to Providers Rather Than Plaintiff and Passing Statement of "Someone Else" or "the State" Paying Bills Did Not Create Unfair Inference to Existence of Insurance — District Court's Grant of New Trial Was Abuse of Discretion. Voegel v. Salsbery, 2023 MT 137, 413 Mont. 43, 532 P.3d 863.

Restriction of Questioning Regarding Insurance Availability During Voir Dire Not Abuse of Discretion: During voir dire in a case against the county, counsel questioned potential jurors about their beliefs as taxpayers and their concerns about the financial outcome of the case, but the trial court did not abuse its discretion by restricting the depth of questioning regarding the availability of insurance by the county. Eklund v. Wheatland County, 2009 MT 231, 351 M 370, 212 P3d 297 (2009). See also Goodnough v. St., 199 M 9, 647 P2d 364 (1982).

When Mention of Liability Insurance at Trial Constitutes Reversible Error — District Court Discretion to Determine Whether Reversal Warranted: One of the primary reasons for the general rule that evidence of liability insurance is not admissible under this rule is the prejudicial effect of such evidence. Thus, the fact of insurance injected into trial proceedings generally constitutes prejudicial reversible error when: (1) one party mentions another party's liability insurance during voir dire; (2) counsel repeatedly attempts to inject the insurance feature into the case with such force that the jury could scarcely miss the point; (3) evidence that a plaintiff does not have liability insurance is introduced; (4) evidence admissible under the exception to this rule for the purpose of proving bias or prejudice of a witness was introduced without foundational testimony to establish the purpose for which it was admitted; and (5) a District Court excludes admissible evidence under this rule when offered for the purpose of showing compliance with an underinsured motorist policy condition of settlement with a tortfeasor before looking to the underinsured motorist insurer for recovery. Nevertheless, the determination of whether the mention of insurance constitutes reversible error depends on the facts and circumstances of each case, and the District Court has the responsibility of determining on a case-by-case basis whether any particular injection of insurance into a trial warrants reversal. In the present case, defense counsel erred by insinuating to the jury that plaintiffs were litigious, and plaintiffs' counsel erred by not objecting to the remarks. The District Court weighed the competing concerns, considered the errors made by both sides, and fashioned a remedy by allowing plaintiffs to respond to defense counsel's remarks without unnecessarily injecting insurance into the trial. Under these particular circumstances, the District Court did not abuse its discretion, and the admission of insurance evidence in this manner was not prejudicial. Jenks v. Bertelsen, 2004 MT 50, 320 M 139, 86 P3d 24 (2004).

Dismissal of Insurer Improper in Light of Dispute Over Amount of Damages Owing in Excess of Liability Limits: Following a vehicle accident, a couple sought recovery for injuries and loss of consortium and also alleged that the damages exceeded the limits of defendants' coverage, entitling them to recover from their own policy. The District Court bifurcated the claims and then sua sponte dismissed the insurer from the action without prejudice. The couple sought to reverse the dismissal order, and the Supreme Court obliged. The District Court held that because a jury had not determined the couple's damages and because the insurer had agreed to pay the amount of the verdict up to the policy limits, there was no dispute between the couple and the insurer. However, the Supreme Court noted that the couple and the insurer disagreed on the amount of damages in excess of the amount that was payable under the liability limits of the policy. This was a dispute that the couple was entitled to litigate, so dismissal of the insurer was improper, and the case was remanded for further proceedings. State ex rel. Gadbow v. District Court, 2003 MT 127, 316 M 25, 75 P3d 1238 (2003), following Dill v. District Court, 1999 MT 85, 294 M 134, 979 P2d 188 (1999). See also Dias v. Healthy Mothers, Healthy Babies, Inc., 2002 MT 323, 313 M 172, 60 P3d 986 (2002).

Reference to Insurance During Voir Dire Not Necessarily Prejudicial: The restriction imposed by this rule prohibits evidence of insurance to prove liability, but specifically provides that such evidence may be admissible for other purposes. Whether or not a reference to insurance during voir dire violates this rule is a subjective determination that is left to the discretion of the District Court, and a new trial is not necessarily required simply because the word insurance is spoken during trial. The District Court is responsible for determining whether a reference to insurance is sufficiently prejudicial to warrant a new trial based on the circumstances and manner in which insurance is mentioned. In this case, use of the word "insurance" during voir dire was found to be a minor issue, and absent a showing of prejudice, a motion for a new trial based on use of the word was properly denied. Dias v. Healthy Mothers, Healthy Babies, Inc., 2002 MT 323, 313 M 172, 60 P3d 986 (2002), following Francis v. Heidel, 104 M 580, 68 P2d 583 (1937). See also Sioux v. Powell, 199 M 148, 647 P2d 861 (1982), and Voegel v. Salsbery, 2023 MT 137, 413 Mont. 43, 532 P.3d 863.

Admissibility of Evidence of Underinsured Motorist Policy and Liability Policy Issued by Same Insurer: Dill suffered damages after being hit as a pedestrian by a vehicle operated by Jardine. State Farm Mutual Automobile Insurance Company (State Farm) provided both liability insurance for Jardine and underinsured motorist coverage for Dill. State Farm maintained that the introduction of any evidence of insurance into the action would be reversible error. By its terms, this rule applies only to liability insurance and therefore does not preclude the admissibility of the underinsured motorist policy. Further, this rule prohibits the introduction of insurance only when it is offered to show negligence or liability. In this case, fault was not at issue. The issues were separate, and the rule was not violated by introduction of the underinsured motorist policy. As to the admissibility of the liability policy, it was offered to establish that Dill complied with the contract terms and was thus admissible to establish that compliance, but not to establish fault. Dill v. District Court, 1999 MT 85, 294 M 134, 979 P2d 188, 56 St. Rep. 350 (1999), followed in State ex rel. Gadbow v. District Court, 2003 MT 127, 316 M 25, 75 P3d 1238 (2003).

Motor Vehicle Accident Trial — Inadvertent Mention by Plaintiff of Defendant's Insurance — No Error When No Immediate Objection and Jury Did Not Reach Damages Issue: Plaintiff sued defendant, whose vehicle struck plaintiff's from the rear while plaintiff was stopped at a traffic light. During trial, the defense counsel asked plaintiff about her conversation with defendant immediately after the accident, and her answer included a statement that defendant told her that he was insured. A jury verdict determined that both parties were negligent and that defendant's negligence was not the cause of plaintiff's injuries. Plaintiff moved for a new trial on the ground that she was prejudiced by the defense counsel inducing her to mention defendant's insurance. Denial of the motion was not an abuse of discretion because: (1) when the defense moved for a mistrial after the insurance was mentioned, plaintiff's counsel stated that the mention of insurance was prompted by the defense counsel's questions and was innocuous and inadvertent, thus agreeing with the trial judge, who denied the new trial motion; (2) plaintiff did not object or request corrective action after the insurance was mentioned and, in fact, opposed the defense objection and thus waived any objection; and (3) even if refusal of plaintiff's later motion to strike the insurance statement and issue a cautionary instruction was error, the error was harmless because if the mention somehow influenced the jury's assessment of the case, it would have been on the issue of damages, an issue that the jury never reached because the jury found both parties negligent. Plaintiff argued that defendant built his case around the theory that plaintiff was a golddigger and that the mention of insurance prejudiced plaintiff by fitting into that theory. This argument was at best speculative because the jury never reached the issue of damages. Newbauer v. Hinebauch, 1998 MT 115, 288 M 482, 958 P2d 705, 55 St. Rep. 454 (1998).

New Trial Denied — Untimely Objection: At trial, Napier referred to his liability insurance during his own testimony and Cosner did not object. Cosner also did not object to closing statements that referred to liability insurance. Cosner then requested a new trial based on improper references to insurance. The District Court denied the motion, and the Supreme Court affirmed. Parties must make their objections known to the trial court at the time the objectionable conduct or evidence is introduced in order to preserve the issue for purposes of appeal. Cosner v. Napier, 249 M 253, 813 P2d 989, 48 St. Rep. 652 (1991).

No Prejudicial Mention of Insurance Coverage: The trial court is charged with determining if any particular mention of liability insurance is sufficiently prejudicial to warrant a new trial. This determination depends upon the circumstances and manner in which the subject of insurance is brought into the case. In this case, the court did not abuse its discretion when it denied plaintiffs' posttrial motion for a new trial because of the alleged interjection of insurance. In the first claim relating to an improper mention, a question was posed to demonstrate the witness's general lack of judgment and thereby undermine his credibility as a witness. It therefore falls within the exception to this rule. The other alleged improper references did not directly indicate to the jury that the plaintiff had insurance and therefore are without merit. Massman v. Helena, 237 M 234, 773 P2d 1206, 46 St. Rep. 764 (1989).

Admission of Tape Recorded Statement Without Foundational Testimony — Neither Cumulative Nor Harmless Error: A tape recorded statement made by decedent to an insurance claims representative, edited to remove evidence of insurance, was held clearly prejudicial and not merely harmless cumulative evidence because it was introduced to the jury as evidence without explanation about the circumstances under which it was taken and without information that the jury needed to put the statement into proper perspective and because the jury was not exposed to any foundational information reflecting biases or prejudices on the part of the adjuster in asking the questions or decedent in answering them. Heisler v. Boule, 226 M 332, 735 P2d 516, 44 St. Rep. 698 (1987).

Brief Questioning of Prospective Juror Regarding Insurance Employment — Not Error: Two brief questions to one prospective juror about his past work of selling insurance and a question as to whether this would bias his decision did not prejudice the defendant because there was no suggestion that the defendant had liability insurance and the questioning was done in good faith to allow counsel to look for bias or prejudice on the part of a prospective juror as set forth in the general rule of Haynes v. County of Missoula, 163 M 270, 517 P2d 370 (1973). Garza v. Peppard, 222 M 244, 722 P2d 610, 43 St. Rep. 1233 (1986).

Introduction of Insurance for Issue Other Than Showing Negligence or Liability — Joint Prosecution With Tort for Failure of Duty to Settle: This rule is not violated when an action against defendant is jointly prosecuted with an action against defendant's insurance company for failure of duty to settle under 33-18-201 because the issues of the actions are separate and because in prosecuting failure of duty to settle, insurance is introduced for purposes other than to show negligence or liability. Klaudet v. Flink, 202 M 247, 658 P2d 1065, 40 St. Rep. 64 (1983).

Evidence of Absence of Liability Insurance — Reversible Error: The truck the plaintiff used for hauling coal was damaged in a head-on collision with the defendant. The trial court gave the plaintiff permission to introduce evidence of his lack of collision insurance to show why he had not mitigated damages for his loss of earnings. However, at trial it was disclosed that the plaintiff had neither collision nor liability insurance. Because evidence of the absence of liability insurance can be as prejudicial as evidence of its existence, the case was remanded for a new trial. Sioux v. Powell, 199 M 148, 647 P2d 861, 39 St. Rep. 1224 (1982).

Article V Privileges

Article Commission Comments

Introductory Note. The Commission has taken a different approach with Article V, Privileges, than used with other articles contained in the Montana Rules of Evidence. In other articles the Commission has attempted to draft Montana rules that are identical to the Federal Rules (and the Uniform Rules of Evidence (1974) which are taken from them) as far as possible so that procedure in state and federal courts will be consistent. This is not possible in Article V because Congress, after reviewing the proposed Federal Rules on privileges, rejected the proposal and substituted a rule that applies the common law of privileges in federal civil and criminal cases and the state law of privileges in civil actions in which state law supplies the rule of decision. The Uniform Rules (1974), Article V, adopted the federal draft which Congress rejected; it has the effect of modifying and deleting privileges currently recognized in Montana and of adding other privileges currently not recognized in Montana. Whether this draft will be widely adopted by states and become uniform remains to be seen, but considering the widely different types of privileges recognized by the states, the outcome is not certain and will not be for many years.

In view of these developments, the Commission decided not to attempt to draft new rules of privilege but to continue the present Constitutional and statutory system with the recommendation that the legislature review all the privilege laws to determine whether they meet present-day needs. It took this action for the following reasons:

First, there will probably not be a great deal of uniformity among the Federal courts and various states with respect to privileges. As previously pointed out, the Federal Rules do not recognize specific privileges but require that Federal courts either apply the common law or state law, depending upon the case. The Uniform Rules (1974) adopted specific rules of privilege but they have not been widely adopted and contain substantial changes in recognition of particular privileges. In view of the widely different types of privileges currently recognized by the states, it does not appear that there will be much uniformity in this area, and so one of the goals of the Commission in drafting rules of evidence does not apply to privileges. Therefore, the Commission felt free to be more concerned with Montana law than uniformity when dealing with privileges.

Second, rules of privileges are not like other rules of evidence. Privileges have the effect of excluding relevant evidence because of the public policy of protecting confidential relationship, such as husband-wife, lawyer-client, and clergyman-penitent, Section 93-701-4, R.C.M. 1947 [Title 26, ch. 1, part 8]. To uphold the protection of these policies, rules of privilege should apply not only in court proceedings but also in any proceeding where testimony can be compelled by law. The Montana Rules of Evidence only apply in court proceedings (see proposed Rule 101(a)) and would not necessarily apply in administrative hearings or legislative investigations. Further, drafting rules of evidence governing privileges which would only apply in court proceedings would create the confusing situation of having two sets of rules governing privileges, one for proceedings out of court and one for use in court. The article on privileges meets these problems by not including those particular privileges created by statute as separate rules, but adopting them by reference to constitutions and statutes.

Finally, the effect of a privilege is to exclude relevant evidence which acts as a hinderance to ascertaining the truth, accurately adjudicating cases, and the constitutional right to a fair trial. In view of this, the Commission feels that it is inappropriate to change or expand privileges currently existing under Montana law; this type of decision, balancing the right to fair trial against the protection of certain relationships, is one properly left to elected representatives of the people [rather] than a Commission drafting rules of evidence. Therefore, the Commission did not expand, change, or delete any particular privileges presently existing under Montana law.

The article on privileges drafted by the Commission has five rules. The first follows Uniform Rule (1974) 501, setting out the elements of a privilege, but most important, incorporating by reference all privileges found in the constitution, statutes and rules of practice and procedure. This has the effect of cutting off any further recognition of privileges by case law, which requires the second rule. It is based on Uniform Rule (1974) 509 and allows the government the privilege not to disclose the identity of an informer, which is currently recognized in Montana only through case law. The final three rules of this article generally apply to all privileges and are based on Uniform Rules (1974) 510 to 512. They relate to voluntary waiver, involuntary or erroneous disclosure, and comment and inference from a claim of privilege.

Rule 501. Privileges recognized only as provided.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Uniform Rule (1974) 501 except the opening clause is changed. The Uniform Rule read: "except as otherwise provided by constitution or statute or by these or other rules promulgated by the Supreme Court of this state...". The Commission chose to use language from the exception clause of Rule 402 rather than that of the Uniform Rule because of its clarity and simplicity and because there appears to be no difference in general meaning between it and the phrase used.

The Commission intends the adoption of the first clause of this rule to incorporate by reference any privilege found in the Constitutions of the United States and the state of Montana, Montana statute, or rules of practice and procedure adopted by the Supreme Court. Certainly included among those privileges are the following listed by way of example: the constitutional privilege against self-incrimination and statutory privileges recognized under R.C.M. 1947 Sections 66-3212(1) [26-1-807], 93-601-2 [26-1-902, 26-1-903], and 93-701-4 [Title 26, ch. 1, part 8].

The rule provides that only the privileges incorporated by reference shall be recognized and so has the effect of cutting off any further case law recognition of privileges. The final four clauses in this rule represent a delineation of the elements of a testimonial privilege and are intended to clarify privileges generally. This rule represents a new approach to the use of privileges in Montana courts.

Expert Testimony Beyond Scope Originally Allowed — Waiver of Objection When Witness Called by Defendant: Consistent with the holding in Buchanan v. Ky., 483 US 402, 97 L Ed 2d 336, 107 S Ct 2906 (1987), the District Court stated that it would allow testimony of a counselor for the limited purpose of the state's rebuttal if defendant placed his state of mind in issue through direct testimony or by calling his own psychologist as a witness. However, defendant called the counselor as a witness during presentation of his case, asking about communications between defendant and the counselor. To the extent that the counselor's testimony exceeded the purposes for which it was originally allowed, it was the fault of the defendant, who thereby waived any objection he might have otherwise asserted based on privilege or the constitutional right against self-incrimination. St. v. Goodwin, 249 M 1, 813 P2d 953, 48 St. Rep. 539 (1991), followed with regard to constitutionality of ordering a compelled evaluation for rebuttal purposes in St. v. Hess, 252 M 205, 828 P2d 382, 49 St. Rep. 217 (1992). See also Smith v. McCormick, 914 F2d 1153 (9th Cir. 1990).

Alcohol Abuse Program — Confidential Information — Use in Drunk Driving Prosecution or Arrest: Concerned that Magnuson was intoxicated, Kee attempted to keep him from driving away from the Kee ranch and, when the attempt failed, called the local Alcoholics Anonymous and talked of her fears to House, not knowing that Magnuson was in counseling with House under a federally funded program. Federal law provides that patients' records are confidential and that information received while performing any alcohol abuse prevention function cannot be used to initiate or substantiate any criminal prosecution. House called an undersheriff and told him Magnuson was intoxicated, was driving a Ford Bronco, that Tracy's Bar was his usual hangout, and that the undersheriff should watch out for Magnuson. While driving around, the undersheriff saw Magnuson driving erratically. When stopped, Magnuson smelled of alcohol, appeared drunk, and failed onsite sobriety tests. The information House gave the undersheriff was not tainted with the federal prohibition, and dismissal of a DUI charge on the grounds of taint would be reversed. House was not performing an alcohol abuse prevention function when he received the information from Kee, and thus the information he gave the undersheriff was not federally prohibited confidential records information. In addition, the information the undersheriff received from House was not used to initiate or substantiate any charge; the undersheriff's own observations were. St. v. Magnuson, 210 M 401, 682 P2d 1365, 41 St. Rep. 1121 (1984).

Management Consultant/Client Relationship: The relationship between a management consultant and his clients is not considered privileged under Montana law. Therefore, husband with such a position, who sought modification of child support payments granted wife pursuant to divorce, could not avoid wife's interrogatories seeking information as to his clients and income received from them on the ground it was privileged confidential information. Hughes v. Hughes, 205 M 69, 666 P2d 739, 40 St. Rep. 1102 (1983).

Rule 502. Identity of informer.

Commission Comments

This is the only rule contained in Article V which relates to a particular privilege. The privilege for the identity of an informer could not be incorporated by reference in Rule 501 because it has only been recognized by case law in Montana. Since Rule 501 also has the effect of cutting off any further recognition of privileges by case law, it is necessary to recognize this privilege in these rules if it is to survive. The Commission believes that this privilege is a necessary part of effective law enforcement and therefore has adopted it.

(a) Rule of privilege. This subdivision is identical to Uniform Rule (1974) 509(a) except that the phrase "to a law enforcement officer or member of a legislative committee or its staff conducting an investigation" has been deleted from the end of the subdivision. The Commission feels that listing specific governmental officers is unnecessary and unwise, since it is difficult to list all governmental officials to whom the privilege would apply and so avoids problems arising if any particular officer were omitted. The subdivision is phrased in general terms so the rule not only applies to criminal actions but violations of civil law and in civil cases as well.

This privilege is unique in that it belongs to the government, not to the communicating party, the informer; and that it covers only the identity of the informer, not the contents of his communications which are necessarily revealed as the basis for prosecution. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 59 (1959). The privilege is limited by its underlying purpose: "...the furtherance and protection of the public interest in effective law enforcement". Id. The protection given the informer by the privilege is therefore incidental, for it is only meant to encourage citizens to communicate information about the commission of crimes (Id.) and is not for the sole benefit of the well-being of the informer.

The privilege has received recognition in Montana in State ex rel. Offerdahl v. District Court, 156 Mont. 432, 435, 481 P2d 338 (1971) and State v. Hull, 158 Mont. 6, 17, 47 P2d 314 (1971).

(b) Who may claim the privilege. This subdivision is identical to Uniform Rule (1974) 509(b). The subdivision simply establishes the principle that the privilege granted in subdivision (a) to public entities may be claimed by "an appropriate representative" of those public entities to whom information was given. The Commission recognizes that in the majority of cases the privilege will be claimed by the prosecuting attorney on behalf of the public entity, but this does not foreclose any other "authorized representative" from claiming the privilege.

(c) Exceptions and limitations. This subdivision is similar to Uniform Rule (1974) 509(c) except that in paragraph (1) "public entity" is substituted for "government" for the sake of consistency and in paragraph (2) substantial changes have been made which delete provisions for procedures for an in camera hearing, a sealed record of, and the presence of counsel at, the hearing. Also deleted were the test of determining when testimony of the informer would be required ("that there is a reasonable probability that the informer can give testimony"), and several alternatives the court could choose from if the testimony was found to be required by the court but the public entity chose not to reveal the identity of the informer. The Commission made these changes to provide a clearer, more practical, more flexible rule and allow the trial court to balance the interests of the public entity in keeping the identity secret against the interests of a party's right to prepare his case.

Paragraph (1) recognizes three means of waiving this privilege; first, if the public entity discloses the identity to "those who would have cause to resent the communication", a phrase from Roviaro, supra at 60; second, if the informer, by his own actions, reveals that he is the informer; and third, if the public entity has the informer testify in the case. It is obvious that if any of these three circumstances arise, then attempts to invoke the privilege or demand the identity of the informer are meaningless. In State v. Hull, supra, the Montana Supreme Court held that a lower court could not be found in error for refusing demands by the defendant to reveal the identity of an informer where it was obvious that the defendant knew the identity of that informer. Therefore, this paragraph is generally consistent with Montana law.

Paragraph (2) governs situations where the informer can supply testimony which is needed in a case and the public entity does not want the informer's identity revealed. The test was stated in Roviaro, supra at 62:

We believe that no fixed rule with respect to disclosure is justifiable. The problem is one that calls for balancing the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual's right to prepare his defense. Whether a proper balance renders nondisclosure erroneous must depend upon the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors.

Paragraph (2) allows the public entity to make a showing of facts relevant to the question of whether the informer should testify; the Commission believes that it is within the sound discretion of the court to conduct such a showing in a manner consistent with the objective of the privilege of keeping this identity secret. However, if the court finds that the informer should testify and the public entity elects not to allow his identity to be disclosed, the court can dismiss the charges to which the testimony would relate in criminal cases or take appropriate action in civil cases. The Commission believes that this balances the interest of the public entity against a party's right to prepare his defense and confront and cross-examine his accuser.

This situation has arisen in Montana in State ex rel. Offerdahl v. District Court, supra, which quoted the balancing test from Roviaro, and required that the identity of the informer be revealed in a criminal case. Therefore, this paragraph is consistent with Montana law; however, to the extent that this rule expands Roviaro to civil cases, it is new Montana law.

Case Notes

Failure to Disclose Identity of Confidential Informant Error: In a criminal case, a confidential informant made a controlled buy of methamphetamine from the defendant while wearing a body wire. At trial, the state refused to disclose the identity of the confidential informant, and the District Court denied the defendant's motion to compel disclosure of the informant's identity. The defendant was convicted of criminal possession and distribution of methamphetamine. On appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the informant played a continuous, active, and primary role in the alleged crime and was a participant in and material witness to the sale of methamphetamine. Further, disclosure of the informant's identity would not affect continuing operational effectiveness or create a substantial risk to the informant because the informant was no longer working with law enforcement and had subsequently moved out of the area. St. v. Walston, 2020 MT 200, 401 Mont. 15, 469 P.3d 716.

Discovery of Identity of Confidential Informant Properly Denied: DuBray contended that the identity of a confidential informant should have been disclosed in discovery. Applying the balancing test in Roviaro v. U.S., 353 US 53 (1957), the Supreme Court found nothing to persuade that disclosure of the informant's identity was warranted. The informant did not testify at trial, and DuBray offered nothing concrete or substantive to establish that disclosure was necessary to properly prepare for trial, that the informant might possess exculpatory information, or that the informant may have been involved in the crime. Mere speculation about possible relevancy of the informant's testimony was insufficient to warrant disclosure of the informant's identity. St. v. DuBray, 2003 MT 255, 317 M 377, 77 P3d 247 (2003). See also St. v. McLeod, 227 M 482, 740 P2d 672 (1987).

Motion to Disclose Identity Denied:

The state may claim the privilege to refuse to disclose the identity of a confidential informant, subject to the balancing test in Roviaro v. U.S., 353 US 53 (1957). Under Roviaro, a defendant must show the need for disclosure and the need must be one that overrides the government's interest in preserving confidentiality. Here, Ayers did not meet the burden. The confidential information was based on third-hand knowledge, and the informant: (1) was neither present at the crime scene nor witness to any criminal activity, negating any hearsay exception; (2) had no continuous, active, or primary role in the alleged crime, negating the need for disclosure because of a possible entrapment defense; and (3) was not a material witness. Ayers was given the investigative report that summarized all relevant information provided by the informant. The report included the identity of all of the informant's sources, whom Ayers had the opportunity to call as witnesses. Denying disclosure of the informant's identity had little if any impact on Ayers' ability to prepare a defense, and denial of the disclosure motion was not error. St. v. Ayers, 2003 MT 114, 315 M 395, 68 P3d 768 (2003).

Defendant alleged that disclosure of the identity of the police informants was necessary to his defense because the informants had provided false information to the authorities regarding methamphetamine production and marijuana growing operations that were never found and because further examination would show the informants to be patently unreliable. However, the court properly refused to disclose the identities because: (1) although methamphetamine production articles described in the warrant application were not found, other articles consistent with methamphetamine production were found; (2) the warrant application stated that the informant believed marijuana was being grown, not that the informant had seen the marijuana; and (3) it was in the public interest not to disclose the identity of another informant who was still being used in a separate police investigation. Mere speculation or conjecture about the relevance of the informants' testimony was inadequate. Because defendant failed to demonstrate the falsity of the information, refusal to disclose their identities was proper. St. v. Crowder, 248 M 169, 810 P2d 299, 48 St. Rep. 376 (1991).

Defendant's motion to disclose the identity of the state's confidential informants was properly denied because, under the applicable test that balances the public's interest against the defendant's right to prepare her defense and to confront and examine her accusers, she did not demonstrate that the need for disclosure outweighs the government's interest. Defendant's contention that the state must first disclose the relevance of the informants' testimony misconstrues the balancing test under which the burden is on the defendant to show the need for disclosure. The record is bare regarding defendant's basis for making the motion for disclosure. St. v. Babella, 237 M 311, 772 P2d 875, 46 St. Rep. 827 (1989), followed in St. v. Campbell, 254 M 425, 838 P2d 427, 49 St. Rep. 838 (1992).

Defendant's motion to disclose the identity of the state's confidential informant was properly denied when the informant's information was not used as a basis for probable cause to arrest and the informant took no active part in the alleged crime but simply supplied information. There was no evidence that disclosure outweighed the public interest in protecting the flow of information or that the informant's testimony would be relevant to any issue in the case. Further, defendant failed to substantiate the claim that his constitutional rights were infringed by nondisclosure or that the informant would be exposed to no risk upon disclosure. St. v. Coates, 233 M 303, 759 P2d 999, 45 St. Rep. 1508 (1988).

Failure to Disclose Drug Crime Informant Upheld: The possibility that a confidential police informant might have been an exculpatory witness was an insufficient basis for requiring disclosure of the informant's identity to the person charged with possession of marijuana with intent to sell. Moreover, the state had a strong interest in protecting the flow of information regarding the drug trade in the county and showed that the flow could be impaired without the future services of the informant and that the informant might be placed in danger by disclosure. Disclosure was properly denied. St. v. Sarbaum, 270 M 176, 890 P2d 1284, 52 St. Rep. 133 (1995).

Test for Disclosure of Identity of Informer: There is no fixed rule as to when an informant's identity must be disclosed. It depends on a balancing of the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the charged person's right to prepare a defense and on the circumstances of the case, taking into account the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors. St. v. Sarbaum, 270 M 176, 890 P2d 1284, 52 St. Rep. 133 (1995).

Discretion of Court Whether Disclosure of Informant Necessary for Witness Believability: In weighing a defendant's needs against the public's interest in the flow of information from informants, trial courts should take into consideration the crime charged, possible defenses, the possible significance of the informant's testimony, and other relevant factors in balancing the conflicting interests. It should rest entirely with the judge who hears the motion to suppress to decide whether he needs disclosure of identities and locations of informants in order to decide whether an officer is a believable witness. St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950, 46 St. Rep. 512 (1989), distinguishing St. v. Chapman, 209 M 57, 679 P2d 1210 (1984). See also Roviaro v. U.S., 353 US 53, 1 L Ed 2d 639, 77 S Ct 623 (1957).

Nondisclosure of Informant Proper: Defendant appeals from his conviction for criminal sale (now criminal distribution) of dangerous drugs, asserting that nondisclosure of the identity of a confidential informant was prejudicial. The court held that defendant did not meet the burden of showing that the informant would have been a material witness whose testimony might result in exoneration or that failure to disclose the identity of the informant would infringe defendant's constitutional rights. St. v. McLeod, 227 M 482, 740 P2d 672, 44 St. Rep. 1251 (1987). See also St. v. Soto, 2020 MT 265, 401 Mont. 545, 474 P.3d 815, and St. v. Walston, 2020 MT 200, 401 Mont. 15, 469 P.3d 716, applying the factors in McLeod to reach a different result.

Disclosure of Informant's Identity and Whereabouts — Balancing Test Required: Defendant was charged with sale of dangerous drugs (now criminal distribution of dangerous drugs). Defendant contended that he had been entrapped because a paid informant had used persistent and harassing techniques to get him to obtain drugs for him over a period of a month and a half. The informant left town after defendant's arrest. Defendant did not know the whereabouts or true identity of the informant. The District Court refused defendant's request to require the State to disclose the identity and whereabouts of the informant. On appeal, the Supreme Court relied on the balancing test set forth in Offerdahl v. District Court, 156 M 432, 481 P2d 338 (1971), to determine whether the defendant's interest in preparing his defense outweighed the government's interest in protecting the flow of information from the informant. The court found that the informant's identity should have been disclosed because his testimony was relevant to the issue of entrapment and because, based on the facts in this case, the balance weighed heavily in defendant's favor. St. v. Chapman, 209 M 57, 679 P2d 1210, 41 St. Rep. 550 (1984), distinguished in St. v. Coates, 233 M 303, 759 P2d 999, 45 St. Rep. 1508 (1988).

Disclosure of Informant's Identity — Validity of Affidavit in Support of Search Warrant: A defendant in a drug offense case moved to quash a search warrant and to produce the name of the informant whose statements were used in the affidavit in support of the search warrant. Defendant alleged that either the informant had made false statements or the informant had made an illegal entry into defendant's home. In a proceeding for Writ of Supervisory Control, the Supreme Court set forth the procedure to be used to challenge the validity of an affidavit on the basis of deliberate falsehood or of reckless disregard for the truth. First, the defendant must make a substantial preliminary showing that his rights have been violated. Second, if defendant makes the requisite preliminary showing, then the affidavit must be examined to determine if sufficient information remains after excising the challenged material to support a finding of probable cause. Only if the remaining content is insufficient is defendant entitled to an evidentiary hearing. Finally, at the hearing defendant must establish by a preponderance of the evidence that the affidavit was based on an illegal entry, false information, or insufficient probable cause. If defendant is successful, that evidence will be suppressed. Defendant is not entitled to disclosure of the informant's identity until he has made a substantial preliminary showing that the entry was illegal or the information was false. St. v. Sykes, 194 M 14, 663 P2d 691, 40 St. Rep. 690 (1983), overruled on other grounds in St. v. Long, 216 M 65, 700 P2d 153 (1985).

Rule 503. Waiver of privilege by voluntary disclosure.Commission Comments

This rule and the two following, Rules 503 to 505, generally apply to all privileges, that is, to the privileges incorporated in these rules by reference in Rule 501. The Commission has adopted them to clarify the use of privileges in Montana courts.

(a) General Rule. This subdivision is identical to Uniform Rule (1974) 510. It codifies the common-law rule that where the holder of a privilege ceases to treat a matter as privileged, the privilege terminates. This subdivision is consistent with existing Montana law. Ludwig v. Montana Bank and Trust Company, 109 Mont. 477, 500, 98 P2d 379 (1939). It should be noted that Montana law requires an objection to testimony that is privileged or the privilege is waived. Wilson v. Wilson, 64 Mont. 533, 544, 210 P 896 (1922); Lewis v. Bowman, 113 Mont. 68, 75, 121 P2d 162 (1942); and State v. Palen, 119 Mont. 600, 603, 178 P2d 62 (1947).

It should be noted that in determining whether the holder of a privilege has in fact waived it, the intention of the holder is not the only factor to be considered. Once conduct reaches a certain point, fairness requires an objective finding of waiver, despite any subjective intentions of the holder; further, once the particular point is reached, consistency requires a finding that such conduct will constitute a waiver, also despite any intention of the waiver. 8 Wigmore, Evidence 636, Section 2327 (McNaughton Rev. 1961). This subdivision deviates from the common law in allowing part of a communication to be disclosed, up to a "substantial part". Another deviation from the common law that should be noted is that the holder of a privilege need not be aware that he is waiving a privilege when he does so; that is, knowledge is not a required element for waiver. These two departures from the common law are intended to provide more flexibility in determining whether there is a waiver in accord with Wigmore's criteria of fairness and consistency. There is no Montana law specifically declaring what is a waiver of a privilege in terms which would indicate whether the two departures from the common law are inconsistent with Montana law; therefore, to this extent, this will be new Montana law.

(b) Joint holders. This subdivision is based on West's Annotated California Evidence Code, Section 912(b), except that references to specific privileges in that section have been deleted. This subdivision was adopted to govern a situation not covered by the Uniform Rule (1974); when two or more persons are holders of a privilege and one of them waives the privilege, the rule provides that the privilege is not waived by the other holders. The result under this subdivision is consistent with the policy underlying the next rule, Rule 504, in that the holder of a privilege is not made to suffer the consequences of a waiver over which he had no control. The joint holder situation has not arisen in any Montana cases and therefore would be new Montana law.

Case Notes

Letter Written by Insurer's Counsel and Disclosed to Employer in Workers' Compensation Claim — No Application of Attorney-Client Privilege — Protection of Work-Product Doctrine Waived by Disclosure — Supervisory Control Granted: An employee was injured at Roscoe Steel and filed a workers' compensation claim. Zurich, which insured Roscoe Steel, accepted liability for the claim and contracted with a third party to adjust the claim. Over time, the employee and Zurich disagreed about the employee's level of impairment. Eventually, Zurich had an attorney prepare an opinion and evaluation letter regarding the employee's case. The letter was given to Zurich as well as to the claims adjuster, who, without the knowledge of Zurich or the attorney, gave a copy of it to Roscoe Steel. Ultimately, the employee filed an action for unfair claims settlement practices against Zurich and the claims adjuster. As a part of discovery, the employee served a subpoena duces tecum on Roscoe Steel requesting all correspondence with Zurich, the adjuster, and the attorney's law firm. Counsel for Roscoe Steel filed an action to quash the subpoena, citing the attorney-client privilege and the attorney work-product doctrine. After the District Court denied the motion, Zurich petitioned the Supreme Court for a writ of supervisory control, which was granted. The Supreme Court agreed that the attorney-client privilege did not apply because Roscoe Steel and Zurich did not share a common legal interest in the adjustment of the employee's claim and that Roscoe Steel was not protected by Zurich's privilege with its counsel. Similarly, because Roscoe Steel and Zurich did not share common litigation interests, there was no reasonable expectation that Roscoe Steel would keep Zurich's work product confidential, and the privilege had been waived by the letter's disclosure to Roscoe Steel. American Zurich Ins. Co. v. 13th Judicial District Court, 2012 MT 61, 364 Mont. 299, 280 P.3d 240.

Abrogation of Attorney-Client Privilege by Compelled Discovery — Remand: Palmer brought a bad faith suit against Farmers Insurance Exchange (Farmers) after receiving privileged material from a Farmers' attorney. The District Court, apparently confusing the attorney-client privilege with the work-product doctrine, ordered production of the Farmers' files and all confidential attorney-client communications between Farmers and its attorneys. At no time did Farmers voluntarily relinquish the attorney-client privilege. In abrogating Farmers' attorney-client privilege by ordering production of privileged material and admitting it into evidence, the District Court misconstrued the law and materially affected Farmers' substantial rights, preventing Farmers from having a fair trial. The District Court decision was vacated and remanded for a new trial, allowing Farmers to reassert its attorney-client privilege. Palmer v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 261 M 91, 861 P2d 895, 50 St. Rep. 1210 (1993).

Records of Hospital Medical Staff Committee Held Privileged — No Waiver Found in Administrator's Affidavit: Plaintiff sought to discover documents from a hospital medical staff committee supporting his theory that because of conditions placed upon the staff privileges of a physician previously suspended for performing his hospital duties while intoxicated, the relationship between the hospital and the physician changed from independent contractor to principal and agent. On appeal from a District Court order quashing a deposition subpoena and giving summary judgment to the defendant, the Supreme Court affirmed that the members of the hospital's medical staff committee were immune from subpoena. The Supreme Court held that 50-16-203 applies to all members of the hospital's committee, to the hospital itself, and to patients whose files are reviewed by a committee and that even if the hospital had waived its privilege, it could not waive the privilege personal to the members of the committee. The Supreme Court also held that there was no issue as to the discoverable nature of the hospital administrator's files because there was no evidence in the record of any attempt to subpoena his files. Sistok v. Kalispell Regional Hosp., 251 M 39, 823 P2d 251, 48 St. Rep. 1151 (1991).

No Waiver of Privilege Regarding Report Contained in Claim File: Plaintiffs contended that Montana Power Company (MPC) waived its claim of privilege regarding a report contained within a claim file because MPC produced all portions of the file except the report. However, release of other materials in the file did not constitute waiver when the only significant portion of the file was the report. Day v. Mont. Power Co., 242 M 195, 789 P2d 1224, 47 St. Rep. 626 (1990).

Rule 504. Privileged matter disclosed under compulsion or without opportunity to claim the privilege.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Uniform Rule (1974) 511. The rule is intended to provide a remedy for the holder of a privilege when the subject matter of the privilege has been wrongfully disclosed. The remedy provided is that the privilege may be subsequently claimed and the disclosed subject matter made inadmissible.

The intent of "(a) compelled erroneously" is to allow a holder to disclose privileged matters when ordered to do so by a judge. The Commission rejects the common-law rule that the holder of a privilege must exhaust all legal remedies and risk incarceration in order not only to uphold his claim of privilege but also prevent the privilege from being waived. Therefore, when the original order compelling the holder to disclose privileged matter is reversed, the rule allows the holder to reassert the privilege.

The intent of (b), a disclosure made without the opportunity to claim the privilege, is to allow the holder to assert the privilege where a person other than the holder has knowledge of privileged matter and discloses it under circumstances which do not allow the holder to assert the privilege. Examples of such persons would be an attorney's secretary, or an eavesdropper who, without the knowledge of the holder of the privilege, heard a privileged communication. The Commission intends the adoption of this rule to overrule the common-law "eavesdropper" rule which allows such a person to disclose privileged communications even though a claim of privilege is asserted.

There are no Montana cases in either of these areas, but to the extent that this rule overrules common law, this would be a change in Montana law.

Case Notes

Abrogation of Attorney-Client Privilege by Compelled Discovery — Remand: Palmer brought a bad faith suit against Farmers Insurance Exchange (Farmers) after receiving privileged material from a Farmers' attorney. The District Court, apparently confusing the attorney-client privilege with the work-product doctrine, ordered production of the Farmers' files and all confidential attorney-client communications between Farmers and its attorneys. At no time did Farmers voluntarily relinquish the attorney-client privilege. Rule 505. Comment upon or inference from claim of privilege.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Uniform Rule (1974) 512(a) except that "court" is substituted for "judge". The change is to keep the use of "court" consistent throughout the rules. Uniform Rule (1974) 512 also contained a subdivision (b) providing that proceedings shall be conducted to keep the making of claims of privilege from the knowledge of the jury and a subdivision (c) providing the parties a right to an instruction that no inference be drawn from any claim of privilege. The Commission did not adopt these subdivisions because it feels that they are not necessary. Enforcement of Rule 505 and proper conduct of trial will obtain the same result. Also see Rule 103(c).

A claim of privilege, made before a jury, often results in prejudicial feelings towards the holder of the privilege, and when the holder is one of the parties, the claim is prejudicial to his case. If comment can be made upon a claim of privilege or an inference be drawn therefrom, the holder of a privilege will either feel intimidated into waiving his privilege or be penalized for invoking it; either of these results destroy the effectiveness of privileges. This rule is intended to solve this problem, for the Commission intends this rule to maximize the effect of privileges by preventing comment or inference and thereby keeping the jury unaware of claims of privilege.

It is not clear whether Montana law allows comment or inference from a claim of privilege. Certainly a judge cannot comment on the evidence (Suhr v. Sears Roebuck Co., 152 Mont. 344, 350, 450 P2d 87 (1969)), and comment by a judge as to privilege or a claim of privilege would also appear improper. Batchoff v. Craney, 119 Mont. 157, 166, 172 P2d 308 (1946). Comment by counsel as to a claim of privilege appears to have arisen in only two Montana cases, neither of which is conclusive. In State v. Belland, 59 Mont. 540, 549, 197 P 841 (1921), the prosecution made repeated efforts to get a defendant's wife to testify as to illicit relations between her husband and a co-defendant; the court held these attempts "cannot be justified" and reversed the case for this and other prejudicial errors. In State v. Sloane, 22 Mont. 293, 297, 56 P 364 (1899), the defendant's wife was on a list of witnesses and the defendant's successful efforts to have her taken off the list were finally made in front of the jury; the court held there was no prejudicial error.

However, two statutes dealing with evidence generally could be inconsistent with this rule: Section 93-1301-7, R.C.M. 1974 [26-1-602] provides the disputable presumption (5) "that evidence willfully suppressed would be adverse, if produced" and (6) provides "that higher evidence would be adverse from inferior, being produced". Section 93-2001-1(7), R.C.M. 1974 [26-1-303], allows the court to instruct the jury "that if weaker and less satisfactory evidence is offered, when it appears that stronger and more satisfactory was within the power of the party, the evidence offered should be viewed with distrust". It would appear that the provisions of Section 93-701-4, R.C.M. 1947 [Title 26, ch. 1, part 8], providing "...it is the policy of the law to encourage confidence and preserve it inviolate..." and then listing the various privileges, and the provisions of this rule should be read as exceptions to the general statutes. This rule would be new Montana law.

Article VI Witnesses

Rule 601. Competency in general; disqualification.

Commission Comments

(a) General rule of competency. This subdivision is identical to Uniform Rules of Evidence (1974), Rule 601 which in turn is identical to the first sentence of Federal Rule 601. The second sentence of the Federal Rule is inappropriate, for it concerns the law of competency to be applied in federal courts in civil cases in which state law supplies the rule of decision.

The effect of this rule is to abolish all incompetencies of witnesses except as provided in rules which follow. This is consistent with the approach taken in Section 93-701-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]:

All persons, without exception, otherwise than is specified in the next two sections, who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses. Therefore, neither parties nor other persons who have an interest in the event of an action or proceeding are excluded; nor those who have been convicted of crime; nor persons on account of their opinions on matters of religious beliefs....

The next two sections referred to in this statute are 93-701-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], concerned with incompetencies of witnesses, and 93-701-4, R.C.M. 1947 [Title 26, ch. 1. part 8], concerned with testimonial privileges. Privileges are covered in Article V, and with one exception, the grounds of incompetency listed in Section 93-701-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], are covered in Rule 601(b).

The ground of incompetency found in Section 93-701-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], not covered by these rules, is commonly known as the Dead Man's Statute. Therefore, this rule has the effect of abolishing the Dead Man's Statute in Montana.

Montana Dead Man's Statutes provide that a claimant may not testify "to facts of direct transactions or oral communications" between himself and the deceased if the claim is against a deceased's estate under Section 93-701-3, subdivision 3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], or between himself and a deceased officer of a corporation or a deceased agent if the claim is against either the deceased officer's corporation or the deceased agent's principal under Section 93-701-3, subdivision 4, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]. The statute also provides that it does not apply when evidence of the claim is introduced by the estate or "when it appears to the court that without the testimony of the witness injustice will be done".

The purposes of the statute, as explained by Montana cases, are quite clear: First, the prevention of undue advantage by the living claimant, since he can testify where the deceased or personal representative cannot; and second, the removal of temptation for perjury by the claimant where there can be no denial by the deceased. Leffek v. Luedeman, 95 Mont. 457, 462, 27 P2d 511 (1933); Johnson v. Mommoth Lode, 136 Mont. 420, 422, 348 P2d 267 (1960); Novak v. Novak, 141 Mont. 312, 316, 377 P2d 368 (1963); and Hansen v. Kiernan, 159 Mont. 448, 454, 499 P2d 787 (1972).

However, the cases are not clear in applying the exception which allows the claimant to testify when the court determines the interest of justice requires it. Early cases considering the exception allowed the court to exercise its discretion and admit the testimony of the claimant with little or no corroboration if it appeared that to exclude it would deny a meritorious case. Roy v. King's Estate, 55 Mont. 567, 573, 179 P 821 (1919); Harwood v. Scott, 57 Mont. 83, 88, 186 P 693 (1920); Anderson v. Wirkman, 67 Mont. 176, 179, 215 P 224 (1932); and Averill Machinery Co. v. Taylor, 70 Mont. 70, 80, 223 P 918 (1924). A rule evolved from later cases requiring a foundation to be laid corroborating the claim before the testimony from the claimant could be heard. Wunderlich v. Hult, 86 Mont. 260, 269, and concurring opinion at 274, 283 P 423 (1929); Langston v. Currie, 95 Mont. 57, 70 P2d 160 (1933); Phelps v. Union Central Life Ins. Co., 105 Mont. 195, 203, 71 P2d 997 (1937); Rowe v. Eggum, 107 Mont. 378, 388, 87 P2d 199 (1938); and Sharp v. Sharp, 115 Mont. 35, 38, 139 P2d 235 (1943). The apparent reason for this rule is that the court cannot determine whether an injustice will occur unless it knows that the claim has merit and so cannot admit testimony by the claimant under the exception until this is shown by the foundation. Johnson v. Mommoth Lode, supra at 423.

The uncertainty of application of this exception arises because the Montana Supreme Court "has never laid down a well defined line of demarcation between a sufficient and insufficient foundation. The application of the statute must vary with the circumstances presented to the district court". Sharp v. Sharp, supra at 38. The test proposed by that case was whether the record discloses testimony from "which it is reasonable to conclude that there is credibility in plaintiff's claim". Id. at 40. However, later cases have inconsistent results. In Ahlquist v. Pinski, 120 Mont. 355, 358, 185 P2d 499 (1947) the court held that it was proper to admit the testimony of the claimant even when the foundation was "insufficient standing alone to establish plaintiff's claim but that it was sufficient to justify the court in concluding as it did that without plaintiff's testimony injustice would be done". In Novak v. Novak, supra, the court found the testimony of a claimant's wife to be sufficient foundation to admit his testimony. Yet, in Bauer v. Monroe, 117 Mont. 306, 320, 158 P2d 485 (1945), error was found because the court did not find sufficient foundation from the testimony of the wife of the claimant and several other witnesses as to the existence of an oral contract, even though (as pointed out in the dissent at 326) the deceased's actions were consistent with the allegation of the contract's existence. And, in Cox v. Williamson, 124 Mont. 512, 519, 227 P2d 614 (1951), the court held that testimony by the claimant was erroneously admitted because the foundation consisted of the testimony of one witness, a friend of the claimant; but (as pointed out in the dissent at 527) the competency of the witness should not depend upon the strength of the corroborating evidence.

The Commission believes that the Dead Man's Statute in Montana should be abolished for several reasons. The first is uncertainty. When the inconsistent application of the statutory exception (just discussed) is combined with what the Commission believes is the practice of trial courts in admitting the claimant's testimony using this exception (despite inconsistent case law), the result is an unfair burden of uncertainty to parties involved in cases covered by the Dead Man's Statutes. All that is really left of the Statutes in Montana is an occasional arbitrary application. The Commission feels that this uncertainty cannot be reduced by any alternative to the Dead Man's Statute.

The second reason is the false premise upon which the statute and case law rests. As previously noted, Montana cases state one of the purposes of the Dead Man's Statutes is the removal of the temptation for perjury. Cases that demand a foundation before allowing a claimant to testify are really calling for corroboration because of a fear of possible perjury. Therefore, one premise supporting the Dead Man's Statute is that the interest of claimants winning their case makes it probable that they will commit perjury. This is also the basis of the common law incompetency that disqualified parties for interest which was rejected as a ground of incompetency long ago, for certainly all parties to a case have such an interest; yet the Dead Man's Statute is the only area which blocks a party's testimony. Also, the statute does not disqualify many persons having an interest in the outcome of the litigation, such as the spouse of the claimant or other close relative.

Further, the statutes do not fulfill the purpose of preventing perjury. They only block testimony as to direct transactions or oral communications and not in other areas where perjury or false evidence is fabricated just as easily. The statute does not forbid the dishonest claimant, not concerned with committing perjury, from enlisting the aid of a third person to give false testimony in areas where the claimant is forbidden to do so by the statute.

Finally, the Commission feels that a fear of perjury is not properly handled by making a witness incompetent in certain areas; cross-examination and deliberations by the trier of fact are capable of exposing and dealing with false testimony in every other instance and there is no reason they are not capable of dealing with a claimant's false testimony. It should be noted that a declaration against a deceased's interests, even when given by the adversary party, has long been admissible as a hearsay exception (Sections 93-401-9 and 93-401-10, R.C.M. 1947 [both superseded]) and that the practice is to regard such testimony as the weakest type and to accordingly give a cautionary instruction.

The third reason is that the public policies of the Dead Man's Statute are invalid and should be rejected. As previously noted, another reason supporting the existence of these statutes is that without the statute, claimants would have an unfair advantage over deceased persons or their personal representatives. While this advantage certainly does exist, it has not been a strong enough reason to apply a rule of incompetency where claims are made against persons' estates when the person is not able to testify because of physical or mental incapacity; nor has the incompetency of the Dead Man's Statutes been applied to the hearsay exceptions allowing the deceased's statements against interest because of this disadvantage.

Further, the result of the Dead Man's Statute is two very poor policies. The first allows a concern for the possible injustice of a dishonest claimant taking advantage of a deceased person and his estate to overcome the certain injustice when an honest claimant is prevented from proving his claim against an estate. The law should be more concerned with the satisfaction of surviving claimants than of deceased persons. The second allows the concern over this advantage of claimants to suppress the truth in cases involving claims against estates. This is perhaps the greatest danger of the Dead Man's Statutes and certainly contrary to the policy of Rule 102 providing the purpose of the Montana Rules of Evidence "to secure fairness in administration... and promotion of growth and development of the law of evidence to the end that the truth may be ascertained and proceedings justly determined". Finally, it should be noted that with the abolition of the Dead Man's Statutes, the advantage of the claimant can be lessened under provisions like Rule 106 which provides that when part of an act, declaration, conversation, writing, or recorded statement is introduced (in this case by the claimant), the adverse party (in this case the estate) can introduce any other part of the act, declaration, conversation, writing, or recorded statement.

(b) Disqualification of witnesses. This subdivision is based on Maine Rules of Evidence, Rule 601(b), which in turn is similar to California Evidence Code Section 701. The Federal Rules of Evidence do not include such a provision, apparently on several grounds: that standards "...have proved elusive in actual application..."; that "...few witnesses are disqualified on that ground..."; that "discretion is regularly exercised in favor of allowing testimony..."; that "a witness wholly without capacity is difficult to imagine..."; and that "the question is one particularly suited to the jury as one of weight and credibility". Advisory Committee's Note to Federal Rule 601, 46 F.R.D. 161, 285 (1969). The Commission feels that such a provision is necessary in Montana courts, that there is no other rule which explicitly gives the court the authority to exclude witnesses on this ground, and most important, that the rule expresses existing Montana law.

It should be noted that both Maine Rule 601(b) and California Evidence Code Section 701 refer to "proposed witness" while this rule only uses "witness". The Commission preferred to drop "proposed" to take into account the situation where a witness previously thought by all concerned to be mentally capable is unable to testify coherently; in this situation the court would be allowed to exclude witnesses. However, this rule is not intended to abrogate the universal rule observed in Montana that a party must object to a witness' incompetency before that witness testifies or waive the right to so object. State v. Newman, 66 Mont. 180, 185, 213 P 805 (1923); State v. Palen, 119 Mont. 600, 603, 178 P2d 862 (1947) and cases cited therein; and State v. Cockrell, 131 Mont. 254, 262, 309 P2d 316 (1947).

This subdivision is consistent with Section 93-701-3, subdivisions 1 and 2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], and case law interpreting them. That statute provides "The following persons cannot be witnesses: 1. Those who are of unsound mind... 2. Children under ten years of age who appear incapable of receiving just impressions of the facts..., or of relating them truly". Cases interpreting the first subdivision have not prevented such persons from testifying but instead have imposed a standard that if the person is capable of giving a correct account of the event and appreciating the oath, he will be allowed to testify. State v. Berberick, 38 Mont. 423, 442, 100 P 209 (1909); Martin v. Hoover, 60 Mont. 202, 207, 199 P 694 (1921); State v. Cockrell, supra, and State v. Schleining, 146 Mont. 1, 8, 13, 403 P2d 625 (1965). If a person meets this standard, the credibility of his testimony is left to the trier of fact. Martin v. Hoover, supra. Cases interpreting the second subdivision have been concerned with the child's understanding of his duty to tell the truth and left this and the ability of the child to testify correctly to the discretion of the court. State v. Cadotte, 17 Mont. 315, 316, 42 P 857 (1895) and State v. Shambo, 133 Mont. 305, 308, 322 P2d 657 (1958).

COMMISSION COMMENT TO JUNE 1990 AMENDMENT

The revision establishes gender neutral format only. No substantive change.

Compiler's Comments

1990 Amendment: Substituted gender neutral language for gender specific language. Amendment effective June 7, 1990.

Case Notes

DUI Conviction Upheld — Arresting Officer Allowed to Testify as Fact Witness — Compliance With Officer Qualification Statute Did Not Disqualify Testimony — Accidental Destruction of Detention Center Video Insufficient to Dismiss: The defendant was arrested on suspicion of driving under the influence. Prior to trial, the defendant argued that the arresting officer did not have probable cause to search his vehicle, the officer was not qualified to testify because the state could not prove that the officer received a mental health evaluation under 7-32-303, and the charge should be dismissed because the state failed to produce the detention center video of his arrest. The District Court determined that the search warrant application established probable cause, the arresting officer was qualified to provide testimony as compliance with 7-32-303 did not preclude the officer's testimony, the detention center video was accidentally overwritten, and the defendant failed to show that the video was material, of substantial use, or exculpatory. St. v. Robertson, 2019 MT 99, 395 Mont. 370, 440 P.3d 17.

Counsel's Failure to Object to Competency of Child Witnesses, Introduction of Prior Consistent and Inconsistent Statements, and Therapist Testimony in Incest Case — No Ineffective Assistance: The defendant appealed his conviction for incest on the basis of ineffective assistance of counsel due to defense counsel's alleged failure to object to the competency of child witnesses, the introduction of a DVD containing the victim's prior consistent and inconsistent statements, and the testimony of therapists. The Supreme Court found no merit in the defendant's ineffective assistance claim, concluding no objections were warranted to challenge (1) the competency of the child witnesses, as discrepancies in testimony did not constitute grounds for a challenge under Rule 601, M.R.Ev.; (2) the DVD, as it was admissible under St. v. Lawrence, 285 Mont. 140, 948 P.2d 186 (1997); or (3) the testimony of therapists because Montana law allows therapist testimony regarding a child's credibility in a sexual abuse case, as long as the victim testifies, the victim's credibility is attacked, and the therapist is properly qualified. St. v. Howard, 2011 MT 246, 362 Mont. 196, 265 P.3d 606.

Competency of Mentally Disabled Victim of Sexual Intercourse Without Consent: Victim's lack of consistency in her statements was a question for the jury as to her credibility rather than an evidentiary issue as to her competency to testify. St. v. Longfellow, 2008 MT 343, 346 M 286, 194 P3d 694, (2008).

Admissibility of Summary of Medical Expenses Not Error When Injury Obvious and Plaintiff Competent: At a personal injury trial, the District Court allowed plaintiff to introduce a one-page summary of plaintiff's medical expenses. Defendant asserted on appeal that plaintiff's medical providers should have been required to lay the foundation for admission of the summary. The Supreme Court disagreed. Plaintiff's injuries comprised the type of injuries that a lay person could infer had resulted from plaintiff's accident, and plaintiff was competent to testify regarding the injuries and past expenses incurred as a result of the injuries. Thus, admission of the summary was not an abuse of discretion. McCormack v. Andres, 2008 MT 182, 343 M 424, 185 P3d 973 (2008), following Moralli v. Lake County, 255 M 23, 839 P2d 1287 (1992).

No Reasonable Grounds to Believe Defendant DUI — Sole Testimony of Defendant Sufficient to Prove No DUI Occurred: Eustance drove to the airport to pick up his daughter and grandson who were arriving on a flight. Because of hip pain, it was more comfortable to wait in his car. Eustance parked in the lot of a nearby car rental agency and fell asleep. Eustance was later awakened by a Deputy Sheriff who requested that Eustance perform field sobriety tests and a breath test, but Eustance refused to perform both tests, so his license was seized and suspended. At a hearing on a petition for reinstatement of his license, Eustance was the only witness. He testified that he had been operating his vehicle in a safe and legal manner prior to arrest, that his ability to drive was not impaired, and that he did not believe there was reasonable suspicion or probable cause to justify his arrest. The District Court agreed and granted the petition reinstating the license. On appeal, the state cited Hunter v. St., 264 M 84, 869 P2d 787 (1994), contending that Eustance had not met the burden of establishing that suspension of the license was improper because without the deputy's testimony, Eustance's own testimony was self-serving and insufficient to meet the burden. The Supreme Court disagreed. The testimony of one witness is sufficient to prove any fact. Nowhere in Hunter was it held that a petitioner in a license reinstatement hearing cannot meet the burden of proof without testimony from the arresting officer or that a petitioner's testimony, without more, is insufficient to meet the burden of proof. Thus, the District Court was entitled to accept Eustance's uncontradicted testimony as true. Absent evidence supporting the state's position, Eustance met the burden of proof and his license was properly reinstated. Eustance v. St., 2005 MT 34, 326 M 77, 107 P3d 478 (2005).

No Prejudice by Inability to Depose or Call Child Accident Victim as Witness: A 3-year-old child fell through the second story railing at the Montana State University-Bozeman library and suffered brain injuries. The state sought to depose the child and call him as a witness in the ensuing trial, but the District Court concluded that because of the child's age, little probative information could be gained by forcing him to testify and that such testimony would be traumatic and unduly burdensome, so testimony at deposition and trial was denied. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed. Although there is no minimum age requirement regarding child testimony, nevertheless, child witnesses need protection against the potential emotional and psychological injuries that may occur with regular litigation procedures. Any information that the child could have provided was available from other witnesses and was thus needlessly cumulative and subject to exclusion under Rule 403, M.R.Ev. The state was not prejudiced by its inability to call the child as a witness, and the District Court did not abuse its discretion in protecting the child from having to testify at deposition and trial. Henricksen v. St., 2004 MT 20, 319 M 307, 84 P3d 38 (2004). See also St. v. Stock, 2011 MT 131, 361 Mont. 1, 256 P3d 899.

Mere Loss of Potential Witness Not Sufficiently Prejudicial to Implicate Due Process Rights: The mere loss of a potential witness does not constitute actual and substantial prejudice sufficient to implicate a defendant's due process rights, and defendant's bare speculation that a lost witness's testimony would have been exculpatory is insufficient to prove actual prejudice. However, in the present case, the testimony of two doctors who would have provided a key discussion on the mechanics of a workers' compensation incident, in the context of defendant Taylor's overall history and symptoms, but for their deaths during a lengthy preindictment period, was critically important to Taylor's defense. Without the doctors' testimony, Taylor was actually and substantially prejudiced in his ability to defend himself, warranting dismissal of the information. St. v. Taylor, 1998 MT 121, 289 M 63, 960 P2d 773, 55 St. Rep. 481 (1998).

Uncorroborated Testimony of Child Victim of Sexual Assault Held Sufficient for Conviction — No Requirement for Consistency With Other Evidence — Rogers, D.B.S., and Medina Overruled: Olson was convicted of sexual assault of a child and appealed his conviction. The Supreme Court noted that it had held in St. v. Rogers, 213 M 302, 692 P2d 2 (1984), St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630 (1985), and St. v. Medina, 245 M 25, 798 P2d 1032 (1990), that a conviction for sexual assault may be based entirely upon the uncorroborated testimony of the victim only if the victim's testimony is consistent with other evidence. However, the Supreme Court also noted that it had held in St. v. Howie, 228 M 497, 744 P2d 156 (1987), that a sexual assault conviction may be based entirely upon the victim's uncorroborated testimony without requiring that the victim's testimony be consistent with other evidence. After reviewing the foregoing opinions, the Supreme Court held that the decisions in Rogers, D.B.S., and Medina were incorrectly decided and, for that reason, overruled those three cases to the extent that they were different from the holding in Howie. As that decision applied to the case before it, the Supreme Court held that Olson's conviction could be based entirely upon the testimony of the child victim and that whether the child victim's testimony is consistent with other evidence affects the weight and credibility of the child's testimony. St. v. Olson, 286 M 364, 951 P2d 571, 54 St. Rep. 1449 (1997).

Disqualification of Witness Not Warranted by Inconsistencies in Testimony: Defendant claimed that an undercover officer was incompetent to testify as a witness and should have been disqualified based on inconsistencies in the officer's testimony and the officer's apparent disregard for the law. The Supreme Court held that defendant failed to demonstrate reversible error in claiming witness incompetence because there is no authority requiring a court to disqualify a witness, sua sponte, after the witness has testified, simply because of inconsistencies in the testimony. Under St. v. Phelps, 215 M 217, 696 P2d 447 (1985), the competence of a witness is unaffected by inconsistencies in perception but rather is determined by the capacity of expression and appreciation of the duty to tell the truth. It is axiomatic that inconsistencies in a witness's testimony go to the matter of credibility, not competence to testify. Further, a witness's appreciation of the duty to tell the truth is not necessarily diminished by prior violations of the law because a willingness to break the law does not automatically translate into willingness to give false testimony. St. v. Haskins, 269 M 202, 887 P2d 1189, 51 St. Rep. 1474 (1994).

Trial Court's Improper Questioning of Witness in Front of Jury Not Reversible Error: Kelly, convicted of kidnapping and unlawful sexual intercourse, argued that the trial court erred in questioning the minor victim as to competency in front of the jury. The Supreme Court held that no objection had been made during the trial and that the objection was therefore waived. The Supreme Court also held that although the trial court erred in questioning the child in front of the jury because a witness is presumed competent, there was other direct and corroborative evidence of Kelly's guilt. St. v. Kelly, 265 M 298, 876 P2d 641, 51 St. Rep. 522 (1994).

Inconsistent Testimony of Witness Not Sufficient to Support Argument of Incompetency: The defendant argued that the inconsistency in testimony brought out during cross-examination supported his argument that the 5-year-old witnesses were incompetent to testify against him. The Supreme Court held that inconsistent testimony only went to the credibility of the witnesses and that the lower court had not abused its discretion in finding the children competent to testify. St. v. Howard, 247 M 370, 806 P2d 1038, 48 St. Rep. 232 (1991).

Competency of Four-Year-Old Victim of Sexual Assault: Witness competency is within the discretion of the trial court. The District Court did not abuse its discretion in determining that a 4-year-old victim of sexual assault was a competent witness when it methodically and carefully determined in a competency hearing before the trial that the victim was capable of expressing herself and that she appreciated the duty to tell the truth. St. v. Walters, 247 M 84, 806 P2d 497, 48 St. Rep. 102 (1991).

Competency of Child Unable to Remember Address or Specific Dates: The defendant in a rape case argued that the 7-year-old victim was incompetent to testify because she could not remember her address or specific dates. The Supreme Court affirmed the lower court's decision to allow the testimony, stating that the child's failure to remember certain things did not render her incapable of testifying as to instances of sexual abuse by the defendant. The court held that any inconsistencies within the child's testimony went to her credibility, not her competency. St. v. Newman, 242 M 315, 790 P2d 971, 47 St. Rep. 711 (1990).

Five- and Six-Year-Old Children Competent to Testify Regarding Sexual Abuse: Both a 5-year-old and a 6-year-old child were properly adjudged competent to testify as to incidents of sexual abuse upon a finding that, despite the parent's claims of inconsistencies regarding particular incidents or conversations, the children knew the difference between a truth and a lie and understood that they needed to be truthful on the stand. In re R.A.D. & J.D., 231 M 143, 753 P2d 862, 45 St. Rep. 496 (1988).

Competency of Five-Year-Old Witness and Six-Year-Old Victim of Sexual Assault: A 5-year-old child and a 6-year-old child were found competent in their testimony against a 14-year-old boy charged with sexual assault. Juvenile witnesses may be shown to be competent through their capacity of expression and appreciation to tell the truth. In re J.W.K., 223 M 1, 724 P2d 164, 43 St. Rep. 1483 (1986).

Sufficient Proof of Existence, Cause, and Permanency of Physical Injury: In a tort suit for damages for a back injury, plaintiff was competent to testify as to his past and present condition and his testimony was sufficient for the jury to determine whether there was an injury. However, the testimony was not sufficient to prove permanency or cause of the injury when his testimony was disputed and permanency and cause were not apparent from the injury itself. Since the trial court gave the issue of permanency to the jury with insufficient proof, error occurred and a new trial on the issue of damages was ordered. Cain v. Stevenson, 218 M 101, 706 P2d 128, 42 St. Rep. 1428 (1985), followed in St. v. Bower, 254 M 1, 833 P2d 1106, 49 St. Rep. 586 (1992), and in Moralli v. Lake County, 255 M 23, 839 P2d 1287, 49 St. Rep. 872 (1992).

Four-Year-Old Incest Victim — Competency to Testify: Defendant filed a motion in limine to suppress testimony based on incompetency of 4-year-old incest victim to testify. A hearing on the motion was held. The District Court thoroughly questioned victim. Counsel examined the child. The District Court concluded victim was competent to testify and made findings of fact in support. Citing St. v. Rogers, 213 M 302, 692 P2d 2, 41 St. Rep. 2131 (1984), in which the court found a 4-year-old sexual assault victim competent to testify, the Supreme Court upheld the lower court ruling as being a determination left largely to the discretion of the trial court. Rule 601, M.R.Ev., which defines the competency of a witness, has no age requirements. The record clearly shows that the victim was capable of expressing herself and appreciated the duty to tell the truth. St. v. D.B.S., 216 M 234, 700 P2d 630, 42 St. Rep. 770 (1985), followed in St. v. Eiler, 234 M 38, 762 P2d 210, 45 St. Rep. 1710 (1988). See also St. v. Donnelly, 244 M 371, 798 P2d 89, 47 St. Rep. 1600 (1990), St. v. Imlay, 249 M 82, 813 P2d 979, 48 St. Rep. 588 (1991), which overruled Donnelly with regard to augmentation of sentence for failure to admit guilt, and St. v. Olson, 286 M 364, 951 P2d 571, 54 St. Rep. 1449 (1997).

Competency of Five-Year-Old Victim of Deviate Sexual Conduct: The 5-year-old male victim of deviate sexual conduct was held to be a competent witness despite his perception at trial that he was in a police station and that the judge was a karate expert. Competence is determined by capacity of expression and appreciation of the duty to tell the truth. There was no error committed by the District Court in admitting his testimony and allowing the jury to measure its weight. St. v. Phelps, 215 M 217, 696 P2d 447, 42 St. Rep. 305 (1985).

Competency of Child Victim: Defendant was charged with felony assault (now assault with a weapon) and sexual intercourse without consent. The alleged victim was a 4-year-old who had been left in his care for several days. At trial, defendant questioned the competency of the child as a witness. The child, prior to testifying, illustrated to the judge and jury that she knew the difference between the truth and a lie. She also illustrated that she knew the importance of telling the truth. Her testimony was basically consistent with reports she had given a physician, a police officer, and a social worker. Whether a child is a competent witness is largely within the discretion of the trial court. There was no abuse of discretion in allowing the child to testify. St. v. Rogers, 213 M 302, 692 P2d 2, 41 St. Rep. 2131 (1984), followed in St. v. Olson, 286 M 364, 951 P2d 571, 54 St. Rep. 1449 (1997).

Failure to Object to Judge Qualifying Ten-Year-Old Sexual Crime Victim as Witness in View of Jury — Not “Plain Error” — Mass of Damaging Evidence Precluding Any Prejudice: In the presence of the jury, the District Court Judge questioned the 10-year-old victim of a sexual crime and an aggravated assault about whether she was aware of the consequences of taking an oath and testifying. Defense counsel did not object. Although it would have been better to have conducted the questioning away from the jury and the questions should have been framed differently, any mistake did not warrant the application of the “plain error” rule of 46-20-702 [now 46-20-701(2)] because the defendant was not prejudiced by the manner of qualifying the victim in light of all of the independent and highly damaging evidence against him. St. v. Smith, 208 M 66, 676 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 176 (1984).

Previous Determination of Unfitness to Proceed: A 1976 psychiatric report performed by Warm Springs State Hospital declared an arson defendant unfit to proceed because of mental disease or defect. In a subsequent unrelated proceeding in which this person was to testify merely as a witness, the 1976 psychiatric report did not require a conclusion that he was incompetent to testify as a witness. St. v. Stephens, 198 M 140, 645 P2d 387, 39 St. Rep. 822 (1982), followed in St. v. Arlington, 265 M 127, 875 P2d 307, 51 St. Rep. 417 (1994).

Competency in Criminal Matter Not Determinative in Civil Matter: The Department of Social and Rehabilitation Services (now Department of Public Health and Human Services) filed a petition in District Court alleging that J. H. was a youth in need of care. The boy, his mother, and a social worker all testified that the father sexually abused the boy. The youth was found to be an abused and neglected child. The father claimed that since he was declared unfit to proceed in a collateral criminal action he was also unfit to proceed in the civil action. The Supreme Court found nothing in the record to indicate the father was declared unfit to proceed in anything except the criminal action. He had the burden of proving his incompetence. With no affirmative showing of incompetence to proceed in the civil action, the court presumed the father competent. In re J. H., 196 M 482, 640 P2d 445, 39 St. Rep. 267 (1982).

Prosecutor as Witness: Defendant, convicted of aggravated assault, claimed that a Deputy County Attorney was an incompetent trial witness and that another Deputy County Attorney should not have aided in the prosecution of the case. The Supreme Court found no misconduct. The Deputy County Attorney who testified did not act as prosecutor in the case in any way. The other Deputy County Attorney never testified before the jury. A prosecutor is competent to testify in a case he is prosecuting. A prosecutor need not disqualify himself as a witness when he does not participate as trial counsel. Ordinarily, a prosecutor should withdraw from a case when he testifies for the prosecution, but that rule does not apply when the defense calls the prosecutor as a witness, as happened here. No prosecutorial misconduct was found. St. v. Mercer, 191 M 418, 625 P2d 44, 38 St. Rep. 312 (1981).

Statement by Deceased Agent of Defendant — Admissibility: The statement of a corporate agent made to plaintiff within the scope and term of the agency is admissible as testimony by plaintiff when offered against the defendant, although the corporate agent died before trial. McNulty v. Bewley Corp., 182 M 260, 596 P2d 474, 36 St. Rep. 1110 (1979).

No Presumption of Incompetency: There is no presumption that a witness is incompetent and the burden is on the party asserting the incompetency to prove it, which defendant did not do. St. v. Coleman, 177 M 1, 579 P2d 732, 35 St. Rep. 560 (1978).

Rule 602. Lack of personal knowledge.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 602. The Commission adopts it because it is universally recognized and a sensible requirement.

The rule is consistent with existing Montana statutory and case law. Section 93-401-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], provides: "A witness can testify to those facts only which he knows of his own personal knowledge; that is, which are derived from his own perceptions..." and goes on to list exceptions for opinion and hearsay evidence. Also, Section 93-701-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], provides, in part, much the same requirement: "All persons, without exception,...who, having organs of sense, can perceive, and perceiving, can make known their perceptions to others, may be witnesses".

Cases interpreting Section 93-401-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], have followed its requirement for personal knowledge and generally not allowed testimony as to opinions, inferences, or conclusions (Watson v. Colusa-Parrot Mining and Smelting Co., 31 Mont. 513, 521, 79 P 14 (1904)); but, as long as the witness is so testifying, it does not matter "however clumsily he may express himself". State v. Vanella, 40 Mont. 326, 348, 106 P 364 (1910). The foundation requirement of the rule, allowing the testimony of the witness himself or other evidence to establish that he is testifying from his own personal knowledge, can be inferred from these cases.

The exceptions stated in Section 93-401-2, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], opinions and hearsay, are intended to apply to this rule. The reference to Rule 703, contained in the rules as an exception, is therefore consistent with existing Montana law. The exception contained in the statute allowing a witness to testify to a hearsay statement is not a violation of the personal knowledge rule, for the witness does have personal knowledge of the making of the statement but not personal knowledge of its contents. See State v. Crean, 43 Mont. 47, 59, 114 P 603 (1911) and Wilson v. Davis, 110 Mont. 356, 366, 103 P2d 149 (1940).

COMMISSION COMMENT TO JUNE 1990 AMENDMENT

The revision establishes gender neutral format only. No substantive change.

Compiler's Comments

1990 Amendment: Substituted gender neutral language for gender specific language. Amendment effective June 7, 1990.

Case Notes

Government Weather Report Deemed Self-Authenticating Public Record — Hearsay Exception — Personal Knowledge of Witness Not Required: The District Court did not err when it admitted a

U.S. Department of Commerce weather report into evidence while the defendant was questioning a plaintiffs' witness despite the fact that the plaintiffs' witness was not an expert and despite the plaintiffs' objections. The weather report at issue satisfied Rule 902, M.R.Ev. (Title 26, ch. 10), requirements because it was certified by the custodian of public records. The report also satisfied the public records hearsay exception under Rule 803, M.R.Ev. Lastly, the plaintiffs' witness was not testifying as an expert about the amount of snowfall. As a self-authenticating document, the report gave that information and did not need further foundation or personal knowledge of the weather report. Nolan v. Billings Clinic, 2020 MT 167, 400 Mont. 326, 467 P.3d 545.

DUI Conviction Upheld — Arresting Officer Allowed to Testify as Fact Witness — Compliance With Officer Qualification Statute Did Not Disqualify Testimony — Accidental Destruction of Detention Center Video Insufficient to Dismiss: The defendant was arrested on suspicion of driving under the influence. Prior to trial, the defendant argued that the arresting officer did not have probable cause to search his vehicle, the officer was not qualified to testify because the state could not prove that the officer received a mental health evaluation under 7-32-303, and the charge should be dismissed because the state failed to produce the detention center video of his arrest. The District Court determined that the search warrant application established probable cause, the arresting officer was qualified to provide testimony as compliance with 7-32-303 did not preclude the officer's testimony, the detention center video was accidentally overwritten, and the defendant failed to show that the video was material, of substantial use, or exculpatory. St. v. Robertson, 2019 MT 99, 395 Mont. 370, 440 P.3d 17.

Waste of Game Animal — Testimony of Meat Processor Based Only On Photographs Properly Allowed — Need for Expert Testimony: At Wilmer's prosecution for waste of a game animal, Stroot, a meat processor, testified, based only on photographs, that Wilmer's deer carcass was not fit for human consumption. Because Stroot testified that he could make that determination based only on photographs and because that testimony was helpful to the jury in determining whether Wilmer had wasted a game animal, the Supreme Court held that Stroot's testimony was properly admitted by the District Court. The Supreme Court also held that just because some jurors might be able to determine for themselves whether the carcass was fit for human consumption did not mean that Stroot's testimony was improperly admitted. St. v. Wilmer, 2011 MT 78, 360 Mont. 101, 252 P.3d 178.

Foundational Requirements of Knowledge of Intoxication by Lay Witness — Opinion Testimony Properly Admitted: Kucera, an off-duty firefighter, watched Carter stagger from a tavern, cross the street, get in a car, and drive away. Carter, appearing intoxicated, was followed by Kucera in Kucera's own car and was observed driving through a stop sign, at which time Kucera reported Carter to the police via portable radio, resulting in Carter's subsequent arrest for DUI. At trial, Kucera answered three questions pertaining to his opinion as to whether Carter was intoxicated. Carter asserted that Kucera's statements about his impression, concern, and feeling that Carter was intoxicated did not meet the standard of testifying from personal knowledge required by this rule. However, as a lay witness, Kucera's opinions or inferences were rationally based on his perception and personal knowledge. The state established that Kucera knew the objective signs of intoxication, had much experience being around people in varying states of intoxication, and had observed Carter for some time before alerting police. Because the state complied with the foundational requirements of Rule 701, M.R.Ev., and this rule, Kucera's lay witness opinion testimony was properly admitted. St. v. Carter, 285 M 449, 948 P2d 1173, 54 St. Rep. 1235 (1997).

Children's Attitude Regarding Discussion of Sexual Abuse Within Personal Knowledge of School Counselor: Henrich was charged with sexual abuse of his two daughters. The girls' school counselor testified regarding his counseling session with the girls. When asked how open children were discussing sexual abuse with a counselor, Henrich's defense counsel objected to the question, stating that the counselor was not qualified to render an opinion on the subject. The Supreme Court noted that the counselor could testify regarding matters that were within his own knowledge. The counselor had testified that he previously counseled students who were victims of abuse and that those students usually kept the facts within their own families. The Supreme Court held that the counselor could therefore testify on the issue based upon his personal knowledge. St. v. Henrich, 268 M 258, 886 P2d 402, 51 St. Rep. 1275 (1994).

Lay Witness's Explanation of Voluminous Documents Admissible Under Rules 602 and 701 and as Summary Under Rule 1006: Cowles brought an action against Sheeline to quiet title to a Montana mining claim. The District Court awarded both Cowles and Sheeline 50% of the shares in the mining company, based in part on the testimony of Don Cowles, Jr. Sheeline argued that Cowles's testimony concerning the number of shares issued by the mining company should not have been permitted because Cowles was not an expert. The Supreme Court found that the record indicated that Cowles did not testify as an expert but only as to his interpretation of his typewritten copy of his father's handwritten notes from the company stock book and as to Cowles's summaries of exhibits already in evidence. These summaries were helpful in explaining many pages of documents to the District Court. The Supreme Court concluded that Cowles's testimony was admissible under Rules 602, 701, and 1006, M.R.Ev. Cowles v. Sheeline, 259 M 1, 855 P2d 93, 50 St. Rep. 653 (1993).

Personal Participation in Tax Proceeding Resulting in Property Value Reduction Not Considered Hearsay: Lindey's contended that Goodover's testimony of a reduction in the taxable value of his property constituted inadmissible hearsay evidence. However, Goodover's testimony established his personal participation in the tax reduction proceeding and his firsthand knowledge of the reduction in taxable value. Testimony reflecting personal information was admissible. Goodover v. Lindey's Inc., 255 M 430, 843 P2d 765, 49 St. Rep. 1059 (1992).

Testimony May Contain Hearsay Within Hearsay: The trial court excluded the plaintiff's testimony that a third party had told him that the defendant had made statements pressuring the third party not to award a subcontract to the plaintiff. The trial court excluded the evidence because the plaintiff did not have personal knowledge of the statements allegedly made by the defendant to the third party. The Supreme Court overruled, stating that the lower court misconceived the nature of the personal knowledge requirement in the hearsay context. When A testifies that B told him of an event, A usually has personal knowledge only of B's report. It is B who has personal knowledge of the event. The hearsay rules require that the declarant, B, not the witness, A, has such personal knowledge. Phillip R. Morrow, Inc. v. FBS Ins. Mont.-Hoiness Labar, Inc., 236 M 394, 770 P2d 859, 46 St. Rep. 455 (1989).

Testimony of Psychologist on Suicide Victim's State of Mind — When Psychologist Never Interviewed Decedent: When a psychologist had performed a psychological autopsy on the decedent after his suicide, the Workers' Compensation Court admitted, over the employer's objection, the psychologist's testimony on the causal connection between decedent's injury and his suicide. On appeal, the Supreme Court affirmed, ruling that the fact that decedent had never been interviewed by the psychologist did not render the psychologist's testimony inadmissible. Campbell v. Federated Mut. Ins., 211 M 68, 684 P2d 1101, 41 St. Rep. 1218 (1984).

Chain of Evidence — Bicycle Ridden by Motor Vehicle Homicide Victims: Defendant purposely hit and killed, with auto he was driving, two persons riding a bicycle. Testimony indicated that investigating officer picked up the bicycle at the scene and that it appeared to be in reasonably the same condition at trial as it was in when he picked it up. There was no indication at trial that it had been tampered with or was in worse condition than when officer picked it up. It was properly admitted in evidence over objection that there was insufficient evidence that it was in the same condition at trial as it was at the scene of the incident and that no chain of evidence establishing to whom it belonged and its condition prior to and after the incident was shown. St. v. Woods, 203 M 401, 662 P2d 579, 40 St. Rep. 533 (1983).

Sexual Relations of Defendant With Women Other Than Witness: In a prosecution for sexual intercourse without consent, it was improper to ask a witness who had had sexual relations with the defendant whether other women became upset with defendant because he failed to carry on relationships with them. St. v. Dickens, 198 M 482, 647 P2d 338, 39 St. Rep. 1137 (1982).

Police Officer — Foundation for Testimony: Defendant was charged with intimidation. He had threatened the victim, who took his license plate number and reported it to the police. At the trial an officer testified that a license check had been run and that the car was registered to the defendant. Defendant objected that no foundation had been laid to establish that the officer had personally made the license check and that the testimony was hearsay. The Supreme Court agreed, saying the State should have introduced a certified copy of the car's registration record. The Supreme Court also held that the evidence of ownership was a small part of the case against defendant and that the admission of the testimony did not affect defendant's substantial rights. The error was disregarded. St. v. Wurtz, 195 M 226, 636 P2d 246, 38 St. Rep. 1808 (1981).

Right to Compulsory Process — Evidence Properly Excluded for Lack of Foundation: Defendant charged with larceny by bailee was not denied the right to compulsory process even though the trial court excluded his offered testimony that money he retained out of his client's workers' compensation settlement was an offset for a fee the client owed him for other services. Defendant attempted to introduce this evidence through the testimony of a former Deputy County Attorney when it could only have been established by the testimony of the client or the defendant. In the absence of proper foundation testimony, the evidence was properly excluded. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974, 36 St. Rep. 1037 (1979).

Testimony as to Procedures Followed in Certain Circumstances: In determining whether defendant had acted as an attorney in a suit brought against a corporation, the testimony of a staff attorney of the corporation that the corporation's policy was to immediately notify its insurance carrier by mail of any claims against the corporation, and that no such letter appeared in their files regarding defendant's suit, was admissible even though the staff attorney had not been employed by the corporation when the alleged suit was filed. St. v. Bretz, 185 M 253, 605 P2d 974, 36 St. Rep. 1037 (1979).

Rule 603. Oath or affirmation.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 603 and recognizes that an appeal to the witness' sense of accountability or an attempt to impress a witness to tell the truth should be flexible to accommodate "religious adults, atheists, conscientious objectors, mental defectives, and children". Advisory Committee's Note to Federal Rule 603, 46 F.R.D. 161, 287 (1969). The rule is consistent with Montana law in that it also provides a flexible approach to oath or affirmation. Section 93-401-3, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], requires an oath or affirmation; [former] Rule 43(d) M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded] allows a solemn affirmation in lieu of an oath; and Sections 93-2401-2 through 93-2401-5, R.C.M. 1947 [1-6-102 through 1-6-104], provide various forms of oaths and affirmations.

1990 Amendment: Substituted gender neutral language for gender specific language. Amendment effective June 7, 1990.

Case Notes

Failure to Object to Judge Qualifying Ten-Year-Old Sexual Crime Victim as Witness in View of Jury — Not "Plain Error" — Mass of Damaging Evidence Precluding Any Prejudice: In the presence of the jury, the District Court Judge questioned the 10-year-old victim of a sexual crime and an aggravated assault about whether she was aware of the consequences of taking an oath and testifying. Defense counsel did not object. Although it would have been better to have conducted the questioning away from the jury and the questions should have been framed differently, any mistake did not warrant the application of the "plain error" rule of 46-20-702 (renumbered 46-20-701(2)) because the defendant was not prejudiced by the manner of qualifying the victim in light of all of the independent and highly damaging evidence against him. St. v. Smith, 208 M 66, 676 P2d 185, 41 St. Rep. 176 (1984).

Rule 604. Interpreters.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 604. The rule is consistent with Section 93-701-6, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], requiring an interpreter when a witness does not understand or speak the English language, and with [former] Rule 43(f), M.R.Civ.P. [now superseded], allowing the court to appoint an interpreter at its discretion. The requirement of the rule that the interpreter be sworn by oath or affirmation is also found in Section 93-701-6, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded]. It can be noted that the only case construing that provision found that the necessity for an interpreter is a matter for the discretion of the court. State v. Inich, 55 Mont. 1, 10, 173 P 230 (1918). However, the requirement of the rule that the interpreter be qualified as an expert is not found in existing Montana law and so the rule is new to Montana law to that extent.

Rule 605. Competency of judge as witness.

Commission Comments

This rule is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 605. The rule is consistent with the sensible policy that a judge should not be allowed to be a witness because it is inconsistent with his role as an impartial arbiter. From this policy it can be seen that if a judge were to testify, it might show a partisan attitude toward one party, it certainly limits the ability of counsel to cross-examine or impeach the judge as a witness, it is certain that there is no one to rule on objections, it is possible that the jury might be unduly impressed with his testimony, and finally, it is highly probable that the judge cannot weigh his own testimony in considering motions to dismiss or other motions concerned with the weight of the evidence.

This rule is inconsistent with Section 93-701-5, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], providing in part: "The judge himself,...may be called as a witness by either party, but in such cases it is in the discretion of the court or judge to order the trial to be postponed or suspended, and to take place before another judge...". This statute has been noted but not applied in State ex rel. Breen v. District Court, 34 Mont. 107, 111, 85 P 870 (1906) where the court indicated that a district judge could be called as a witness in regard to the regularity of drawing a jury panel and still preside, but did not discuss the issue. The statute has been applied in In re Nelson, 103 Mont. 43, 55, 60 P2d 356 (1936), an unusual original proceeding in the Montana Supreme Court to hold a newspaper publisher in contempt. It was held proper to allow two justices of the Supreme Court to testify at an evidentiary hearing, particularly because testimony was undisputed. However, in State ex rel. Moser v. District Court, 116 Mont. 305, 316, 151 P2d 1002 (1944), the Supreme Court held the trial court committed an abuse of discretion and reversible error in testifying in a contempt proceeding where he was presiding, rather than follow the procedure found in the statute. In re Nelson, supra, is apparently the law when applied to the Supreme Court, State ex rel. Hall v. Niewoehner, 116 Mont. 437, 448, 155 P2d 205 (1944).

The Commission believes that the rule expresses the better policy and indicates the proper practice which is consistent with State ex rel. Moser v. District Court, supra; to this extent it is consistent with existing Montana law. The last sentence of the rule allowing an automatic objection is adopted as a practical feature; certainly if the judge did not disqualify himself if called as a witness, this rule would not preclude motions for mistrial.

Case Notes

Testimony at Administrative Hearing by Person Who Decides Appeal: Police officers at a disciplinary hearing before the Police Commission argued that because the city manager could veto or modify the Commission's decision, it was an inherent conflict of interest for him to testify against them at the hearing. On appeal, the District Court found no prejudice in the city manager's testimony, and the officers showed none on appeal to the Supreme Court. No rule prevented the testimony. The Supreme Court found no reversible error. Gentry v. Helena, 237 M 353, 773 P2d 309, 46 St. Rep. 862 (1989).

Rule 606. Competency of juror as witness.

Commission Comments

(a) At the trial. This subdivision is identical to Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 606(a) except that the phrase "be called or" is added to the first sentence. Federal and Uniform Rules (1974) Rule 606(a) only provide that a juror may not testify in the case in which he is sitting. The Commission agrees that a juror should not be allowed to testify under these circumstances because of practical limitations on cross-examination and the inability of any juror to objectively determine the weight of his or another juror's testimony. The Commission believes that when a party calls a juror prejudice arises against the objecting party which cannot be obviated by the objection contained in the second sentence of this subdivision. The addition which prevents calling a juror is made to meet this problem. The Commission feels that the provision for objection like the one in Rule 605 is still necessary for instances when the rule is not followed and is not intended to preclude motions for mistrial.

The subdivision is inconsistent with Section 93-701-5, R.C.M. 1947 [superseded], which allows a juror to be called as a witness by either party but allows, in the discretion of the judge, that the trial be postponed, be suspended, or take place before another jury. No case has considered the competency of a juror as a witness. Therefore, it is apparent that this subdivision is a change in Montana law to the extent that testimony by a juror is no longer a matter for the discretion of the court, but is absolutely prohibited.

(b) Inquiry into validity of verdict or indictment. This subdivision is based on Federal and Uniform Rules, Rule 606(b). The Uniform Rule is drafted in a slightly different manner than the Federal Rule, for the exceptions are placed at the end of the subdivision. This format is used for the sake of clarity because another exception had to be added to make subdivision consistent with Montana law. There is no intent to change the substantive content of the Federal Rule except for this addition.

The Advisory Committee Note to Federal Rule 606(b), 56 F.R.D. 183, 265 (1972), indicates the policies to be considered in this area:

The values sought to be promoted by excluding the evidence include freedom of deliberation, stability and finality of verdicts, and protection of jurors against annoyance and embarrassment.... On the other hand, simply putting verdicts beyond effective reach can only promote irregularity and injustice. The rule offers an accommodation between these competing considerations.

The Commission adopts this subdivision in the belief that it is consistent with existing Montana law and also meets these policy considerations.

Section 93-5603(2), R.C.M. 1947 [25-11-102], provides that a new trial may be granted for misconduct of the jury and whenever any one or more of the jurors have been induced to assent to any general or special verdict or to a finding on any question submitted to them by the court, by a resort to the determination of chance, such misconduct may be proved by the affidavit of any one of the jurors...

Early Montana cases considering this section and the question of a juror impeaching his verdict indicated that the practice of allowing it "...should not be tolerated further than the statute permits". State v. Beesskove, 34 Mont. 41, 51, 85 P 376 (1906). In other words, the statute provided the only exception to the common-law rule forbidding a juror to impeach his own verdict. This interpretation was followed in many cases, even where the jurors may have been bribed (Sutton v. Lowry, 39 Mont. 462, 470, 104 P 545 (1909)) or intoxicated (Snyder v. Town of Chinook, 48 Mont. 484, 489, 138 P 1090 (1914)), or a friend of the plaintiff, prejudiced for that party, and familiar with the facts of the case (Hough v. Schiskowsky, 95 Mont. 28, 30, 43 P2d 247 (1935)), or mistaken as to the evidence in the case and the instructions as to the law. Johnson v. Green, 153 Mont. 251, 255, 56 P2d 290 (1969).

However, there are Montana cases which indicate that there is more than the statutory exception to the rule forbidding a juror to impeach his verdict. In Putro v. Baker and Mattox Electric, Inc., 147 Mont. 139, 143, 410 P2d 717 (1965), the jury read and considered a newspaper article which contained highly prejudicial information, inadmissible as evidence, during deliberations. Jurors were allowed to testify to this fact, and the case was reversed and remanded for new trial on the basis of the testimony. In Goff v. Kinzle, 148 Mont. 61, 65, 417 P2d 105 (1966), the court allowed testimony by jurors that the jury foreman had gone to the scene of the accident the night before deliberations began, conducted his own investigation, and reported the information to the jury during deliberations. In Schmoyer v. Bourdeau, 148 Mont. 340, 342, 420 P2d 316 (1966), the court spoke of the competing policies in this area, but in a slightly different light than considered by the Advisory Committee Note, supra:

Two equally basic rights of jury trial collide here; the first is the right to have a fair and impartial trial, free from misconduct of the jury in material matters...the second is the right to have a jury deliberate in camera, free and secure from frivolous and recurrent invasions of that privacy by disappointed litigants.

The court concluded that the narrow interpretation of the statute not allowing jury misconduct to be the subject of testimony by other jurors would not be a fair construction. A summary of these and other cases is found in Charlie v. Foos, 160 Mont. 403, 407, 503 P2d 733 (1972) which stated, "matters which are inherent in the jury process and not concerned with matters which relate to outside influence upon the jury..." could not be the subject of testimony. It is implicit in this statement that outside influence can be testified to by jurors. Finally, this case indicated that Goff v. Kinzle, supra, (where the jury foreman conducted his own investigation) was not an outside influence case, but one concerned with a jury reaching its decision based on information other than evidence received in the case and arguments in open court; in other words, extraneous prejudicial information.

The Commission feels that this subdivision is entirely consistent with Montana law. The rule of competency expressed in the first paragraph is consistent with the rule expressed in the cases not allowing testimony on matters inherent in the verdict. The policy considerations made by the Advisory Committee, supra, have also been considered in a Montana case. The exceptions expressed in the first two categories are consistent with those found in Montana case law, and the final exception is based on a Montana statute. Therefore, the subdivision represents no change in Montana law.

Case Notes

Jurors' Affidavits Admissible — Potential of District Court Judge's Communication to Influence Jury: The defendant moved for a new trial after a jury conviction. The alleged grounds for the new trial were based on affidavits from two jurors indicating that the District Court Judge approached the jury room while the jury was deliberating, briefly addressed the jury regarding whether it would finish that night, and then left. The District Court ruled that the jurors' affidavits were inadmissible under Rule 606, M.R.Ev. However, on appeal, the Supreme Court determined that the jurors' affidavits were admissible under Rule 606 because a juror may testify in any affidavit on whether any outside influence was brought to bear on any juror. While the jury was deliberating, the District Court Judge's communication had the potential to influence the jury. St. v. Northcutt, 2015 MT 267, 381 Mont. 81, 358 P.3d 179.

No Juror Misconduct — Alleged Inappropriate Statement During Jury Deliberations Not External Influence: In a negligence action regarding alleged water-contaminated diesel fuel, the plaintiff alleged that he was denied a fair trial after one of the jurors during deliberations discussed her experience about managing a gas station and the precautions she took to prevent water contamination of fuel. However, the Supreme Court held that the allegedly inappropriate information was an internal influence that is not admissible to impeach the verdict. Horn v. Bull River Country Store Properties, LLC, 2012 MT 245, 366 Mont. 491, 288 P.3d 218, distinguishing Brockie v. Omo, 255 Mont. 495, 844 P.2d 61 (1992), and following St. v. Hage, 258 Mont. 498, 853 P.2d 1251 (1993).

Untimely Motion for New Trial Properly Dismissed: Sirles moved for a new trial based on comments by three jurors that they had felt pressured by the jury supervisor into returning a guilty verdict. The motion was denied, and on appeal the Supreme Court affirmed. The District Court correctly determined that the motion concerned matters related to internal jury deliberations and thus could not be considered and that the motion was not filed within 30 days of the verdict and was therefore untimely. St. v. Sirles, 2010 MT 88, 356 Mont. 133, 231 P.3d 1089.

Juror Comments Pertained to Matters Observed at Trial — Not "Extraneous": Allegations of false statements and accusatory language in a juror affidavit, specifically concerning slamming an injured arm in a courtroom door and that a medical expert was bought an automobile by the defendant's lawyers, were held not to be "extraneous prejudicial information" subject to the juror exception in this rule because the plaintiff failed to establish they were extraneous and because the matters were observed by the juror, in some manner, at the trial. Fish v. Harris, 2008 MT 302, 345 M 527, 192 P3d 238 (2008).

Exceptions as to Admissibility of Juror Affidavit Inapplicable — New Trial Denied: In a letter written by a juror following Hoffman's aggravated assault trial, the juror stated an initial desire to acquit Hoffman, but returned a guilty plea to avoid a hung jury. The juror indicated that Hoffman would have been convicted of a lesser offense if a lesser included offense instruction had been given. Hoffman contended on appeal that in light of the juror's statement, the guilty verdict was not unanimous, resulting in a denial of due process. The Supreme Court noted that under this rule, juror testimony is generally inadmissible except if the evidence is used to determine whether the jury was influenced by extraneous, prejudicial information or outside influence or whether a particular juror reached a specific determination by chance. In this case, none of the exceptions applied, and the District Court did not err in denying Hoffman's motion for a new trial. St. v. Hoffman, 2003 MT 26, 314 M 155, 64 P3d 1013 (2003). See also Sandman v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 1998 MT 286, 291 M 456, 969 P2d 277 (1998).

New Trial — General Rule Prohibiting Admission of Juror Testimony — Exception for Extraneous Prejudicial Information: Following Lawlor's conviction for felony DUI, Lawlor moved for a new trial, alleging that during deliberations a juror improperly offered to other jurors an opinion relating to Lawlor's prior DUI convictions, references to which had been precluded by a motion in limine. The District Court denied the new trial motion, and Lawlor appealed. This rule 606 generally forbids the admission of juror testimony for purposes of ordering a new trial, but one exception hinges on whether extraneous prejudicial information was improperly brought to the jury's attention. Examples of impermissible extraneous information and external influence include: (1) telephoning a relative with regard to previous litigation by the plaintiff; (2) visiting the scene of an accident; (3) conducting experiments and informing the jury of the findings; (4) receiving evidence outside of court; (5) bringing a newspaper article into the jury room and showing it to the jury; (6) the jury's use of demonstrative evidence and experimentation with evidence; (7) pressure from other jurors; and (8) knowledge and information shared from one juror to another. In this case, comments by the juror in question derived from that juror's general knowledge of the criminal justice system when the juror mentioned that felony DUI cases are tried in District Court. The comment was internal and not an external influence subject to the exception in this rule, so the District Court properly denied Lawlor's motion for a new trial based on the juror affidavit. St. v. Lawlor, 2002 MT 235, 311 M 493, 56 P3d 863 (2002). See also St. v. Kelman, 276 M 253, 915 P2d 854 (1996).

Jurors' Notes to Court During Deliberations Not Grounds for Mistrial: During deliberations, the jury sent several notes and questions to the court regarding one of the jurors, who was felt to be obstructing deliberations. Defendant's motion for mistrial based on breakdown in the deliberative process was denied. Following conviction, the juror in question prepared an affidavit alleging that he was unaware of the notes and would not have voted for a guilty verdict had he known about them. The District Court struck the affidavit, finding no juror misconduct, in effect denying defendant's motion for a new trial. The Supreme Court held that the notes constituted an entirely internal process and did not introduce an extraneous or outside element into deliberations, signal a breakdown in deliberations, or have any bearing on defendant's guilt or innocence. Even assuming that the notes had somehow affected the juror's vote, introduction of such testimony is prohibited under subsection (b) of this rule, and the affidavit was properly stricken. St. v. Hocevar, 2000 MT 157, 300 M 167, 7 P3d 329, 57 St. Rep. 625 (2000).

Jury Poll Indicating Lack of Unanimity of Verdict in Criminal Case — Error in Failing to Direct Further Deliberation or Discharge Jury: Following Pyatt's jury trial for felony stalking, the jury was polled in open court as to whether each juror agreed with the verdict. One juror said no, stating that he went along with the verdict because he was outnumbered. Recognizing that a unanimous verdict was required, the court then inquired whether the juror had voted yes in the jury room, and the juror said that he voted in favor of the majority in the end, so his vote was yes. The remainder of the jury also voted yes, so the court ruled that the verdict was unanimous, and Pyatt was convicted and sentenced to the Department of Corrections for 5 years. In polling a jury, the court is to inquire into the jurors' present states of mind as of the time of the poll. To fulfill the jury poll's purpose of safeguarding a defendant's right to a unanimous verdict, the jury poll must afford a juror an opportunity to make an unambiguous reply as to that juror's present state of mind. Here, the juror's response indicated disagreement with the verdict, and the court's further conversation was inappropriate. No juror should surrender an honest opinion as to the weight or effect of evidence or the innocence or guilt of a defendant because the majority of the jury feels otherwise or to return a unanimous verdict or prevent a mistrial. Once the juror indicated disagreement with the verdict, the court should have either directed the jury to deliberate further or discharged the jury, and failure to do so constituted reversible error. St. v. Pyatt, 2000 MT 136, 300 M 25, 1 P3d 953, 57 St. Rep. 555 (2000), following St. v. Holloway, 740 P2d 711 (N. Mex. App. 1987).

Judge's Answer to Jury Question Held Not External Influence — Juror Affidavits Not Proper — Motions to Change Verdict Denied: In a civil suit, the special verdict form contained question #5 that read: "Do you find by clear and convincing evidence that Defendants acted either fraudulently and or with malice?" This question was taken nearly verbatim from plaintiff's proposed verdict form except that the proposed form contained a slash ("/") between the "and" and "or" in the question. Plaintiff did not object to this clerical error at or prior to the time that the form was submitted to the jury. During jury deliberations, the jury submitted a question to the judge stating: "Do we have to differencateate [sic] Between [sic] fraud and malice in #5." The judge answered "No" to the jury question, and neither plaintiff nor defendants objected to the answer at the time. After the trial, plaintiff filed alternative posttrial motions requesting the court to order that the answer to question #5 be "Yes", to set aside the jury verdict on question #5, and to either enter judgment against defendant on the issue of punitive damages as a matter of law or to grant a new trial on the issue of punitive damages. The motions were based on affidavits of eight jurors alleging mistake or confusion based on the court's "No" answer. The District Court denied the motions. The Supreme Court upheld the denial, determining that plaintiff waived her claims of error by failing to object to the special verdict form submitted to the jury; that based on the "invited error rule", plaintiff participated in the error by submitting the conjunctive-disjunctive question; and that the affidavits were not proper because the jury had not been subject to external influences. Sandman v. Farmers Ins. Exch., 1998 MT 286, 291 M 456, 969 P2d 277, 55 St. Rep. 1165 (1998), cited in St. v. Marker, 2000 MT 303, 302 M 380, 15 P3d 373, 57 St. Rep. 1282 (2000).

Juror's Affidavit of Juror Misconduct — Inadmissible Under Ahmann Exception — No Evidence of External Influence — Right to Fair and Impartial Jury Not Violated: Berg argued that he was entitled to a new trial because of jury misconduct and attached to his motion the affidavit of juror Flinders stating that juror Carroll said at one point during the trial, in regard to witness testimony: "That's it; that's all I need to hear; it's all over." The affidavit also stated that juror

Carroll pointed to another juror and said in regard to the juror, "That's one we'll have to convince." The Supreme Court noted that although affidavits are usually used to prove juror misconduct under 25-11-102(2), they may also, under the exception rationale used in Ahmann v. Am. Fed. Sav. & Loan Ass'n, 235 M 184, 766 P2d 853 (1988), be used pursuant to 25-11-102(1) when the only two people with knowledge of the infraction are a juror and another person. However, the Supreme Court found that the Ahmann exception did not apply when the communication was between jurors. The Supreme Court also discussed the applicability of subsection (b) of this rule and determined that the comments made by juror Carroll were not an external influence upon the jury and therefore did not fall within the exception to the general prohibition against use of juror affidavits to impeach a jury contained in subsection (b) of this rule. Regarding Berg's final argument that the jury misconduct violated the District Court's instructions and Berg's right to a fair and impartial jury, the Supreme Court reviewed California case law raised by Berg and concluded that it was inapplicable in Montana. State ex rel. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund v. Berg, 279 M 161, 927 P2d 975, 53 St. Rep. 1098 (1996).

Statement by Juror During Deliberation Held Not External Influence: Kelman, a part owner of a casino, was tried and convicted of violating 45-7-208. Following his conviction, Kelman moved for a new trial because of juror misconduct, in that a juror said during deliberation that Kelman owned a strip bar in another city. The District Court denied the motion. Relying upon St. v. DeMers, 234 M 273, 762 P2d 860 (1988), and St. v. Hage, 258 M 498, 852 P2d 1251 (1993), the Supreme Court held that the statement by the juror, whether mistaken or not, was an internal influence upon the jury's deliberations and fell within the prohibition of subsection (b) of this rule. St. v. Kelman, 276 M 253, 915 P2d 854, 53 St. Rep. 372 (1996), followed in Williams Feed, Inc. v. St., 2007 MT 79, 336 M 493, 155 P3d 1228 (2007), and St. v. Cooksey, 2012 MT 226, 366 Mont. 346, 286 P.3d 1174.

Impeachment of Verdict With Juror Testimony That .357 Magnum Handgun Cannot Be Rapidly Fired — Defense Claim That Victim Shot Himself: The trial court properly refused to allow defendant to impeach the verdict with juror testimony that one juror told the others that he knew that a .357 magnum handgun could not be fired rapidly. Defendant argued that this allowed the jury to conclude that defendant's theory that the victim shot himself was inherently incredible. This rule does not allow inquiry into the internal mechanisms of a jury's decisionmaking process. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Judge's Failure to Inform Defense of Juror Contact With Defendant: It was not error for the judge to fail to immediately notify the defense counsel after the bailiff told the judge that a juror had told the bailiff that, during the trial, she served defendant coffee at a cafe in which she was a waitress. Defendant was given a hearing on the matter after trial and could not show prejudice. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Juror Dream Involving Defendant and Related to Other Jurors: A juror told other jurors that she had a dream in which they found defendant guilty and in which he had a gun and shot his counsel, grabbed her, and ran off with her. Judicial inquiry into the dream is prohibited by this rule. St. v. Moore, 268 M 20, 885 P2d 457, 51 St. Rep. 1151 (1994).

Use of Juror Affidavits to Impeach Verdict — Limited to Showing of External Influences: Appellants sought a new trial on the grounds that posttrial juror affidavits proved that not all of the potential jurors were being truthful during voir dire, resulting in denial of the right to a fair trial. However, under subsection (b) of this rule, the use of juror affidavits to impeach a jury verdict is limited to showing external influences on the jury. Absent the presence of any exceptions listed in Rule 606, M.R.Ev., it was not an abuse of discretion for the trial court to deny a motion for new trial on grounds of juror misconduct. Estate of Spicher v. Miller, 260 M 504, 861 P2d 183, 50 St. Rep. 1180 (1993).

Juror's Affidavit Inadmissible to Prove Internal Influence on Jury — Motion to Strike Properly Granted: Hage was convicted of deliberate homicide. Following his conviction, he moved for a new trial on the basis of a juror's affidavit tending to show that: (1) some jurors "acted out" roles in the jury room; (2) one juror felt pressured by others to decide the case; (3) one juror informed others that he had personal knowledge that a telephone log was kept of calls from the jail; (4) the jurors used a blowup of a detective's crime scene sketch; and (5) some jurors intermingled with spectators during breaks in the trial. Citing Harry v. Elderkin, 196 M 1, 637 P2d 809 (1981), the Supreme Court held that none of the five allegations raised in the affidavit fell within the three exceptions in this rule because they were evidence of internal as opposed to external influences on the jury's deliberative process and that the District Court therefore did not abuse its discretion in denying the use of the juror's affidavit. St. v. Hage, 258 M 498, 853 P2d 1251, 50 St. Rep. 631 (1993), followed in McGillen v. Plum Creek Timber Co., 1998 MT 193, 290 M 264, 964 P2d 18, 55 St. Rep. 808 (1998).

Spouse's Affidavit Concerning Posttrial Conversation With Juror — Insufficient to Trigger Evidentiary Hearing on Motion for New Trial: The District Court did not err in denying the defendant's motion for a new trial without holding an evidentiary hearing when the only evidence presented by the defendant was the defendant's spouse's affidavit recounting implications by a juror in posttrial conversation. St. v. Hatfield, 256 M 340, 846 P2d 1025, 50 St. Rep. 101 (1993).

Juror's Independent Research as Misconduct Warranting New Trial: Defendant presented expert testimony regarding the theory of kinematics and motion theory in relation to the location of a highway construction flasher board at the time of an automobile accident. The jury foreman, who had taken physics in college, went to a local library to research the theories presented at trial and related to at least one juror that it clarified the expert testimony. The location of the flasher board was at the heart of the case, and the juror's independent alleged confirmation constituted misconduct that resulted in probable prejudice to plaintiff's case. The juror was in effect made a witness as to any jurors to whom he mentioned his research. A new trial was warranted. Brockie v. Omo Constr., Inc., 255 M 495, 844 P2d 61, 49 St. Rep. 1092 (1992).

Improper Use of Juror Affidavits on Jury's Internal Processes to Impeach Verdict: Juror affidavits regarding the internal mechanisms and processes the jury used to deliberate and reach a verdict may not be used to impeach the verdict. O'Leyar v. Callender, 255 M 277, 843 P2d 304, 49 St. Rep. 1008 (1992), followed in Greytak v. RegO Co., 257 M 147, 848 P2d 483, 50 St. Rep. 204 (1993).

Use of Juror Affidavits in Attempt to Prove Irregularity or Accident Improper: In moving for a new trial, plaintiffs submitted juror affidavits as evidence that the jury was misled in its duties, asserting that constituted an irregularity or accident preventing plaintiffs from receiving a fair trial. However, this tactic was an attempt to use juror affidavits to impeach the jury's own verdict. If a motion for a new trial is to be granted, an irregularity or accident in jury proceedings must exist independent of juror affidavits. Use of juror affidavits to prove irregularity or accident is clearly improper. The alleged misunderstanding of the jurors in this case did not fit any of the exceptions enumerated in subsection (b) of this rule. Motion for a new trial was properly denied. Boyd v. St. Medical Oxygen & Supply, Inc., 246 M 247, 805 P2d 1282, 47 St. Rep. 1923 (1990), followed in St. v. Marker, 2000 MT 303, 302 M 380, 15 P3d 373, 57 St. Rep. 1282 (2000).

Verdict Rendered in Twenty-Five Minutes — No Error: Defendant claimed that the fact that less than 25 minutes elapsed between the time a case was submitted to the jury and the time the jury brought in a verdict demonstrated that the jury failed to consider or read the jury instructions, consider the evidence, or follow its charge. However, in light of overwhelming substantial evidence and a lack of error of law in the record, the verdict was affirmed. St. v. Seaman, 236 M 466, 771 P2d 950, 46 St. Rep. 512 (1989).

Irregularities in Jury Proceedings — Juror Affidavit — New Trial Denied: To support their motion for a new trial in District Court, plaintiffs submitted an affidavit of one juror, alleging that certain statements made by the bailiff during jury deliberations misled the jury and prevented clarification of the issue of proximate cause. Juror affidavits are admissible to show grounds upon which a new trial may be granted when a juror has personal knowledge of an alleged irregularity in the proceedings and the only other individual who has personal knowledge of the facts surrounding the irregularity is the individual who committed the alleged infraction. Only the facts upon which the alleged irregularities are based are admissible. Any allegations regarding the inner workings of the jury deliberations are inadmissible. The Supreme Court will not overrule the District Court's refusal to grant a new trial unless the evidence is clear and convincing that the trial court erred. Ahmann v. Am. Fed. S&L Ass'n, 235 M 184, 766 P2d 853, 45 St. Rep. 2305 (1988), overruled as to standard of review in Allers v. Riley, 273 M 1, 901 P2d 600, 52 St. Rep. 920 (1995), and distinguished in State ex rel. St. Comp. Mut. Ins. Fund v. Berg, 279 M 161, 927 P2d 975, 53 St. Rep. 1098 (1996).
